"The duties of the employer to the employee have been enlarged in recent years, and are not merely that of the purchaser of the employee's time and service for money. The enlightened spirit of the age, based upon the experience of the past, has thrown upon the employer other duties, which involve a proper regard for the comfort, health, safety and well-being of the employee. . . . It is well within the corporate power to assume, as it has done, the care and treatment of such of its employees as are afflicted with tuberculosis. And unless it is shown to be wasteful of the company's money and unproductive of beneficial results, the practice may stand as well within the scope of its business. The reasonable care of its employees, according to the enlightened sentiment of the age and community, is a duty resting upon it, and the proper discharge of that duty is merely transacting the business of the corporation."

This Sanatorium is another evidence of the spread of the discovery that the highest humanity is the soundest business. One achievement at Mount McGregor has been making the patients happy. I never saw a group of afflicted people so full of surprised contentment and hopefulness as the girls I talked with there. They were not all to recover. Some were too far gone when they were received, but they knew they were having the best chance science and devotion could give. They looked out from their chairs on a beautiful world, and however hard it had been in the past they had found at last its kindness.

IT is not the occupational disease nor is it tuberculosis or typhoid or troubles calling for operations that are the most serious problems in industrial life. It is the minor degenerative diseases the impaired digestion, the thin blood, the poorly functioning kidney, the nervous run-down condition—ills which the victim does not realize but which if not checked will sap his strength, weaken his resistance to occupational disease and to epidemics, and often hurry on some tendency of which he knows nothing.

In its investigation of the employees of various business houses and factories, the Life Extension Institute has found only 3.14 per cent. really sound people. It declares that nearly 97 per cent. of those examined need advice about how to live. Nearly this full number were not aware that they were in any way impaired, and yet such was the impairment that nearly 60 per cent. had to be sent to physicians. The Institute found numbers of those examined afflicted with some kind of physical defect which could be corrected often without the help of a physican, but was neglected because unrealized.

It is these degenerative diseases which are mainly responsible for the huge sick list in American industry. In 1915 the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company cooperated with the Federal Bureau of Labor in a study of unemployment. A million wage earners were covered. It was found that 1.2 per cent. of these people were unemployed because of illness.

Apply the percentage of sickness found in the first investigation referred to above, 1.2 per cent., to the working world of the United States as numbered by the census of 1910. In all occupations there were then engaged 38,167,336 persons, 8,075,772 of them being women. If 1.2 per cent. of these are continuously ill we have an annual loss of 137,402,400 days (counting 300 days to a year). Suppose the average wage of the working world is but $1.50, and we have a money loss of nearly one hundred and sixty-five million dollars - and a loss falling in the main upon those least able to bear it. But this money loss is small beside the loss which comes from discouragement, from debt, and from the general disorganization that illness causes, particularly in families who depend upon a daily wage for support.

[The conclusion next week of this interesting article describes how Jane Doe was given vacation treatment for her ills, and the relation of vacations to the whole subject of the industrial workers' welfare, besides some other features of this great movement.]

A Journey of Discovery

By
GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL LUTZ

LOUISE HASBROUCK stepped out of the suburban train at Norwood and stood on the platform looking haughtily about for a cab. A strange sense of peace and quietness struck her city-accustomed senses startlingly, as if she had been suddenly dropped into an alien world. She was a trifle frightened now that she was here. After all, how foolish of her not to have come in her own car! There was no cab in sight!

The station was an absurd affair of gray cement, with latticed windows and fluted coral tiles, like a doll's house. The country spread leisurely, invitingly about her, dotted with houses set down as if economy of space were of no moment whatever. A pleasant hill sloped gradually in the distance, also dotted at intervals with houses. A mild-eyed cow with a long golden straw dangling from her amiable mouth surveyed the stranger thoughtfully over the rails of her pasture fence across the street. The country did not seem at all to realize that she had arrived.

Inquiry from the genial, gold-spectacled agent elicited the fact that the only cab had just taken Mrs. Samuel Hawkins up the hill and would not be back for fifteen or twenty minutes, as they had to go around by the Plush Mills to get a passenger for the down train. If she was in a hurry she was advised to walk to Mrs. Van Rensselaer Blake's. It was only four blocks straight ahead, and then turn to the right, and three blocks. Stone porch with arches and green shingles. She couldn't miss it.

She stepped into the quiet street curiously, half bewildered at its emptiness and space; only milk-carts and a grocery wagon in view.

Louise Hasbrouck had been restless and unhappy ever since her friend Cecilia Radcliffe suddenly gave up her brilliant social career to marry Van Rensselaer Blake and live in an eight-roomed bungalow in the suburbs.

The marriage had been a distinct shock to their entire social set, and Louise had felt it so keenly that she had never as yet been to visit her friend in her new home, although it was now almost two years since the wedding. It seemed to her like going to the graveyard to trace a beloved name on a tombstone, and yet she had known all along that some day she would go. She must see for herself just what had come to her friend. If Cecil and Vannie could give up purple and fine linen and be content in the country without even a car of their own, why, there must be something in love in a cottage after all. Louise did not believe much in love. There had never been any manifestation of it in her own home. Her father dwelt abroad most of the time, and her mother was worldly wise.

It was Jimmie Jordan who had stirred up the unrest in her heart and caused her to go forth at last to discover for herself once for all if there were such a thing as love that satisfies. Jimmie did not belong to their set.

Louise had met him two summers ago on a yachting trip when he was just out of college and she a débutante. He was the roommate and college chum of their host's younger brother. He had been good fun and they had been splendid comrades during the trip, but it had been quite understood from the first that Jimmie was not one of them. He was a worker—whatever that might mean—something in engineering. He had worked his way through college and was now "doing things" in the world. Louise had only a vague idea of what they might be—something about bridges and tunnels. He was perfectly respectable and all that, but not at all in her scheme of living; merely a pleasant incident by the way, to be thought about at intervals occasionally.

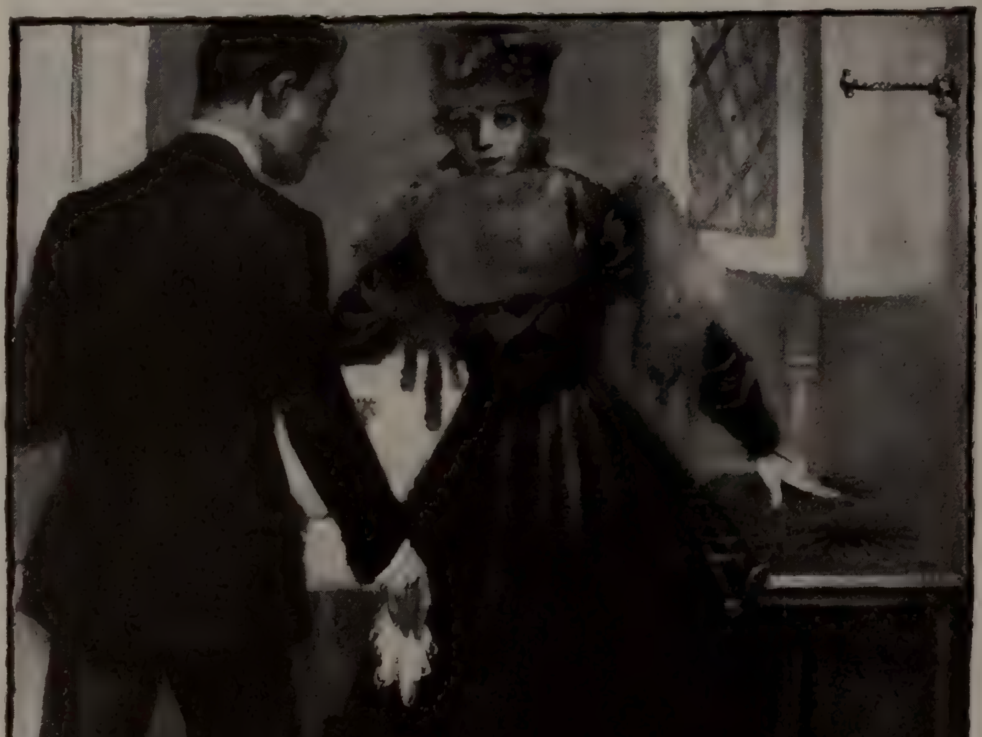
AND yet, when she thought about it definitely, it was really the memory of Jimmie Jordan's gray eyes and the unspoken things in them that sent her desperately out to Norwood to hunt up Cecilia in her exile and prove to herself once for all that the suggestions that kept knocking at the door of her restless soul were ridiculous and impossible. It seemed that nothing short of stark, disagreeable reality would drive them from her mind.

For Jimmie Jordan had spoken of how happy Cecil and Van were in their charming home and asked if she had seen them lately. He had told quite briefly how Blake had given up his man and his apartments in town, bought this bungalow, taken a bank position, and they were living on his salary, twenty-five hundred dollars! It seemed incredible! Why, twenty-five hundred wouldn't begin to pay for and keep the car that she and her mother went out in every day. How could Cecilia have done it? How could they get on at all and be decent on that poor pittance? And Cecil might have had her choice of men who were worth their millions!

"You ought to see how well they live on his salary!" Jimmie Jordan had declared, a ring of triumph in his pleasant voice. It was then his gray eyes had taken on that wistful look that haunted her. It haunted her the more because there was a longing for something in her own soul which she could not understand.

And so this sweet spring morning she had run away at last to see for herself and satisfy those doubts that would not let her do what everybody was expecting her to do. For she had promised to give, that very afternoon, a definite answer to Halsey Carstairs, the man whom everybody expected her to marry and she felt she could not give it until she had seen for herself.

Halsey Carstairs was good-looking, agreeable, comfortably attentive, and had plenty of money. He was dull and tiresome at times, perhaps, but still one could not have everything. Once she had dreamed that life would have something different for her, something more interesting and romantic than Halsey Carstairs; but she had waited, and nothing better seemed coming her way. Perhaps there was nothing better. Perhaps she was wrong to look for more. And yet she had to come. That haunting, unspoken question in Jimmie Jordan's eyes would not let go of the yearning in her soul until she had seen for herself. She could easily get back by five o'clock for the interview with Carstairs.



Something leaped from their eyes and told the story

Perhaps it had been with the desire to let things seem as bad as they could that she decided not to come in her car but to take the common train, and to walk from the station. She wanted to let her sensible self see what people who did foolish, romantic things had to put up with. Yet as she walked down the pleasant little street of Norwood she searched in vain for signs of discomfort and barrenness. There was nothing to suggest unpleasantness or poverty A little girl with shining brown curls danced out of a gate and down the street, humming a merry tune, gazing curiously at the richly dressed lady as she passed, admiring the beautiful furs she wore and the roses on her hat. The little girl went into a small grocery half a block ahead, where a jangling bell made known her entrance, and emerged with a big loaf of bread in a paper under her arm just as Louise passed her. Was that the thing they had to do in the suburbs? Fancy having to carry one's own bread home!

When Louise turned to the right as the agent had directed she could not help feeling the beauty and picturesqueness of the street. The houses were all different, and yet very pretty. Many of them of stone or stucco, with tiled roofs and quaint windows. There were porches everywhere, and the lawns were neat and trim, with hedges about them, and borders of tulips and hyacinths. There were children playing in some of the yards, with their kittens and their dolls, watched over by big shaggy dogs.

She passed the third block and came to the house which she knew must be the Blakes'. There were crocuses, purple, white, yellow and blue, stiffly dotting the grass, and there were soft creamy curtains veiling the windows. It was in beautiful taste and harmony, the very prettiest of all the homes she had passed. It was like Cecilia, and it brought a sense of brief relief, as if she had looked fearful into a coffin and found the face more lifelike than she had expected. Then suddenly she stopped short on the walk and gave a startled exclamation. A willow baby couch stood on the porch quite near the door, with soft woolly drapery falling over the side, as if it had recently been cast aside by the occupant. That too! She hadn't heard! How strange!

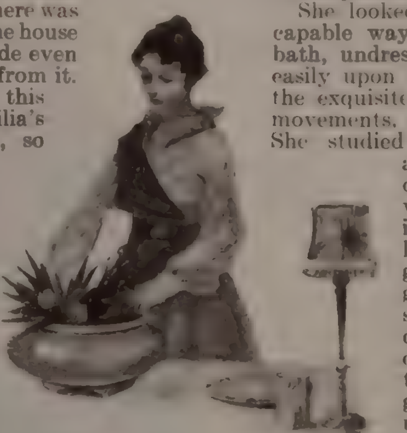
And yet, perhaps it was a mistake. Of course! She had come to the wrong house! She couldn't imagine Cecil with a child! But she would go up to the door and inquire.

SHE stepped up and sounded the brass knocker half timidly, and then stood looking curiously down into the little empty nest, at the soft embroidered pillow, lace-frilled and puffy; at the pretty afghan of white and blue knit wool, with wide blue satin ribbons run in. How pretty they were! It reminded her of her doll days, and the expensive toys wherewith her childhood had been crowded. It gave her a sense of relief to notice that the ribbons were of good quality and everything fine and dainty. And then the door opened and a trim little colored maid in white cap and apron with a silver tray in her hand opened the door.

"Yas'm. Mis' Blake lives here," she assented, smiling. "Step right in, please." And Louise was ushered into what seemed a spacious room for so tiny a house, and at once surrounded with an atmosphere of loveliness. The sense of peace and quietness that she had noticed on the street seemed almost to have its source from this spot, so sweet and happy did the room seem.

She sat down and gazed about her, almost dazed. This then was Cecil's home! This was what Jimmie Jordan had meant when he told her she should see! She might have known! How could Cecil be anything but harmony and beauty and quietness?

It was as if she had suddenly discovered that one whom she thought dead forever was radiantly alive. She looked about and tried to take note of things, but her mind could not grasp details. There was a rug of costly pattern, a few pieces of Chippendale and Sheraton, some rare pictures on the walls, and vases and bric-a-brac that all belonged to the great world from which she had come; but these were wedding presents, of course, and they were so arranged amid a sweet simplicity that there was nothing incongruous in all their surroundings. There was a piano, a case of rare books, a wide-open fireplace, and through the open doorway between heavy curtains she caught a glimpse of glittering glass and silver—more wedding presents! But yet none of these things seemed to be essential to the place. There was an impression all over the room that the house would have been the same lovely abode even if the rare things had been omitted from it. What was it that gave the room this charm? What a contrast to Cecilia's mother's reception-room in the city, so stumbling full of rugs, bric-a-brac and gold-encrusted cushions! What was it that made the charm here?



Then, before she could answer the question, a door opened somewhere and there came a soft little coo; a queer little human sound of a baby voice, saying, "Ahh-hh-ah! Oooooo!" and she was recalled with a start to the thought that had come as she entered. There was a baby in the house then! Cecilia had a child! How strange! How startling!

But before she could get used to the idea Cecilia herself came rushing down the stairs with a cry of joy and flung her arms about her guest.

"Oh, Louie, you dear! How good to hear your voice again! And to think you've really come! I've just longed to have you here. I thought you had forgotten me! And now you're here, I'm going to keep you at least for overnight. Take off your hat and gloves at once. You'll just have to telephone and call off all engagements. I've got a duck of a spare room, and I'm bound to have an old-time visit. Take off your coat and hat this minute and come right upstairs! You've just come in time. I'm going to give baby her bath and you can see her. You haven't seen the baby, have you? She's the darlingest thing. She usually has her bath earlier than this, but I took her in the coach to the station with Van this morning, and she went to sleep on the way home and just woke up, so all the day's régime is upset. But I'm glad now, for you can see her. She is so cunning in the bath tub!"

And was this the forlorn exile whom she had dreaded coming to see? This radiant creature with blooming cheeks and starry eyes arrayed in——? What was this she wore? A cotton shirtwaist with the sleeves rolled high, showing the girlish dimples in her elbows, and a large flannel apron covering the rest of her garb completely! This vivid, happy girl, who talked so joyously and continuously that her visitor could not get a word in edgewise even if she had been able to think of a word to say! Was this Cecilia Radcliffe, the slim, pale, dignified, almost severely sad girl she had known of late years? Was this the woman she had come to pity and be warned by? This happy, jubilant, carefree creature, more like the girl with whom she went to boarding-school!

Thus in wondering silence she suffered herself to be led upstairs past the landing, deep bay windowed, where cushions, ferns, and a magazine invited one to linger, and a yellow canary in a brass cage fairly split his throat to sing a welcome to the crocuses in the garden below.

The top landing gave a charming vista of three pretty rooms and a white tiled bathroom all flooded with the spring sunshine, as if a dozen suns were shining in as many different directions. They were airy rooms, with muslin-curtained windows, simple wall paper, neutral-tinted rugs and white furniture, with a touch of color in the borders of the wall and curtains, the cushion on a rocker, a knot of ribbon on the dressing-table. One room was rosy-tinted, one was white and gray, and the third a dainty blue, the wall bursting into a shower of cherry bloom over a deep sky background. Something pink and roseleaf-like was stirring softly in the blue and white draped basket-crib in this third room, and again the soft little voice sounded: "Goo-ah-gooo-oooo!"

Straight to that blue and white crib went the visitor and stood looking down at the little mortal lying in its dainty depths, moving fluted roseleaf fingers, kicking little pink worsted shoelets, gurgling softly to herself.

LOUISE had never cared for babies. "Ugly little squalling red things!" she had been wont to think of them. But this baby was different. She had a personality. She was the tangible presence of the bond that bound her father and her mother to a new world, and placed them irrevocably out of the world which they had renounced. She gazed at the baby half in awe, and resented the strange tenderness that stirred her; till suddenly the baby smiled most ravishingly, showing unsuspected dimples, and bursting into a delicious remark accompanied by the most delightful darting gestures of fluted hands and tasseled toes: "Ahhh-ooo-ah-oooo!" and ending in a chuckle and another smile.

"Isn't she a darling, Lou? She knows you are somebody extra nice. Just see her smile! She doesn't deign to smile at everybody. Miss Darnell was over here last week, and she would do nothing but pucker up her lips and cry whenever she looked at her. Now take off your hat and coat and sit over here in that chair while I get the bath out of the way. This young lady won't have any day left if we don't hurry."

Still in silence Louise sat and watched and wondered, letting her hostess do the talking for the most part, too surprised at everything to answer except in monosyllables.

She looked in amazement at the strong capable way in which Cecil prepared the bath, undressed the baby and held her so easily upon her flannel-aproned lap, touching the exquisite pink skin with loving, caressing movements, as if it were intensest pleasure. She studied the array of little blue toilet articles set out at hand like a dolly's outfit; she watched the soft wash-rag foamy with sweet soap as it moved over the little fluffy golden head and down over the happy gurgling face, making the baby gasp and gurgle and laugh and splutter. She wondered how Cecil dared, for fear she might choke the child. She stood expectant when the little pink-soaped Cupid, still gurgling unsubdued and smiling undaunted, was lowered into the big white tub and sat crowing and splashing in ecstasy like some young fountain of delight, and then was lifted, slippery and protesting, back into the flannel lap and enveloped in a great soft towel, from which she presently emerged with shining countenance haloed by soft rings of gold, and roseleaf body warm and dry.

"But haven't you any nurse at all, Cecil? Do you always have to do this?"

"No, indeed, I haven't any nurse," declared the young mother firmly. "But I wouldn't let any nurse do this for my child if I had ten servants. It's the happiest part of the day, and I wouldn't miss it for anything! People who let servants attend to their children never know all they miss."

"But doesn't it tie you down dreadfully? How can you ever go out?"

"It doesn't tie me down half so much as society life used to do. You don't understand, Lou. I don't want to go out much, because it's so much nicer here at home, and we'd be missing so much. Van feels that way too. He just loves his home, and we have such good times together! Sundays he always stays around and helps me with the baby. He thinks there's nothing like her, and she just worships him. Wait till he comes home this afternoon and you'll see how she laughs and crows to go to him."

The bath was over and the baby was being fed now. Louise sat in wonder and watched the sweet-faced mother with the little golden head nestled against her breast; the great blue baby-eyes looking trustingly, dreamily into the heaven of the mother's face; the long lashes drooping more and more until they lay still upon the soft cheeks. It seemed like the painting of some great madonna suddenly come to life. She had never dreamed of anything so sweet as this intimate relation between mother and child. It seemed a mystery incomprehensible. She had come to have her illusions swept away, and lo, more illusions were being thrust upon her! Suddenly she felt her eyes fill with strange, wistful tears. Was marriage and motherhood a lovely thing like this? Then she thought of Halsey Carstairs and her heart said: "Not with him!"

A LITTLE later Louise went with the young housekeeper through the immaculate house; surveyed the wax-like kitchen with its mysterious gas range, its white enamel sink and rows of shining cooking utensils, the little maid standing at the sink peeling potatoes. Everything seemed so perfect, like well-oiled machinery.

"How do you manage it, Cecil?" she asked when they were back in the living-room again. "She must be a wonderful servant to do all this. How did you know what to tell her to do? Or does she tell you?"

"Bless your heart! She didn't know a thing when I got her."

"You! But how did you know?"

"I went to cooking school and learned," laughed the young wife.

It was a wonderful day. It absorbed her so intensely that she almost forgot to telephone Halsey Carstairs in time to stop his meeting the appointment at her home.

When they got back to the house they found that Blake had telephoned he was going to bring a friend out to dinner, and Louise entered into the arrangements eagerly, herself arranging crocus buds in a glass bowl for the center of the table, and feeling as if she were in a play.

And who should the guest turn out to be but Jimmy Jordan, with his strong handsome face and his wistful gray eyes all alight with anticipation of the evening! The gray eyes fairly blazed with joy when they saw Louise.

"Why, I didn't know that you were going to be here!" he said with a thrill in his voice; and held her hand so long in both of his big hearty ones that her cheeks grew pink and her eyes drooped in panic lest Cecilia or Blake should see the gladness she knew was in them. But she need not have worried. Cecilia and Blake were altogether too much taken up with one another after the long day of separation to notice mere visitors.

JIMMY and Louise attended the good-night ceremonies in the nursery, standing on the outer edge of things as it were, and gazing with half averted faces at the pretty rite. They slipped away half embarrassed down to the little porch, with the evening breath of the crocus, and the clear near call of the thrushes' good-night in the trees of the neighborhood. In a moment more Blake joined them and suggested that they go through the new bungalow that was almost finished in the next block. Cecilia came and they went down the pleasant little street, with Blake and his wife nodding good evening and passing a pleasant word with the neighbors who were out on their porches and lawns. Jimmy and Louise walked together, and were silent under the spell of the evening and the pleasant home atmosphere of everything.

Oh, that lovely little bungalow! That charming fireplace with its cosy seats and bookcases and tiny lattice-faced china closet! How they followed their hosts about as Cecilia dilated on this advantage and that exactly as if she were an agent for the house! How Jimmy's eyes shone with that eager light again as he asked the price of rent and coal and things! And how Louise's throat suddenly filled up with a desire to cry, and her heart ached with a big something that kept swelling and swelling there! She had forgotten Halsey Carstairs entirely.

The evening sped on swift wings. Jimmy stayed till the midnight train and they sang around the piano together. He held Louise's fingers in a long warm grasp, and stood by the front door till the last minute, and then had to run for his train. In a few minutes she was upstairs in the pink and white guest-room; alone with her strange new thoughts and feelings. Through her closed door she could hear a gentle murmur of content in the subdued voices across the hall. They were happy! They were glad to be alone together again! What a mystery! What a beautiful wonder!

AFTER breakfast the next morning, when Blake was gone and while Cecilia was giving the orders for the day and attending to the baby, Louise Hasbrouck, who was supposed to be reading the morning paper in the living room, slipped out the door and down the street. Something was drawing her to that little new house. She wanted to be there alone and think; try to imagine herself there keeping house with somebody; try to see if it would be possible! For now that the day was come Halsey Carstairs had become a reality again, and must be reckoned with. She had promised to come back to the city and give him his answer today.

Louise slipped softly in at the door and drew it gently behind her. She was alone in the little house with her thoughts!

Her cheeks glowed and she looked around with shining eyes. Suppose she had come here to live. Suppose Halsey Carstairs and she were married and were going to begin housekeeping here!

Something gripped her heart like a cold vise, but she went steadily through the little house and tried to imagine it. A strange tumult was in her heart, and a strange illusion was with her. Whenever she tried to think of the comfortable stupid face of Halsey Carstairs it took on the vivid strength of Jimmy Jordan; and try as she would she could not get away from the vision of Jimmy, with that eager light in his eyes, and that happy smile, asking how much coal and sugar and flour were. It completely swept the thought of Halsey Carstairs from her mind, and melted the ice in her heart. She went through all the tiny cheery rooms, and looked in every closet and cupboard like a child, pausing at last in the tiny kitchen beside the little shining gas range as if it were an altar.

She did not hear an automobile come purring down the street and stop before the door. She did not hear firm steps coming up the cement path, nor the front door pushed open. She was thinking, and there were wonderful lights in her eyes and a soft rose color on her cheeks; when suddenly her thoughts became a reality, and looking up she saw that Jimmy was there in truth! Something leaped from their eyes and told the story even before he spoke:

"Louise! You here!"

He was holding a small handkerchief in his hand. He did not stop to explain that he was on his way to a business appointment and had been drawn to stop and look at the little house once more; and that this scrap of a handkerchief with its initial had led him to search for the one who had dropped it. He did not even tell her that he had meant to call at the Blakes' and see if he might take her back to the city with him on his return from his appointment. He stopped for nothing. He merely gathered her into his arms as if he had a right to do so, and put his face down to her glowing face! And she did not resist!

And after a long sweet silence, during which the sink and the range tried to look decorously oblivious and not to smile in anticipation, Jimmy lifted up Louise's beautiful face and looked in her eyes:

"Could you be happy in a home like this, Louise, until I was able to give you a better one?"

And Louise, with swift final vision of Halsey Carstairs's smug vanishing back, lifted up her joyous eyes and answered:

"Yes, with you, Jimmy!"

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

LITERACY TEST MADE LAW. The Senate on February 5 concurred in the previous action of the House and passed the Immigration Bill containing the literacy test over the President's veto by a vote of 62 to 19. The attempt to restrict immigration by means of a literacy test has been before the country since 1897, when a bill carrying this test was vetoed by President Cleveland. President Taft also vetoed a similar bill, and President Wilson has twice vetoed the Burnett Bill. The law goes into effect May 1, and will exclude from the United States all aliens over sixteen years of age, physically capable of reading, who cannot read the English language or some other language or dialect. Any admissible alien or any citizen of the United States may bring into the country his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, or any female relative, regardless of their ability to read. The bill also provides for the admission of any person fleeing from religious persecution, this being the provision against which the President objected most strongly in his veto message. Only thirty Presidential vetoes have been overridden in the history of the United States, four of them in the last thirty-five years, the last previous case being the rejection of President Taft's veto of the Webb-Kenyon interstate commerce liquor law, recently approved by the Supreme Court.

Back Home. Major General John J. Pershing rode out of Mexico shortly after ten o'clock on the morning of February 5 at the head of more than 10,000 soldiers of the punitive expedition, but omitted to bring Villa with him. At 11 o'clock the general mounted the little bandstand in front of the headquarters at Columbus, New Mexico, and gave the order for his troops to pass in review. Several thousand refugees came out of Mexico with he expedition. The result of the expedition may be summed up in its losses of men. Two officers and twenty men were killed, one officer and twenty men died of disease. The military road constructed from Columbus to the headquarters of the expedition at Colonia Dublan may also be included among the results of the expedition, the road, by the nature of the case, having been left behind.

Plotting Against Lloyd George. Four persons, a woman, her two daughters and her son-in-law, were arrested by the British police on January 31 charged with plotting the murder of Premier Lloyd George and of Arthur Henderson, the representative of British labor in the War Council. The prisoners were bound over for trial after pleading not guilty, without any of the evidence being made public.

Shackleton Rescues Crew. Seven survivors of the Shackleton Antarctic Expedition, who were marooned on the Antarctic Continent, were rescued by the steamship Aurora, which arrived in New Zealand on January 10. Captain McIntosh and two other men of the stranded party perished, making a total of six deaths charged against the expedition as a whole. The men recently rescued had been for twenty-one months in the Antarctic with only a scanty supply of provisions.

Fragments of News. The railroads of the United States and the Railway Brotherhoods were reported on February 4 to have agreed to submerge all their differences until the crisis in our foreign affairs was passed. . . . The Japanese merchant marine has recently been given as including 2,162 steamers with a total tonnage of 1,673,829; ships above 1,000 tons aggregated 1,200,382 tons. . . . The National Daylight Saving Convention met for two days in New York at the Hotel Astor, January 30 and 31. The aim of the association is to secure legislation authorizing the turning of the clocks forward an hour in the summer time in order to make better use of the hours of daylight. It is called "saving daylight." The plan was tried last summer in England and in some parts of the Continent with, it is claimed, good results. . . . As the result of a fatal boxing-bout in Albany in January, Governor Whitman sent a special message to the legislature of New York urging the repeal of the Frawley Law by which boxing-bouts are permitted in New York State. . . . The congressional committee in search of the supposed leak of news regarding the President's peace note of December 21 returned to Washington February 3, after holding several sessions in New York City, in which they seemed constantly on the verge of developing important testimony. At last reports, however, nothing material had been uncovered.

Annual Bank Inventory. On February 5 the comptroller of the currency, in his annual report to Congress, stated that the total bank clearings for the fiscal year 1916 were $241,407,541,000, an increase of over $78,000,000,000 over 1915. The net earnings of national banks for the same period were $157,542,547. The comptroller reported that the practice of charging exorbitant interest rates had decreased to a large extent, the number of banks charging more than ten per cent. interest having been reduced in Georgia from 23 to 7, in Alabama from 21 to 6. in Texas from 317 to 122, in North Dakota from 90 to 37, in South Dakota from 25 to 10, in Nebraska from 18 to 6, and in Oklahoma from 300 to 193. The comptroller stated that the trouble had not yet been fully rectified; that banks here and there continued to exact interest rates which could not be justified.

Where Our Goods Go. Statistics of American exports for 1916 show that Europe took 66 per cent. of American exports during the year, at a total valuation of $3,813,621,000. The exports to South American countries increased from $144,128,000 in 1915 to $220,288,000. Shipments to Asiatic ports jumped from $146,706,000 to $363,201,000, a large percentage of these shipments, however, being landed at Russian Asiatic ports for transportation overland. Exports to Japan increased from $45,000,000 to $159,000,000, and imports from Japan to this country increased from $108,000,000 to $182,000,000. Our imports from South America also increased from $322,000,000 to $427,000,000.

The War in Europe

THE center of interest in the European war has been shifted from land to sea by the unrestricted submarine edict by Germany. The German object is, by cutting Great Britain off from communication with the outside world, to starve her inhabitants, prevent war supplies from reaching her, prevent her from moving troops freely to and fro outside of her own boundaries, and thus force her to peace.

The British report that their defense forces against this attack of the German submarines have worked havoc among the attackers, but for military reasons decline to give details, stating that in a few days the results will be apparent in the great decrease in the number of the vessels sunk.

The German raider, or raiders, operating in the South Atlantic, whose exploits attracted so much attention a couple of weeks ago, was reported in a cable from Pernambuco, Brazil, to have been sunk in a battle by three British cruisers, one of which was reported to have put into port with her wounded. There has, however, been no confirmation of this cable.

There seems to be belief in quarters competent to judge that a naval battle of importance will take place in the North Sea or thereabouts in the near future, the argument being that the British fleet as one result of the submarine war, will be forced to take the offensive to satisfy the British people, and to attempt to get at the German fleet at any cost.

The only front in which there was any consecutive fighting during the past week was the Mesopotamian. Here the British report a warm fight on February 5 and the capture of 400 yards of Turkish trenches on a front of 650 at the junction of the Hai and Tigris rivers near Kut-el-Amara. By this advance the mouth of the Hai River, opposite Kut, is now said to be under the control of the British artillery. Heavy losses are also stated to have been inflicted upon the Turks as well. This report of the British is, however, denied by the Turks, who state that while the British did momentarily better their positions, they were immediately ejected with a lost of not less than 2,000 men, besides several hundred prisoners who remained in the hands of the Turks.

On the Rumanian front the extremely cold weather continues unabated, with the result that there was no activity of consequence. The Rumanian government charges that the Germans are deporting all male Rumanians between the ages of 16 and 67 into the interior of Germany for internment, and has made a protest to neutral nations.

Parliament was opened on Wednesday, February 7, by the king. The sovereign said in his speech from the throne that the response of the Allies to the President of the United States outlined their aims as far as could be done at present, and that there was no prospect of peace just now.

Toward the end of the week the British made a forward move in the direction of Grandcourt, southwest of Bapaume on the Picardy front, and after an initial gain of a thousand yards on Tuesday, on Wednesday succeeded in occupying the entire village and a defensive work of some importance near it.

The International Situation

Patriotism

By

MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

I saw three patriots the other day;
Each loved his country in a different way.

ONE was a little boy upon the street;
He held a coin clutched tight against his breast.
And he looked cold, and mighty hungry, too;
His face was white, his hands were numb and blue,
And he was rather nondescriptly dressed
In mended rags. And yet his smile was sweet
When he spoke to me:
"Lady, see!" he said;
"A guy he gimme dis here dime terday;
He said 'at I could spend it anyway,
An' so I'll buy a flag ter celebrate
George Washin'ton! Say, lady, ain't dat great!"
And proudly, high, he held his curly head. . .
I saw this little boy upon the street,
And he was cold, and hadn't much to eat.

AND then I saw a soldier, khaki-clad;
And he was young—a slender, handsome lad,
With youth and hope ablaze in his fine eyes;
And he was saying to a friend:
"Who dies
To save his country lives, and lives again!
For what is fear and suffering and pain,
And what is life, when honor is at stake?
The unknown soldier, almost gone, who lies
Upon the battlefield is better far
Than he who pins his faith to some faint star,
And lets his country call to him in vain!"
I saw this soldier, vivid, khaki-clad,
And he was young—a slender, handsome lad.

AND then I saw a man all bent with years,
Who had seen birth and death, and joy and tears;
And he toiled in the slums—a crowded place.
"My work," he said, "is with the human race;
To make them better women, better men;
To make good citizens of bitter ones;
To make them ask for peace, not swords and guns;
And when they have the peace, to keep it. Then
To make them worship God, and love each other;
To be their helper, friend, adviser, brother.
This is my work!"
Ah, he was bent with years,
And he knew death and life, and joy and tears.

I saw three patriots the other day;
Each loved his country in a different way.

NOT since the great war began has America had such an exciting experience as during the first days of February, following immediately on the beginning of Germany's intensified submarine campaign. First came the "break" in diplomatic relations between the two governments, which many regarded as making war inevitable. This feeling was nowise lessened when it was learned that our ambassador in Berlin, Mr. Gerard, was not to leave Germany until safe-conducts for the return of Count von Bernstorff had been satisfactorily arranged. The tension relaxed materially, however, when this difficulty was settled amicably; yet still there was the general apprehension that a real crisis which would plunge us into the struggle might come suddenly in the event of an "overt act" being committed by the U-boats sinking an American vessel or causing the loss of American lives. President Wilson's call to the neutrals (in his address to the Senate) to make common issue with ourselves in protesting against the new submarine campaign did not meet the unanimous response that was expected. The Scandinavian countries held aloof at first, and the South American republics were about evenly divided. It was evident that all dreaded the test and doubted the wisdom of applying it. Fortunately, Germany herself furnished the key to the difficult situation. It was explained, semi-officially, that there had never been any intention of inflicting injury on neutral commerce. Further, there was a very clear intimation that Germany held no hostile feelings toward the United States.

Meanwhile the work of preparation for a warlike emergency goes on without abatement. Great supplies of foodstuffs, which under former conditions would have been exported, are being taken for government use. Work on munitions is being speeded. It is safe to say that the export of such material, for many months to come, will be practically negligible. While it is regarded as possible that the submarine war may bring the actual conflict to our doors any day, the hope is still entertained that the United States may be able to stand clear of actual participation. On February 9 the President and cabinet held a long conference to discuss the situation, and it was practically decided that if war is to come it must be forced by some act of Germany, and not of the United States. The neutral nations are making an effort to avert a serious rupture between the United States and Germany, not by formal protest but through diplomatic pressure, which may help the situation somewhat.

There is a growing impression that the nature and extent of Germany's new submarine campaign has been unduly magnified by popular apprehension. While it has been phenomenally destructive thus far, it is claimed by the British Admiralty that the Allies have been thoroughly prepared to meet and overcome it, and that the number of daily sinkings will steadily diminish. Sea-going commerce will be protected by convoy warships.

Developments Day by Day

February 3

AMERICAN steamer Housatonic, contraband-laden, reported sunk. Ship warned and crew, in boats, towed to safety.

American liner St. Louis, with 5,000 bags of mail, held in port. Sailing later indefinitely postponed.

National Guard of New York State and Naval Militia of New York and Connecticut mobilized and stationed at arsenals, on East River Bridges and along aqueduct lines.

Crews of interned German warships, the prize ship Appam and the Kronprinzessin Cecilie, taken off and the vessels put under guard.

Germany modifies slightly the submarine line in North Sea, giving a wider pathway to Dutch shipping.

Governors and state legislatures, while hoping for peace, support President.

Swiss minister takes over German interests in America. Spanish ambassador at Berlin takes over American interests.

Germany protests to Sweden and Norway against regulations restricting submarines. Relations between Germany and Norway are reported strained.

Navy yards closed to public and yards and army posts securely guarded.

February 4

PRESIDENT notifying neutrals of the break with Germany states that "he believes it will make for the peace of the world if other neutral powers can find it possible to take similar action."

Germany releases seventy-two American members of captured merchant crews.

W. J. Bryan suggests a popular referendum to let the voters decide whether the country shall go to war.

Official estimates show 7,606,000 men in the country between the ages of eighteen and forty-five available for military service, of whom 4,778,050 were thoroughly fit, unmarried men.

Federal agents report the machinery of the Kronprinzessin Cecilie seriously damaged.

Navy yards put on extra shifts to rush work on battleships.

February 5

PRESIDENT WILSON issues a proclamation forbidding the sale, lease, or chartering of any American vessel to any person not an American citizen and the transfer of any American vessel to foreign registry.

American liner St. Paul docks at New York after trip from Liverpool.

President Wilson continues daily conferences with heads of State, War and Navy Departments, directing personally the great work of preparing the nation for any eventuality, while avoiding any preparations that might be considered as a threat of war.

British steamer Eavestone sunk by gun-fire from submarine. Captain and two seamen, one an American negro, reported killed.

February 6

GERMAN government gives categorical assurances that it will not interfere with relief work pending actual war.

United States War Department orders $5,000,000 worth of shells.

Other neutrals refuse to follow lead of United States in breaking with Germany.

House Naval Committee adds $150,000,000 to naval appropriation bill for expediting completion of 113 naval vessels, now under construction, and $1,000,000 for aeronautical equipment, bringing total appropriations of bill to $500,000,000. The bill gives President power to commandeer shipyards and munition plants and to draft employees, and provides for guns to arm merchantmen and for large increases in ammunition.

Brazil forwards note of protest to Germany.

Standard Oil Company recalls oil ships to American ports by wireless.

UNITED STATES SENATE votes approval of President's course, 78 to 5.

British government plans safety zones for neutral ships and warns people to expect restrictions on imports and in the consumption of commodities.

Secretary of State Lansing asks appropriation of $500,000 to assist Americans abroad.

Spain, Argentina and Cuba protest Germany's war zone decree.

United States Minister Egan at Copenhagen reports Ambassador Gerard and other Americans held in Germany as hostages for von Bernstorff and the crews of German ships. Action appears to have been based on incorrect reports of measures taken here to guard vessels and to enforce immigration laws.

Newspapers report machinery of all Teuton ships in American ports damaged by Imperial orders. Machinery, being German-made, could not be repaired in this country.

State Department declares it legal for American merchantmen to mount guns.

British liner California torpedoed, one American in crew saved.

February 8

TOLL of U-boat victims in seven days totals 69 vessels, tonnage 140,053; countries: American 1, other neutrals 23, British 38, other belligerents 7. British steamer Turino reported torpedoed without warning; American negro fireman killed. Forty-one lives, including two American-born children, reported lost on California, which sank in less than ten minutes.

American line decides to arm all liners before sailing.

Uruguay, Peru and Chile protest German barred zone order.

Holland protests against German policy, but refuses to support President Wilson.

Spain declines to break with Germany.

Great Britain and France, at request of American State Department, grant safe conduct for former Ambassador von Bernstorff, his staff, German consuls, their employees and their families, but require vessel carrying them to stop at Halifax, N. S., for examination.

February 9

U-BOATS sink six vessels, four Norwegian, one Spanish and one British. Total tonnage 10,425. Four neutral sailors killed.

Two American freighters clear from New York for Bordeaux with non-contraband cargoes. American tanker sails from Delaware Bay for Rouen.

Officially announced that former Ambassador Gerard and 200 Americans would leave Germany February 10 on a special train for Switzerland. Also that former Ambassador von Bernstorff and his party would sail from New York on February 13 on Scandinavian-American liner Frederick VIII.

Semi-official reports from Washington indicate that government may ask Congress for power to protect American ships by armament and convoy, and that every effort will be made to avoid actual armed conflict.

Looking for the Daybreak

WILL the world be better or worse after the war? is a question which many who have shuddered at the horror and suffering are now asking in all seriousness. After storm, sunshine. Doubtless it will be better. It is the divine plan that this old earth should progress forward, not backward. Already there are indications that it will be a very different world when the cataclysmic hurricane has swept past. The new day will dawn on a race that is even now on the way to find itself, and which, for almost the first time in human history, is finding God. Never was there a time when vast populations so strongly felt the need of God as now. In former days the race, which had rejected him, seemed to have been given over, some to formalism or at best to a lifeless unspiritual worship, and many more to reckless indifference, as though God, if he existed at all, had no interest in the affairs of men. This division left a comparatively small proportion of those who were sincere at heart and loyal in Christian service. Yet there never was a time when there was not a faithful remnant, keeping alive the flame of the Spirit in a world in which so many had been born and lived and died with souls unawakened and dumb—and this within the sound of church bells and the hearing of the Gospel. All through these black years which led up to the great war of nations, the religion of Jesus has been growing. This, too, notwithstanding widespread irreligion, apostasy, surrender to the love of wealth and power, and pleasure, heartlessness, selfishness and greed. All these will be brushed away like cobwebs when the sunlight of divine truth strikes through. Then it will be found that God's faithful remnant has been, in strength and devotion, a mighty multitude; and that the war which is purging the nations will bring them back to Calvary and the crucified Saviour, as the only hope of men. We look forward confidently to the great world-wide revival of religion; indeed, it has already begun. It will bring in, among other blessings, a new and larger statesmanship, in which the divine sovereignty will be recognized; a better sociology, by which human justice will be advanced; a nobler use of wealth, in which riches themselves will cease to be an ultimate object of attainment; and an international kinship, with all hatreds and jealousies forever shut out. In these and manifold more ways will the divine wisdom bring good out of evil, and transform into blessing events which have seemed to be an unmitigated evil. The time is not yet, but it lies in the near future, when men will say, with heart and soul, "God's in his heaven; all's right with the world."

Diplomacy and Common Sense

THERE are various aspects of the international situation since our diplomatic "break" with Germany, which afford ground for hope that a better understanding may not be far off. In the first place, it is becoming more and more evident that Germany did not anticipate the "break" and had no purpose of precipitating it. Then, too, it is also apparent, as Foreign Secretary Zimmermann has publicly declared, that the German government "appreciates the words of non-hostile character which are found in President Wilson's message. . . . We join in this respect with the President's note." In plain terms, neither side wants war, nor up to the present moment does either government see any good and sufficient cause for resorting to it.

Still, there are tangles in the situation which diplomacy seems unequal to the task of unraveling. It is a case of mutual misunderstanding, which many feel honestly convinced would yield more readily to the application of commonsense principles. Assuredly there is no race hatred or deep-rooted animosity between the two nations. By this time Germany must have realized that America's love of peace is founded on deep conviction and high ideals, and that it will not forego these unless it is driven to such a step by the invasion of rights the very nature of which it would be compelled to defend. While a single overt act might bring a real crisis, yet it cannot be forgotten that in several earlier stages of the war the German government modified its course at our firm, yet not unfriendly, request; and it is by no means certain that the American attitude, as the President has presented it, may not even yet result in the modification of the submarine campaign. Besides, we must not overlook the significant fact that it has already been claimed from German sources, since the "break," that the intensified undersea campaign was not aimed at neutrals, but at Germany's enemies. Should that explanation take official form, the solution of the whole question on this issue would be near at hand.

Meanwhile, the struggle drags along on its destructive course. As long as there is even a possibility of this nation becoming involved, the work of preparation will continue. Our militarists are now having their day. The whole country is alive with the hum of war industries, and the forges of Vulcan will be kept busy for many months to come, even if our land should never be a participant in the frightful world struggle.

Wealth or Health?

A PITTSBURG millionaire has broken down at thirty under the strain of the race for wealth, and has been sent to a sanitarium, a hopeless physical and mental wreck.

How many millions had he made? That is the first information in the dispatches. It is the first question that comes to the average mind. But what is the difference to him now whether he had made three millions or thirty millions? The one amount means no more than the other to a man in a madhouse.

The main point is, he made too much. He heaped up what is a huge pile of trash to him now, and in doing it ruthlessly sacrificed the most precious treasures any man can have. The fabled dog crossing a bridge, which dropped his bone to snatch at the shadow of it reflected in the water, has many a parallel among men who sacrifice health and happiness and often manhood for money.

Wealth can mean nothing good to any man if it does not bring him better health, clearer wisdom, a mellower heart and a truer spiritual sense of his place and purpose in life.

Beauty and Homeliness

AN Indiana reader writes to ask: "Can a poor woman whose face is ugly live that kind of Christian life that brings glory and honor to the name of Christ? Does she ever have as much influence over the unregenerate as does the woman of beauty or the woman who, being less beautiful, has a sizable bank account?" Neither ugliness nor beauty is merely physical. Either is largely self-made. The most irregular features become beautified by the glow of kindness and spiritual fervor; the most perfectly formed face may be marred and rendered repulsive by coldness or the scowl of greed, vindictiveness or envy. One of the most famously beautiful women now living is horribly pock-marked. The most attractive, most loved and most influential women of all history have not as a rule been known as beautiful.

The power of mind over matter, of which we hear so much, is as nothing compared with the power of the soul over the face. Mere physical beauty has been vastly overrated by the artists and poets. The man who loves his sweetheart or wife simply because of the symmetry of her form and features, and without sounding the depths within, does not know what true love is. Who thinks of selecting one's friends because of their straight noses? More than that—far more than any outer feature—is essential to friendship worthy of the name. Who does not love a dear old mother, despite perhaps a wart on her nose and wrinkles in her cheeks? A life-long devotion has generated in her a spirit of real beauty that no physical deformity can shut in. Beauty of face and form is a gift of the gods, maybe; but the beauty of soul which illumines and makes lovely the homely face is a far richer gift still, coming from the true God. The answer to each of the questions above is: Yes—plus.

A Word About Letters

AN editor's daily mail is a wonderful budget of life experiences. Good people have a way of writing their thoughts that the world knows little about. They put their hearts into their letters, and establish a relationship that is at once intimate and mutually helpful. A stream of cheer and comfort runs through all and a stimulation to noble enterprises. Letter-writing of this kind is a sort of privileged testimony that cannot be held too highly. Indeed, many of the letters express the language of the soul in a way that is impossible by any other means. They discuss great world themes, domestic problems, questions of help, of personal conduct, belief and right living, and are all presented and passed upon in a way that makes the letters seem like an ever changing kaleidoscope.

The Christian Herald is peculiarly fortunate in having for its correspondents men and women who are, in the main, sincere believers, and who feel strongly the call to Christian service. Whether their sphere of labor be in the home, in business, or half-way across the world, they have the desire to be up and doing something that will aid in the advancement of the Kingdom. They have learned and put into use many of the great lessons of practical Christianity and, in a humble and unostentatious way, are giving their best for the sake of others. And many of them are soul-winners, too, with an experience in service which the world may never know, but which is, to themselves at least, one of the greatest of privileges. There are thousands of them who belong to the great Christian "Good Samaritan" army and who are constantly reaching out helping hands to those in need. We have many times felt a thrill of admiration at the splendid generosity of some of these letter-writers, who from their own very limited means have given far more largely in proportion than many who, from their affluence, have donated thousands.

These are some of the reasons why the daily perusal of our mail is seldom without its inspiration and cheer. These letters form the intimate and friendly link that unites the editor and his readers. And here let us add the wish that the chain may keep on growing. We welcome them all, and find a satisfaction in reading them, although the labor is by no means a light one. If sometimes we are hard driven to answer all as we would wish, we assure our friends that it is not because of the lack of desire, but simply that there is not sufficient time in the daily round of the clock.

The Lenten Season

DURING the forty days of Lent preceding Easter, the Christian world commemorates Christ's fasting and temptation in the wilderness, and in the closing Passion Week, his sufferings and death. The history of the Lenten season reaches back to the third century, when it was instituted by the Greek, Roman and Oriental churches. Today it is observed by nearly all Protestant bodies.

Some people in the past have erred by making this solemn occasion a time for social affairs, charity matters, money-raising events; almost everything except the prayer and praise, the meditation and reflection, the self-examination and reconsecration so appropriate in this period of holy worship.

In the busy whirl of life, is it not beautiful to partake of these Lenten services? Here we walk with him in closer company and communion, that we may see light in his light, have less of self and more of him, and cry, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits?"

Many churches look forward to this period as a revival season for the deepening of the spiritual life and for the ingathering of souls to the Master. Should it not be a time for fasting in regard to temporalities and feasting in spiritualities, of self-denial and self-consecration, of plain living and high thinking? The very duties and denials required of Christians during this solemn season will not only aid each individual church in special services, but will be a grand preparation for the Billy Sunday tabernacle meetings. Is not this practical Christianity, living to help others, to lift up Christ to men and to humiliate self? Self-denial of food, of amusements and luxurious ease will not only be a blessing to the individual but to the cause of general Christianity. When we commemorate our Saviour's sacrifice for mankind, we should become examples of that same spirit to the world.

Living by Giving

IMAGINE a rose that would say to itself, "I cannot afford to give away my beauty and sweetness; I must keep it for myself. I will roll up my petals and withhold my fragrance."

That rose could not function; it could have no beauty or fragrance for itself; it would die within itself.

So human selfishness defeats its own ends. He who refuses to give of himself to others, who closes up the sweetness of his charity and refuses to unfold the fragrance of his sympathy and love, must soon find that he loses the very things he tries to keep. The springs of his manhood dry up. His finer nature becomes atrophied. He grows deaf to the cries for help from his fellow beings. Tears that never are shed for others' woes sour to stinging acids in his own heart.

The rose that does not open its beauty and fragrance denies itself the life-giving sun. It is the same with us. But the moment we open wider the door of our lives and, like the healthy rose, send out without stint our fragrance and beauty upon every passerby, we let the sunshine of life into our own souls.

Pyrenees Park Planned

THE French and Spanish governments are to be asked to cooperate in the establishment in the Pyrenees Mountains of an international park similar to the Yellowstone. The project is in the hands of a committee under the presidency of Prince Albert of Monaco, which includes Prince Roland Bonaparte and the Marquis de Villaviciosa, a Spanish senator. Senator Villaviciosa has introduced in the Cortes the legislation necessary for the Spanish participation, and committees have been appointed to draw up a measure to be submitted to the French parliament. It is the purpose of the committee to have the great park also a vast hunting-ground. It would be possible in its limits to acclimate all the wild game of Europe. Both Prince Roland and Prince Albert are widely known for their scientific researches. Prince Roland is president of the French Geographical Society and a member of the French Academy of Sciences. He is the author of eighty scientific works on botany, geology, geography, and the zoology of the seas. His discoveries in plant life have become known throughout the world. Prince Albert is best known for his exploration of the deep seas, in which he has been engaged for the past twenty-five years. He is the founder of the Museum of Oceanography at Monaco and of the Oceanographical Institute of Paris. The new park under the direction of such men will at once become one of the great pleasure and play places of the world. It is well for nations to think of something else besides making money, and to set apart a park which God has made in his glorious mountains for the recreation, health, happiness, and instruction of the people, rich and poor, high and low. Saul selected a natural mountain park as the place of his residence. "Saul abode in Gibeah under a tree in Ramah." (I Sam. 22 : 6.)

Pipe-Line Across Ocean

THE Popular Mechanics magazine for February tells of the proposition of an Irishman to lay an oil pipe-line across the Atlantic, connecting the British Isles and America. The tube is to be flexible, made of steel ribbon 18 inches in diameter, able to withstand an internal pressure of 2,000 pounds and an external pressure of 10,000 pounds per square inch. The venture involves an expense of $50,000,000, and its author claims the cost of transportation would be reduced from $50 per 1,000 gallons of oil to 50 cents for the same quantity. Man's mastery over nature, now so rapidly increasing, is thus expressed: "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet." (Ps. 8 : 6.)

Dove Flew Into Church

A DOVE flew through an open window into the Madison Avenue (New York) Baptist church one Sunday morning recently, perched upon the rail in the choir loft for a few moments, and then flew back over the congregation to a cornice of the window and remained there quietly till the end of the sermon. Dr. Charles A. Eaton, the pastor, was preaching when the bird made its entrance into the audience room. The flutter of the dove made somewhat of a flutter in the congregation. Dr. Eaton paused in his sermon and said he hoped the bird would remain to be an omen of the days that may soon come to the tortured peoples of Europe, and the Christian world says amen to the sentiment expressed by him. The dove is the symbol of the Holy Ghost coming into the church to attest Christ's Messiahship and bring a peace which passeth understanding. Jesus saw this symbol. "And he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him." (Matt. 3 : 16.)

More Prohibition Legislation

THE prophecy of speedy action on the prohibition question by a number of state legislatures has been verified. Last week the Indiana Assembly passed a statutory prohibitory bill by a majority of about two to one. The bill passed the Senate, Feb. 2 by a vote of 38 to 11. One of the most remarkable dry victories was that in Wyoming a few days ago, where the assembly suspended the rules and passed a prohibition referendum bill without an opposing vote, and the Senate also suspended the rules and passed the same bill without opposition. The bill then went to Governor J. B. Kendrick, who immediately signed it. Whoever heard of such a thing? Not a member who would raise his voice or vote against the measure. This bill sends the question to the people, to be voted upon in 1918, to take effect January 1, 1920. The liquor people were very proud of Wyoming, and often boasted that she remained wet when her sister states went dry. It is said that as a wet state it is worth $25,000,000 a year to the liquor traffic. This is liquor's last stand in the north-central Rocky Mountain region. Colorado, Washington, Oregon, Montana, Idaho, North and South Dakota and Nebraska are all dry, and Utah will soon join them. As sixty per cent. of the voters of Wyoming are women, there is little doubt that prohibition will be written into the constitution at the election of next year. The United States Senate on January 31 passed a bone dry law for Alaska without a roll-call, in harmony with the action of the territory in voting for a drastic prohibitory law by a majority of between two and three to one. The House of Representatives will follow the action of the Senate. In planting fruits and sowing grain to secure a poison for the body, mind and soul, the states are realizing that for them as well as for individuals it is true that "he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption." (Gal. 6 : 8.)

Diet Squad's Successful Experiment

ON January 29, Police Commissioner Woods's 25-cents-a-day diet squad ended their three weeks' food demonstration with eleven out of the twelve "rookies" showing gains in weight. The experiment was under the direction of the Life Extension Institute, and began January 8. The test was to demonstrate the fact that a person may live healthfully and properly and comfortably on twenty-five cents a day for three meals. A dollar a day would furnish food for five hard-working grown people. None of the twelve men lost weight. One just held his weight at 195 pounds; all the rest gained, in the aggregate, 29½ pounds. This is the menu for the last day, a good sample of the other twenty. Breakfast cost 7 cents: 870 calories—hominy and milk, buttered toast, coffee with milk. Luncheon cost 8 cents: 1,975 calories—split pea soup, toasted crackers, whole-wheat bread and butter, baked bananas, salted peanuts, tea with milk. Dinner cost 10 cents: 1,055 calories—codfish cakes, tomato sauce, graham bread and butter, fruit shortcake, tea with milk. Commissioner Woods announced that a pamphlet containing the menus for the three weeks had been prepared for the benefit of the public. This is an experiment that carried with it great importance and will do an immense amount of practical good. So many throw away their money on food that does not build up strength and life, and do so through ignorance of the laws of nutrition. The economical and intelligent housekeeper can buy a dollar and a quarter's worth of food for a dollar, and the ignorant or extravagant one will get only 75 cents' worth for her dollar. There was a diet squad of four Hebrew young men who had a test that lasted ten days. The test was on a simple bill of fare which the royal overseer said would make them lean and put them in disfavor with the king. This is the result: "At the end of ten days their countenances appeared fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat the portion of the king's meat." (Dan. 1 : 15.)

Acres Cultivated for God

SOME time ago the question of raising a fund to pay off the indebtedness of a North Carolina Christian college, was being discussed by laymen of the denomination, when Mr. Stubbs, a farmer living near Belhaven, proposed that the farmers living in that region and city people owning farms in the country should set apart an acre of ground for special cultivation for the benefit of the college debt for one year. He himself set the example, and others followed in quick succession, till a large number have crops of grain, cotton, and garden vegetables started or in contemplation for the college fund. This is an excellent idea. The gifts will substantially reduce the college debt. Many of the farmers of the country are Christian men who count all their land God's acres and cultivate them for their families, their fellow men, and their Divine Master. God's ownership of the world is thus expressed: "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. . . . For the world is mine, and the fulness thereof." (Ps. 50 : 10, 12.)

Living Death 41 Years

JESSE POMEROY, who for forty-one years was in solitary confinement in the state prison at Charlestown, Mass., was the other day granted equal privileges with other prisoners by the State Executive Council. When a boy of only fifteen he murdered two children. He was sentenced to be hanged, but because of his youth the sentence was commuted to solitary imprisonment for life. On September 7, 1876, he was locked up in a cell lighted from a window in the ceiling, so that he might not gaze on his fellow men. He was exercised apart from other prisoners, and barred as far as possible from human companionship. Two years ago the sentence was enforced less rigorously to accord with modern ideas of prison reform. He was allowed to attend church services twice on Sunday, sitting apart from the other men. Now, at the age of fifty-seven years, Pomeroy will move into a cell where he can see passers-by, will be allowed to exercise with other prisoners and sit with them at the church services and at the prison entertainments, and will be given such light work in the prison shops as his somewhat enfeebled health will permit. Many people who are over fifty remember the terrible deeds of the Pomeroy boy. His treatment by the state has been diabolical. To shut a boy up away from the faces of his fellows and from work is perdition itself. No wonder the man is an invalid; the wonder is he is not dead. The present treatment of the prisoner is in keeping with the advanced spirit of the times. If the tragedy had occurred in our time it is likely that the boy Pomeroy would have been sent to the insane asylum or to some prison with reformatory influences surrounding him. We have no apology for crime, nor for its just punishment. But the cruel treatment of prisoners in the past, and the harsh feeling the public holds against them, is wrong, and at right angles to that of Jesus, who said that kind treatment of the prisoner was kind treatment of himself. "I was a stranger, and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me." (Matt. 25 : 35, 36.)

Finds Prehistoric Pictures

RELICS of extensive settlements of a prehistoric race of civilized Indians, who built dams and irrigated desert lands in the southwest corner of New Mexico, have recently been found by Ranger Dow S. Sullivan, who reported the discovery to the forestry headquarters at Tucson, Ariz. The report has been forwarded to the American Archeological Association. Picture writings with representations of animals were found on a crude paper and on the walls of caves. Ranger Sullivan believes the settlements were the original dwellings of the Aztec race. Science with the spade, uncovering the utensils, homes, language and pictures of the generations of the dim past, is only copying the attribute of the Deity thus referred to: "The thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light." (Job 28 : 11.)

SECOND BIBLE PICTURE STUDY

Why the Study Will Mean So Much to You

YOU love your Bible. You are interested in our Christian Herald with its Bible background. Yet often you and "the folks" could have spent your hours of recreation so much more profitably if you could only have discovered some Bible pastime that was highly instructive and inspiring as well as enjoyable.

Everybody is busy today—you, and we, and our brothers and sisters. We all do the things which interest us the most, and which are often those which do least good.

"Seek and Ye Shall Find"

The question which naturally arises is this: "How can I spend my evenings most profitably? I want something to do which is entertaining as well as uplifting. I love to read my Bible, but at times I need something like a story or a game to give me relaxation."

The Second Bible Picture Study fills this need.

"Working out the answers has been a six months' treat of a most fascinating kind," wrote John F. Roth of Lititz, Pa., of our last year's Study.

A Joy and a Profit

Yes, it's the joy of it—the joy of choosing precious verses from the Bible to correspond with the pictures we print in each Christian Herald issue,—which makes Bible Picture Study the pastime you are seeking. It is fascinating. It is inspiring. It is uplifting.

It adds a new interest to the Bible, which makes the Study even more entertaining than a story, or the "movies," or a game.

Indeed, it is a treat; and more than that, a profit. Last year hundreds of cash rewards were awarded for good work on the Study. This year one thousand participants will be rewarded. Think of it!

$1,000 in Gold as First Reward

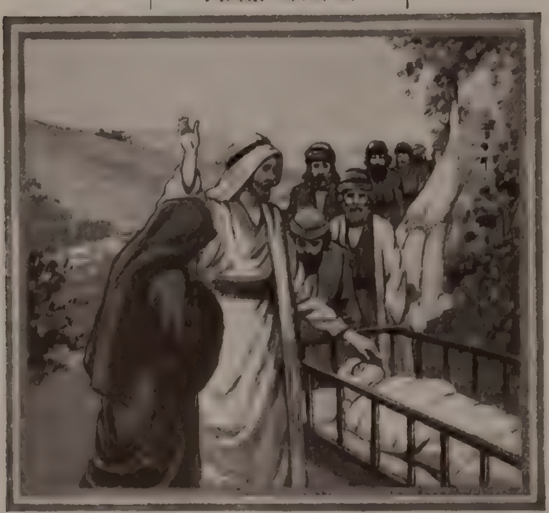
A large amount, this! Yet, when we tell you that the second reward is $800; and the third, $600; and the fourth, $400; and that $5,628 will be distributed to successful participants in the Study, you can begin to realize that it happily combines profit, pleasure, and helpfulness.

A Lasting Blessing

The moments you spend solving the Bible Picture Study will most assuredly leave their indelible impress on your life. To make the memory of God's verses even more lasting, the fact that you must write the ones you select in the "Answer Book," which, with "Pearls from the Bible," comprises the complete Outfit, will act as an additional means of impressing them on your mind.

Our message to you about the Study is just as if we were offering you the key to some vast store-house of wealth. Only in this instance, disregarding the material cash emoluments, which are large, we are handing you the key to richer mental and spiritual rewards.

Picture No. 11



A Challenge to Skill

Three new pictures in the Study are given below. In themselves as pictures they are interesting. As a matter of fact, the collection of sixty pictures in the first Study is well worth having just as a gallery of Bible scenes, and so will those of this Study be. But as an incentive to search the Scriptures, do you not think these pictures excellent? What a challenge these pictures make to you to open "Pearls From the Bible," go through the collection of verses and put your finger upon the ones which fit such scenes! And how unforgetably will the passages themselves be fixed in your memory by the process.

You will quickly discover as you enter the study, that expert Bible knowledge gives no one advantage over you. The pictures are clear, the verses are plain: show your skill by fitting the best verses to the pictures.

Sixty Times Better

Now, picture to yourself the spiritual enlightenment, the increased Bible knowledge that sixty such pictures will bring. Add to this the entertainment of selecting Bible verses from a collection of 2,000 prophecies, precepts and promises culled from the Old and New Testaments. "Pearls from the Bible" we call this collection—and for your convenience we offer it in book form of a convenient size. It will form a treasured keepsake, too, after you have completed the study.

The Power of Pictures

Pictures are always fascinating. Before the child can read, or even lisp its first few words, pictures hold its attention. All through its precious little life, on until "the winter of old age," pictures are dear to its heart. How splendid a scheme, then, was evolved in planning this Bible Picture Study, which combines the fascination of pictures, the zest of competition and the quickening influence of the Bible in one grand purpose!

Become Sensibly Ambitious

There are various reasons why the Christian Herald Bible Picture Study will make you more ambitious. Not abnormally zealous, but rationally so.

The very system of the Study will inspire you toward making greater advancement in the knowledge of God's Word. There are many verses which contain divine promises. You will come to a better realization of the happiness and tranquillity that await you in the Life Beyond.

Your thoughts of the future will be more lovely than they have ever been before.

Overcome Nervousness and Worry

These are mental conditions usually due to causes that can be cured by gentle treatment, such as pleasant and inspirational yet non-exciting routine.

The Bible Picture Study is purposed to give tranquillity to the mind. The nerves become calmer through the charm of the teachings in the chosen verses, and the placidity of the simple formulary by which the Study is conducted.

Our Study makes for an attunement with the Infinite, a sweet harmony that brings the brain—and indirectly the nerves—into a reposeful and serene mood.

Simple Entrance Requirements Open to All

The Study is open to any man, woman or child, and will give to all who participate in it a greater knowledge of the Bible.

How to Obtain the Outfit

1. Free with a NEW 6 Months' Subscription

The complete Outfit for convenient participation in the Second Bible Picture Study, consisting of "Pearls from the Bible," the Answer Book and all the pictures (back pictures are sent you free when you order the Outfit), may be secured by any subscriber who sends in one new six months' subscription to the Christian Herald, accompanied by the regular price of $1.00. You may secure this subscription from some friend or neighbor who will pay the dollar, or you may give the subscription as a present to a friend or neighbor, and yourself forward the dollar. The Christian Herald will be a welcome guest in any home, and it may accomplish much good in bringing a Christian influence where now not enough thought is taken of the spiritual side of life.

2. With a Year's Subscription

Or you may send your own subscription for one year, enclosing $2.35, and thus at little extra cost you will secure the complete Outfit. If the subscription is a renewal, the date of expiration will be extended one year.

Whichever way you wish to enter the Study, you can use the Order Form herewith.

Prospectus Mailed Free

The Prospectus, giving more detailed information about the Christian Herald Second Bible Picture Study, will be mailed free on request. Ask for the Bible Picture Study Prospectus. You can also compete without expense, as explained in the Rules, which will also be sent upon request. Address: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City, N. Y.

The Transformation of Chadani San

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

THE adventurous days of missionarying are rapidly passing. The great adventure of the pioneer days is giving way to the time schedule of the efficiency committee. The missionary inheritance has been an ideal. It may become a set of charts. Change in missionary methods is as inevitable as was the disappearance of the cowboy of the old days or the gold-seekers of '49 before the advance of the cultured and pleasant homes of Los Angeles, Point Loma or Colorado Springs. The old days are past. The problem is to do as much good with an automobile as was done with a bullock, hitched to a cart.

Passion for souls does not distinguish every missionary today. I was refused the privilege of living in a school dormitory in China on the ground that I could not stand it, though I had spent three years in the same building with hundreds of Levantine students, many of whom considered my room as theirs. The missionary candidate is becoming sophisticated. He knows that the amount of sacrifice in the missionary life is mighty small when afternoon tea is the event of the day. In Tokyo, Shanghai, Seoul and Peking, the missionary communities are large and congenial to any cultured person, and in Beirut, before the ravages of war had proven the willingness and ability of every missionary to be a sacrificing hero when the need came, life was the most enjoyable I have ever known.

It is my confident belief that in all the world of present-day missionary endeavor there is no such opportunity for helpfulness and Christian influence as that of the three-year man or woman who sleeps, eats, bathes, thinks, plays and suffers with his or her students. No married man can so touch so many lives. No older missionary can so enter into the lives of those among whom he works as can the young college graduate whose preachment is a wholesome life and whose language is a smile. He dreams little, has few plans for soul salvation and buttons his collar in front; but he is a dynamic for righteousness, applied at the source of national strength, in whatever country he serves.

William Merrell Vories is an ordinary, matter-of-fact American who is doing wonderful things for God for two reasons. He believes in God and he lives with those he hopes to help. His big job is soul-winning, and at that he is a success. Eleven years ago he was a humble Y. M. C. A. teacher, tucked away in an obscure hamlet. Today he heads a group of forty workers who are carrying the Gospel of divine love to an entire province. There is nothing long-faced about him. He not only has a sense of humor, but he also has a supreme joy in living. The story of his work, "A Mustard Seed in Japan," has gone into a second edition because it is one of the most honest and human stories of present-day missionary endeavor. It is a racy story of a manly fight that has been won.

Vories went out, eleven years ago, to the loneliest spot in Japan. He did not know the language. There was no foreign community to feed him cake and pour his tea. He was lonely and he opened his home to his students. He soon had three hundred "heathen" in his Bible classes. Opposition arose, and he was ignominiously dropped for being a Christian who practiced and preached.

He had won several young men to Christ, and felt that he could not desert them. He was in disgrace in a city where he had to fight alone—except for his greatest Friend. They won! Last month he had a visit from two of the nobility of Japan, on their first trip to the little lakeside city of Hachiman. He converted Niles, the aviator, to missions and made him a force for righteousness and purity among the people, who admired his nerve. Niles and Art Smith were two missionaries to Japan who were worth while.

Vories had studied architecture, and that had to pay the support of his work. At present he has contracts to build several large houses for rich Japanese, and the mission he has founded could go on as it is without a cent of contributions, most of which go to an extension of the work. He not only loves the Japanese; he associates with them. Two live in his own home with his father and mother, the latter the sweetest lady—but one—that ever put a knee in a pair of trousers, or wrote love into letters to a big family of needy "sons." In a score of centers, young Japanese Christians are living straight because a white-haired woman gives her time to writing letters instead of pouring tea.

Japanese temples are houses of merchandise. Sleight of hand brings Buddha's blessing on a medicine

Japan is rapidly becoming dotted with buildings which will some day stand as monuments to Mr. Vories. He is not a great architect, but he is a good one, and many of the best Christian buildings in Japan were built by him.

The fact that members of other missions practically supported him through the trying early days has not kept him from writing some very pointed criticisms on missionaries for herding in "strategic centers" and leaving rural Japan to the devil and the Buddhist priests. With 1,616 square miles and 700,000 souls under his direction, he feels that those who do petty tasks in herds are losing their Christian lives in an attempt to save them.

In many missions, though not as much in Japan as in other lands, the foreign missionaries decide what shall be done, and then call in the native workers and have them approve the finished plans. That is not the Omi Mission way. Vories directs a large mission, a large architectural work, much personal work among the Japanese, and writes very bright articles in his mission publication and other periodicals, but he has little in common with that tragic hero, "The Man Who Would Be It." God is "It" in everything Vories does, and the Japanese helpers are copartners with the two leading members of the firm. Vories is great because he is willing to be the junior partner in a scheme for advancing the Kingdom of God.

Ten years ago penniless and disgraced, what has he today? A motor-boat on Lake Biwa, with a sturdy Christian Princeton man as captain, to convey the evangelist to remote districts of the province, unreached by railroads. A big and rapidly increasing architectural work, with nearly a score on the staff, who work in an office where the eight-hour day, the Saturday half-holiday and the Sunday of rest are enforced in the busiest seasons. A large woman's work, directed by the wives of the workers, American and Japanese. An industrial department that is a Christian agency and not a means of competition with some other mission, or a step toward a more attractive report of results. Two Y. M. C. A. buildings for students and railway men, situated in places of need and influence. A farm, where candidates for missionary work dig ditches and fertilize fields before they are called as reapers of the Christian harvest. A tuberculosis sanitarium, much needed in Japan, and an example of the tendency of Christian institutions to save lives as well as souls. Two publications in English and Japanese, and Newspaper Evangelism, directed by the capable Japanese partner, Mr. E. V. Yoshida, who did several years' educational work in America in sixteen months, and is regarded as one of the most promising young Christian leaders in Japan.

Vories is an executive, definitely given for service to the Master he has chosen to follow. He regards prayer as an aid to Christian work. His trust in God is simple and sincere. But since most readers of mission literature nowadays expect romance, I will relate briefly what to me is a most remarkable story of a twice-born man who at an early age was already broken earthen-ware.

Across the narrowest part of central Japan and almost dividing the mainland in two islands, lies beautiful Lake Biwa, its blue waters surrounded by green hills that blush with scarlet or tan with russet at the first frost. Thousands of wild ducks make this big lake their home, where they are protected by the game laws so that they rise in clouds, a stone's throw from the little motor boat, which is called Galilee Maru, from the resemblance of blue Biwa to "blue Galilee." Outside the Hachiman headlands, where heathen temples are the center for some of the wildest fanaticism and superstition of the whole empire, and where the annual festivals are as barbaric as savage orgies, there lies a small island, whose few hundred inhabitants have the tradition that he who leaves will come to a bad end. The result is that intermarriages and mixed family relationships are the rule.

Here lived a young Buddhist priest, who would some day become a leader of the great family of seven hundred relatives. His insight into life in Buddhist schools had left him with a taste for gilded palaces of revelry and a disrespect for his theological professor, who was a prominent patron of the pervasive underworld of Japan.

Then the Galilee Maru came to the little island, and the workers, who seek out prominent Buddhist leaders to prevent avoidable hostility, sought Chadani San in his temple home. The story of how he came to live with Mr. Vories and was taken to see all the features of the latter's Christian activities is told at length in a stirring tale entitled, "From Buddhist Priest to Christian Evangelist;" but the fact is that he was received as a friend and equal by this Christian worker, accompanied him on his tours of inspection, slept in the same room with him, and after some weeks of this experience could find no fault in his new-found friend.

They went together to Kyoto, where Mr. Vories was invited to accompany his friend to the temple of his uncle, going as a foreign architect into the center of Buddhist influence.

The Idols That Call Men

By REV. EDGAR DeWITT JONES, D.D.[*]

TEXT—Deut. 12 : 13. "Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt offerings in every place that thou seest."

THE children of Israel were about to enter the promised land, after forty years' wanderings along the wilderness way. A new generation was soon to enjoy the fruition of their fathers' hopes. Picture their expectancy and with what great joy they prepared to enter into the land flowing with milk and honey. But there were perils confronting them: they were going among an alien people—worshipers not of Jehovah. There would be shrines and altars along the way, and the temptation to turn aside and offer sacrifice at these altars would be subtle and difficult to resist. Thus the counsel of their great Leader, "Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt offerings in every place that thou seest."

How elemental, and how alike, are certain temptations of mankind! The Israelitish host, in point of time, is far removed from us; and yet the lure of the wayside altar still entices, and multitudes are led astray.

In this solemn exhortation is seen God's agelong protest against idolatry. A book has been written entitled "Jehovah's War Against False Gods," tracing this ceaseless conflict. It was the wayside shrine which finally overcame the Israelitish people and carried them into Babylonian captivity. It was the wayside altar that led King Solomon's feet down the slippery path.

WHAT is idolatry? Is it merely the worshiping of graven images? Alas! many define idolatry in this limited sense. Who of us has not seen the ugly little idols exhibited by missionaries home on furlough from their field in India, China, or Japan? Seated in our comfortable pews, we view the gods of stone and wood superciliously, and pity the poor, benighted men and women who worship such impotent deities.

But what if we should put our own idols on exhibition? The things that come between us and the worship of the Highest—the things we trust in more than God—if our idols were on exhibition, could we be proud of them? And between our idols and the images of brass and stone of the poor heathen, is there any difference?

What a man trusts in, that is his god; what a man gives his best to, that is his deity. The warning of John the Beloved is as timely now as when nineteen centuries ago he wrote, "Little children, guard yourselves from idols."

The wayside altar is especially alluring to the young. The buoyancy of youth—the overplus of energy—seeks numerous outlets for expression. The spirit of adventure is rampant in adolescence. Every normal boy is a miniature Columbus, ever setting out on new voyages of discovery. One wonders if there ever were so many wayside altars to tempt the young as in our own day. Whichever way the youthful pilgrim looks he sees, festooned and garlanded, the wayside shrine; he hears the soft and seductive music; his nostrils dilate with the perfume of incense burning on alien altars.

The temptation to dissipate energy and squander talent is exceeding strong and subtle. That word "squander" has a history. Its root is another word which means "to splash." The idea of waste and frittering is in it. How numerous the prodigals! And the name of the "splashers" is legion. It may be right to cast all one's irons into the fire; it depends on the nature of the fire. But it is never right to cast them into several fires: the shovels in one, the tongs in another, the poker in still another. Versatility is not always a virtue. Lowell, referring once to the poet Wordsworth's prolific output in poetry, said, "He sometimes made Jove's eagle do the service of a clucking hen."

SOME years ago a minister began his work with glowing prospects of a brilliant career. His friends saw in him the slumbering fires of extraordinary pulpit ability. Their hopes were buoyant for his success. His first year's ministry confirmed their hopes. Subsequent years blasted them rudely. Wayside shrines led the young minister away from the path of highest success in his chosen cause. He was obsessed with a passion for versatility; he became a banker, farmer, lawyer, and county school superintendent; and in so doing the business of preaching came to be incidental. True, he is a useful citizen and a good man. But when the wayside shrine won him the church lost a prophet, while commerce, agriculture, and the school gained only an average worker.

"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," assumes that the task be worth while. "Covet earnestly the best gifts," was the counsel of that great soul whose motto was, "One thing I do." The same lofty spirit exhorted the Philippian Christians to approve "things that are excellent, that ye may be sincere and without offense till the day of Christ."

It is Jesus Christ who gives us the supreme example of One who was never led astray by the wayside shrine. He who said, "The first commandment is, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy mind, and with all thy soul," exemplified in daily conduct that which he taught. Many were the shrines that tempted him. Twenty years of his life were shrouded in silence. That was the period of his beautiful, buoyant youth. In his native town of Nazareth were wayside shrines that sought to woo him from the way of holiness. But in vain! At the Jordan River, when he identified himself with sinful humanity by partaking of an ordinance that symbolizes the putting away of sin, the heavenly Father approved the years of silence when he said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." During his three years' ministry he walked the rugged way to the one altar, and on Calvary offered his unblemished life holy and acceptable unto God. He has become our Altar, whereupon we ought to pour out, with superb abandon, life's sacramental wine. Whosoever looks upon him—Author and Perfecter of our faith—will overcome the lure of the wayside shrine.

IT is related that a little girl was converted during a revival and became a Christian. A little while afterward she related her experience. She said, "As the preacher was preaching, he said, 'Look,' and I looked." "And what then?" asked the minister. "Why, I looked again to Jesus." "And what then?" "Why," said the little girl, "I looked again." "What then?" "Why, don't you know?" said the little girl; "I looked again." "And what was the end?" questioned the minister, who wished to know if her foundation was good. Then the little maid, out of the fulness of her heart, said, "I just looked until the Lord became precious to my heart."

Ah! there is the secret of offering our best on the best altar. By study of God's Word, by prayer, by reflection, by faithful attendance at the House of God, by active and continual service in the daily ministrations that Christ taught, we shall look on him so continuously that by and by the Lord will become precious to our hearts.

"The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be,
Help me to tear it from thy throne,
And worship only thee."

HEBREWS II:X

By WILLARD PARKER

SCARRED is my face, O Captain!
Begrimed with battle smoke;
The armor that once shone so bright
Is bruised by foeman's stroke.

My eye is dimmed, O Captain!
My breath a fleeting gasp;
Of my good sword the hilt alone
Remains within my grasp.

I'VE fought the fight, O Captain!
No laurels crown my brow;
Perchance I've won, perchance I've lost;
Yet I salute thee now.

I crave no boon, O Captain,
Save one glance at thy face,
And that my head upon thine arm
May rest one breathing-space.

BIND up my wounds, O Captain!
Thy touch alone will heal;
Renew my armor, hacked and dimmed;
Restore my sword of steel.

Then, armed afresh, my Captain,
Thy blessing give anew;
And send me forth to fight once more—
Once more thy work to do.

The Accepted Thorn

SUNDAY, February 25. II Cor. 12 : 8. "I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me. And he said, My grace is sufficient for thee." Let me give a short quotation from "The Mill on the Floss," which I think brings one little ray of light to dark experience. It is from the page which tells of Luke's effort to comfort the paralyzed miller. "Help me down, Luke, I'll go and see everything," said Mr. Tulliver, leaning on his stick, and stretching out his hand toward Luke. "Ay, sir," said Luke, as he gave his arm to his master, "you'll make your mind up to it a bit better when you've seen everything: you'll get used to it. That's what my mother says about her shortness of breath: she says she's made friends wi't now, though she fought agin it sore when it fust come on."

That is one of the great secrets in life—to make friends of our infirmities. If we fight them they are very masterful. If we accept them they have a strange way of leading us to surprises of compensation which the Lord has hid in his marvelous mines. I wonder how much of the later and richer revelations in the letters of the apostle Paul might be traced to his acceptance of the thorn, and to his making friends with his sore infirmity. I cannot but think that the acceptance of the thorn made his spirit more largely receptive of grace. Who can tell, therefore, what immediate relationships there may have been between his thorn and his revelations, between the accepted pain and the marvelous panoramas of spiritual glory which the Lord unveiled to his soul?

And as it is with infirmity so it is with all the forms of commonplace service. If we fight our sorrows they add a cubit to their stature. Our antagonism feeds them. They suck their vigor from our resentment. And as they grow bigger in our eyes they tend to make us bitter, and bitterness has very deadly issues. For when we become bitter we lose our power to see anything in its natural and appointed color. Everything is misinterpreted. Everything is draped in robes of our own weaving. We disguise it, and then we dislike it, and so we fill our world with unwelcome things. Sorrow, which is resented, assumes command of everything. On the other hand, accepted sorrow sweetens everything, for the surrendered will becomes the channel of grace.

But the acceptance must not be an act of despair, a surrender to the hands of cold and indifferent Fate. It must be an act of faith, a surrender to the gracious hands of the living God. We must accept our sorrow at his hands, and when the acceptance is made the sorrow is transfigured. "If this cup may not pass from me, except I drink it, thy will be done." . . . And there appeared an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him. J. H. J.

Lead Me to the Rock

MONDAY, February 26. Ps. 61 : 2. "From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee when my heart is overwhelmed: lead me to the rock that is higher than I." Troubles are of various kinds. Some merely buzz around our ears like harmless but annoying gnats. Others sting us like mosquitos. Others, like dogs, bite us. Others strike us like thunderbolts. And still others overwhelm us, take us off our feet, sweep us from our moorings, and threaten to engulf us in utter ruin.

This is a cry out of the midst of the storm. Waves and billows had gone over this man. But he remembered that they were God's waves and God's billows, after all, and so he clung to God in the darkness. God is near, even though we be at the earth's end. There is a Rock in the sea. Isaiah calls it the Rock of Ages.

"Sweet are the uses of adversity" when adversity awakens us to our need of God, when it humbles us, softens our hard hearts, and teaches us how to pray. The proud heart may say, "I never worshiped God in prosperity, and I scorn to take refuge in him in the day of adversity." Shall our poor pride defeat the purpose of God? Our extremity is his opportunity. Not until the staff upon which we have leaned breaks, and perhaps pierces the hand that held it, are we quite ready to trust him, and say, "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." C. C. A.

The Joy of Church-Going

TUESDAY, February 27. Ps. 84 : 1, 2. "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." This strain of the temple-choir in ancient Israel has been taken up by later ages. It has not always been to a magnificent structure like Solomon's temple that souls have been drawn with intense longing; even a rude shanty-like meeting-house on the edge of a forest has seemed very precious, provided only the living God could be found there by a heart that felt homeless in a strange world. Architectural beauty, splendid appointments, a pompous service do not constitute the real attraction of a church. The eye can be dazzled, and the ear tickled, and the imagination filled with material grandeur and appeals to the senses; but these may be mere physical delights that leave the soul empty and hungering. When a churchgoer finds himself humming "My church, my church, my dear old church!" as his thoughts revert to his place of worship, and when he feels something like a lover's expectancy in his heart as he thinks of the coming Sunday, we may rest assured that a more powerful magnet is drawing him than an artistically furnished room, a wealth of melody, an interesting speaker, or respectable company.

The soul is at rest and satisfied with peace and happiness only when returning to God from whom it came. Where the true God is revealed to men, where his word is proclaimed, his wonderful works extolled—above all, where the truant are assured that for Jesus' sake they have access to the Father and are restored to his love, there is the soul's home; there the sparrow hath found an house and the swallow a nest for herself. The joy of church-going can be kindled in sinners and fed in saints only by what the church offers to their souls. W. H. T. D.

Christ's Offering and Ours

WEDNESDAY, February 28. I Cor. 5 : 7. "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." Before Jesus' advent the sacrifices of the Old Testament times were received as an offering for sin, because Jesus was slain from the foundation of the world. They were types of the one sacrifice Jesus made of himself.

The Passover memorialized Israel's deliverance from Egyptian bondage, while the Lord's Supper is a memory of our deliverance from the penalty and power of sin. In the Lord's Supper we accept the offering of Christ for our salvation. We also are to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, not being conformed to this world, but transformed. Christ has made his offering; we must make ours. The two combined united in holy communion. We come as one sick to the Healer; as sorrowful to the Comforter, as hungry to the Bread of life, as guilty to the cleansing blood. We come, burdened, tempted, tried, to him who said, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." This sacrificial sacrament is a sign and seal that Christ, the Lamb without spot, has been offered for redemption. It is Christ's covenant with his children that we, who remember him, shall receive all the benefits of his gift of himself to mankind.

"That it was well to come
For deeper rest to this still room,
For here the habit of the soul
Feels less the outer world's control.
The world that time and sense have known Falls off and leaves us God alone."

Ye Are My Friends—If

THURSDAY, March 1. John 15 : 14. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Jesus of Nazareth sought and found among his disciples and followers men and women whom he called his friends. The best thing about the world of Jesus' day is that it furnished him a few people who were worthy of his friendship. Their names? The world well knows them. Bright must be their crowns in the Better Land. These words about friendship were first spoken to that little company of his confidants, and in a very real sense appeal to us.

Would we be the friends of Jesus? The way is clear. The conditions are simple. We must keep his commandments. And his commandments are not grievous. Neither are they arbitrary. They are founded in the very nature of spiritual life itself. Comprehensively analyzed and briefly stated, the commandments of Jesus may thus be summed up: "Love one another." "Deny yourselves." "Go ye into all the world and preach my Gospel." No man, woman or child who sincerely desires to be conformed to the laws of love and self-denial and Christian testimony can fail to find the friendship of Jesus at once the most intensive and extensive fact of interior experience.

The Debt of Love

FRIDAY, March 2. Rom. 13 : 8. "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law." A most distressing situation occurs when a just claim is presented to an honest person and he finds himself insolvent. The sense of shame that seizes a person in such a moment is overpowering. Incurring debts is perilous business. "Owe no man any thing" is, therefore, an excellent maxim. Again, when necessity has compelled the drawing of a note or placing oneself under obligation to another, and the debtor is ready on the day of liquidation to return the loan, what a load is lifted from his mind! He feels like a person restored to full liberty.

There is, however, one debt that is ever being paid and never wiped out: the debt of love. It is a true debt; for love is the sum and substance of that royal law under which we are placed by the Creator. We are, as it were, under contract to spend our lives loving God above all things and our neighbor as ourselves. The quality of any action by the rule of the Ten Commandments is determined by the love that we have put into that action. The law is never kept by a mere external performance of certain prescribed acts. Why was not the Pharisee justified on his record of righteousness? Now, what a vast debt has been piled up during our lives by our failure to love! Because no man could pay that debt, Jesus had to pay it for all men. By his life of serving love he cleared us from the debtor's disgrace. He is the debtors' only hope, their only surety. But the released debtor is not on that account free to refuse obeying the law of love. The great mercy shown him should stimulate him to eager efforts to show his appreciation of the Gospel by loving God and his fellow men as cordially and as persistently as Jesus loved him. This is the one debt which God's children bear all the time, and of which they are not ashamed. W. H. T. D.

Companionship with the Father

SATURDAY, March 3. John 16 : 32. "I am not alone." What a glorious fact in any life, to be conscious of the presence of the infinite Father! As Jesus knew that the Father was with him in life and waiting to receive him and crown him when his work was done, so may we in our finite capacity be just as absolutely certain of the divine presence, protection and power. How much more than the best earthly parent will your heavenly Father give and do for you! He abides in you, sheds his love abroad in your hearts, speaks blessed words of comfort from his holy Word and by his Holy Spirit.

To be without him is to be alone. No dearest friend can take the place of the Almighty Father. A great city full of strangers is the most lonely place imaginable, but if you knew every one you met, still, if God be unknown, you are a homeless, solitary wanderer. Only he can fill the aching void of your being with divine sympathy and heavenly companionship. So we can sing, "No, never alone!"

It is not good for man to be alone. He was created for the companioship of equals and the fellowship of the Holy Trinity. He is like a climbing plant, creeping and growing on something other than himself. Our Lord is ever saying to the sorrowing, solitary ones, "It is I, be not afraid; lo, I am with you alway."

"Thou shalt not want for company,
Nor pitch they tent alone;
The indwelling God will go with thee,
And show thee of his own."

A WRITER in the London Church Times in calling attention to the sordidness of modern business and the evident effort to stay within the statute law while disregarding all other codes, says, "Our business is to make money. All our work is concerned with money; all the talk is about money; all values, even human qualities, are expressed in terms of money. But money has a peculiarly sinister power. Quite insensibly our perception of right and wrong may be blunted and confused, while we hurry with others to reach this supreme good, as it appears to be regarded by mankind in general. It cannot be without significance that in the catalogue of merchandise dealt in at mystical Babylon, the representative City of Commerce, there occurs the item 'souls of men.'"

LOUIS LING AND L. E. ORCUTT

Daughter thinks it a lark to separate milk nowadays

WHEN I was a small boy I loved the farm. That was probably because I lived in a city where conventions compelled me to wear shoes and stockings and the ever-present policeman chased me off the street just when the ball game was getting interesting.

There was a certain freedom about the country that appealed to my youthful soul. The ten weeks of freedom from school—every hour, every minute of them—were duly appreciated; but vacation for me really began when we started out on our annual two-weeks' visit to grandfather's farm.

The very fact that it was necessary to get up at four o'clock made the trip an extraordinary event. So thoroughly did those occasions become impressed on my mind that I can even at this day, nearly forty years later, tell what we had for breakfast on those wonderful bright midsummer mornings.

After the early breakfast came the ride of twenty-four miles out the Gratiot road behind old Charlie, who was blind in one eye and who nearly dumped us in the ditch every time his good eye caught a stray piece of paper. The ride itself was a feature of the greatest importance; every passing farmer's wagon was a real event. At last we came to Curtis Corners, a crossroads named after grandfather and consisting of one general store. Then we turned off the main road, passed the ruins of the log hut where mother was born, and finally a few rods down the road we turned into the lane, at the end of which in a grove of tall pines stood the big house where grandfather now lived—a house built practically with his own hands.

Before the greetings were over my shoes and stockings were off and I was paddling around in the dusty road, making excursions to the barnyard, and renewing my acquaintance as fast as possible with all my old familiar haunts.

Followed fourteen days of bliss. If I was not bathing in the cool old Clinton River or making a model village out of mud and stones, I was sampling all kinds of farm labor. I drove the hay rack, helped in the wheat field, rode on the wagons, brought the cows from pasture. I was here, there and everywhere, probably an unmitigated nuisance, but really believing that I was making myself useful.

AS I look back on those days I realize that life on grandfather's farm was really pretty crude and unattractive. A small boy from the city did not appreciate the monotony, the hard work, the drudgery. A small boy did not appreciate the lack of city comforts and conveniences. Had I been obliged to live there fifty-two weeks in the year and grow up there, each day performing a generous share of the work, my ideas would have been quite different.

Now I know how hard life was on the old farm—the endless chores merely to make the ordinary routine of living possible. It is only the small boy from the city spending a brief two weeks in summer on the farm who enjoys pumping water by hand. It's a novelty to him. He doesn't mind the kerosene lamp, because he is packed off to bed before the twilight passes to darkness, and glad to go at that. He knows nothing of the longer winter evenings or the monotony of the life which makes reading such a pleasure.

Grandfather was a farmer by profession, and he raised crops and live stock. He was also the father of twelve children. I would hesitate to say, however, that he raised a family. Of all grandfather's brood of twelve, not one stayed on the farm. All wandered away as quickly as they could. Even grandfather himself finally left the old place and moved to the city. I don't cherish any illusions about the old farm or of life as it was lived there, and I don't wonder, now that I look back at it, that the children all departed. They could not maintain the childish attitude toward farm life of the little shaver from the city. They knew that life on the farm was hard, dull and monotonous, with no luxuries, no conveniences, no chance for self-improvement or self-advancement.

So, while grandfather raised crops and live stock, he did not, in the best and broadest sense, raise a family. Untrained and undeveloped, some of them found life a hard problem, and they did not achieve real success.

But grandfather was not to blame. He lived just before the arrival of the telephone, rural free delivery, cheap reading-matter, automobiles, power machinery, and electricity adapted to farm use. Knowing him as I do, I believe that had he lived today he would have raised a family as well as crops and live stock.

EITHER the failure of some farmers to take advantage of what the industrial world now offers the farmer along these lines, or real inability to secure them, form the explanation in large part of the exodus of farm children to the city. Such farmers may be raising live stock, but they are not raising families in the best sense.

The American farmer no longer lives way out in the country unless he wants to. It is true that the acres which he cultivates and on which his home is located may be twelve or fifteen or even more than twenty miles from the point at which he does his trading. Forty years ago a broken gear on a harvester would have meant a day lost to the farmer twenty miles from town. Today, he merely steps to the telephone; instantly he is in town and talking to the merchant. The next trip of the rural mail-carrier brings the gear, and in the meantime the farmer is free to do other necessary work or to take a little rest while the machine is waiting for its repairs. Or if the work is too urgent to wait the mail, the "car" is ready for a quick trip.

Invention has been particularly busy with the chores and drudgery of the farm. First she produced a new kind of hired-man; the small gasoline engine. It tirelessly pumped water, separated milk, made the cream into butter, ground feed, turned grindstones, and almost completely eliminated any necessity for city boys to be invited to visit the farm in summertime. But the gasoline engine was still like any hired-man ever created, imperfect. It could be mounted on skids and pulled about the farm from one job to another, or it could be mounted in one place and the job brought to it. But it could work only in one place at a time. If the energy of this gasoline engine should be turned into electricity, the same little engine could be everywhere upon the farm at once. So Invention improved the new hired-man.

The first individual electric plants cost from a thousand dollars up and were beyond the reach of the average farmer, just as the early automobile was beyond the reach of the average citizen. But even as the automobile has been cheapened and improved until dependable cars are within the reach of any one who is determined to have one, so the individual electrical plant for the farm has been cheapened and improved until now plants guaranteed fool-proof, almost automatic in their working, and absolutely certain in their performance, can be purchased for less than three hundred dollars, and installed at a very low cost.

In nearly every case this efficient hired-man consists of a thoroughly reliable gasoline or kerosene engine connected with a dynamo and a system of storage batteries. The average plant is capable of carrying from thirty to thirty-five 16-candle power incandescent lamps. These plants operate at a low voltage, generating direct current, and this current is wired about the farm to convenient plugs placed where power is liable to be required. The cream-separator, the churn, the grindstone, the feed-grinder, and all of the other machines may have a separate motor, or a single light motor may be suitably mounted and carried about as the machine is needed. A half-grown child finds it easy to order these hired-men from place to place.

With one of these electrical equipments installed, the farmer and his family can have every convenience of town life; electric light, as a matter of course. And the same current will pump water, making possible running hot and cold water and every domestic utility that goes with them. It will sweep the floors, will this accommodating current, mix the bread, make the toast or griddle cakes, wash the dishes if desired, and never grumble; separate the milk, churn the butter, grind feed, saw the wood, turn the grindstone, blow the forge, wash the clothes, and iron them, too. And if there are any sheep on the farm, it will operate the shears, and the horse-clipper is its delight; while the cost of all this convenience is very little more than the cost of light alone when

About 10-boy power is turning this grindstone kerosene lamps are burned. A thorough test of one of these electric lighting outfits in a comparison with an ordinary kerosene lamp shows that one gallon of kerosene in a lamp burning a flat wick produces as much light as 746 candles burning a full hour and as much as 820 candles in one with a circular wick. A gallon of kerosene used as power in one of these outfits, fitted to burn kerosene as well as gasoline, produced lights equal to 3,375 candles an hour, which was reduced by loss in the battery to 2,530, or about three times the efficiency of the kerosene lamp. In other words, at a little more than the cost of half lighting a home by kerosene, a home can be lighted in every part and all the drudgery of the farm can be lessened as well.

(The funny thing about all this is that there now are enough hired men to go round and to spare, so that the same chores that afflict the small town dweller as well as the farmer, can be gotten rid of by the identical method.)

THERE is still work on the farm. Plenty of it. Just as there is work in the city or anywhere else where men seek to wrest a livelihood from their environment. But the work on the farm is no longer of necessity the drudgery that it was a generation ago. The farmer of today is a professional man and a business man all in one, with time enough left to be the head of a family, too. There are crops to be raised, of course, crops of commercial wheat and crops of human character, and the machinery that lightens the labor of the one gives time for the perfecting of the other. Necessity is the mother of Invention, and may well be proud of her offspring.

A Church History in Movies

MEMBERS of the congregation of a southern church recently saw themselves in a play built around the church's history, with their pastor in the leading rôle,—the Brantly Baptist Church of Baltimore. The picture was called, "The Evolution of Brantly Church," and the action depicted the growth of the church from a mission. All the present members of the congregation and of the Sunday school took part. Rev. H. M. Wharton, the pastor, in the opening scene became again a young evengelist. To add to the interest the love story of a waif, who grows up and becomes a lawyer, and of a little girl who becomes a trained nurse, is invented, in part. They meet as children, whereas in fact they did not meet until much later in life. Both, however, were reared by Dr. Wharton, and all the other incidents in the picture actually happened in the history of Brantly.

The play opens in the streets of the slums in front of Brantly Mission. A little waif and a little girl are playing together on the pavement. The sick mother of the little girl approaches, and, taking the two children by the hand, enters the mission. Dr. Wharton, then a young evangelist, is preaching. Through his sermon the woman becomes converted, and is baptized.

There comes a night when she is absent. The little girl, realizing that her mother is seriously ill, goes to find the little waif to send him for the evangelist. She finds the boy asleep in the drygoods box, where he makes his home.

Upon Dr. Wharton's arrival, the mother, who is dying, asks him to take the little girl and rear her. The little girl does not want to leave the boy, and Dr. Wharton takes them both. The lad is later taken by a farmer, who has the boy educated, and he becomes a lawyer. The girl is reared at Dr. Wharton's house, and becomes a trained nurse.

The lad, now the lawyer, comes to visit Dr. Wharton and is taken by him to see the new Brantly Church. On the pavement in front of the edifice the lawyer slips on the sleety pavement, falls in front of an automobile, and is injured. Dr. Wharton takes him to a hospital, and there he is nursed by the little girl, now a trained nurse. They recognize each other, and the childish love is renewed. They become engaged, and are married by Dr. Wharton.

The little girl finds the waif in his drygoods box

Following the showing of the history play, were pictures of the activities of the church. There were interesting and very human touches throughout.

[The use of moving pictures as a feature in church work seems to be spreading. The experiment by the Brantly church may stimulate other congregations to review their histories, and in the process discover if there has been growth or merely continuance. The idea is here for a new form of church entertainment, whether embodied in a moving picture or enacted, or even told as a story. To get back to the origin of a church, particularly if a very humble one begun under great difficulties and entailing sacrifices, then to trace the growth of the church through many trying periods and accompanied by inspiring incidents of the conversion of people known to all and the realization of divine blessings, and then to present such a history with artistic skill, ought to interest the best literary talent in any community, and the result, if the church is really worth while, can hardly help but be beneficial in its presentation.]

JOHNSON'S PREPARED WAX

Now Made in Liquid Form

so that it may be more easily applied and polished. It is the same as our Paste Wax except that it is liquid.

A Wonderful Furniture Polish

Johnson's Prepared Wax Liquid cleans, polishes and finishes with one operation. It forms a thin protecting coat over varnish, greatly prolonging its life and beauty. It is easy to apply and may be polished instantly with but very little rubbing.

For Polishing Automobiles

Johnson's Prepared Wax Liquid is easy to apply and polish—a good sized car can be made to look like new in half an hour. It preserves the varnish and protects it from the weather, adding years to its life. It covers up mars and scratches—prevents checking and cracking—sheds water and does not gather dust.

Tell your dealer that Johnson's Prepared Wax is now made in liquid form and insist upon him securing it for you.

Dutch Boy Products

THE metal lead is the foundation of Dutch Boy Products. Even paint (i. e., the best paint) comes from lead.

Many people don't know that. Dutch Boy Linseed Oil isn't lead but is needed to make white lead liquid enough to paint with.

Read about the other Dutch Boy Products.

Paint that pays for itself

Almost any paint will beautify your house when first applied—even the cheap kinds.

Time is the test.

Paint made of Dutch Boy pure White-Lead and Dutch Boy pure Linseed Oil, does stand the test. Such paint is an investment.

It not only makes a beautiful coating—it stays so.

That's paint economy.

Painted walls that wash like tile

For wall decoration use Dutch Boy pure White-Lead mixed with a flatting oil.

The result is that handsome, dull, velvet finish which is one of the charms of elegant homes—simple, yet rich.

Treatment may be smooth or stippled, plain or mottled, (tiffany). Any color, from delicate tints to bold combinations.

And—note especially—as washable as a tiled wall.

It is SO easy to prevent rust

For protection from rust—whether on iron fences, pipes, railings, gutters and gratings about the home, or the machinery on a farm, or the steel work on great buildings and bridges—no other material sticks and wears on metal like red-lead.

Dutch Boy Red-Lead is ground in Dutch Boy pure linseed oil to a thick paste, to be handled like white-lead—just thin it down with linseed oil.

Bearing metals and solder

Are you a user of bearing metals? Of solder?

If so, you know that the big problem in buying these mixtures of the soft metals is to be sure that the metal which you buy today is the same which you found so suitable to your purpose yesterday.

Dutch Boy Phoenix metal is always the same and guaranteed. So with all the other Dutch Boy varieties of babbitt. So with the Dutch Boy series of solder, from Dutch Boy 111, for the most particular work, down to the rough-and-ready Dutch Boy 888.

Moreover, we study your problem. Our testing laboratories are at your service, and our experts will take up with you any bearing problem, any die-casting possibility, any soft-metal product or proposition whatsoever.

Satin Waistcoats and Subway Trains

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

WHEN I think of Washington—the father of his country, the leader of our first army, and our first President—I also think instinctively of rose-shaded candles, and soft music, and the graceful steps of the minuet. I think of shining old silver, and linen; I think of powdered hair, and satin knee-breeches, and stiff brocades. I think of deep curtesies and deeper bows; of politeness and chivalry.

Washington was something of an expert on good manners. He wrote a set of rules for politeness. His contemporaries say that he followed out his teachings, that he was graciousness itself—that his good manners were almost proverbial. One, thinking of Washington, is very likely to think of good manners at the same time.

"WASHINGTON, and good manners, and powdered hair," I heard a woman sigh to her companion the other day, "Washington, and colonial days, and politeness . . . I fear that chivalry went out of fashion with satin waistcoats!"

We were in a crowded subway car. The evening rush hour was just beginning, and the woman had been jostled from side to side—as every one else had been jostled. Hence the sigh and the regret for the chivalry of Washington's Day.

I sighed, too. For the day had been long, and rush hours aren't—pleasant. And as I sighed I glanced at the woman who had spoken. She had evidently been shopping, for she carried packages—dainty, carefully wrapped packages. She was well dressed and fairly young. Her companion was also carrying packages, and was also fairly young and well dressed. As I looked at her a man rose rather wearily to give her his place, and she sank into it with a careless nod in his direction.

I looked at the man who had given up his place. He was a little man with shoulders stooped from working. His clothes were a bit shabby and his eyes held a doubtful look, the fear-of-job look. Here, in the city, we are wont to call men of his type "tired business men." The thought flashed over me as I looked at him that he was doubtless more tired than the woman who had been shopping. I could not help feeling that he deserved the seat more than she did. I sighed again, and as I did so the woman spoke once more to her companion.

"This," she said, with a wave of her white-gloved hand—a gesture that took in the sordidness of the crowded car, the ugliness of the dust and the dirt and the worn clothing—"this sort of thing annoys me. Look at these crowds—not a bit of romance in them, not a bit of dignity or courtesy. They didn't have crowds like this in Washington's time! I wish, almost, that I had been born a hundred and fifty years ago!"

The little tired man with the worried eyes swayed wearily on his strap. In the corner, plastered against the door, a pair of shabby young lovers spoke together in low, eager tones. An Italian mother, with a dark, wistful Madonna-face, held her shawl-wrapped baby tightly in her arms. . . . The woman, looking past them, gestured with her slender, white-gloved hands.

"No courtesy, or romance, or dignity!" she said. . . .

I, too, wished that she had been born a hundred and fifty years ago!

ONE night I was having supper with a little family who live in our town. At the supper table the oldest girl announced that she was going to the moving pictures that evening.

"Don't you go rather often?" questioned her mother. "Are you sure that it's good for you to go so often?"

"Oh," answered the oldest girl earnestly, "I'm quite sure that it's good for me, mother—they have such fine pictures! Sometimes I'm almost—inspired—when I see the things that they can show on the screen!"

There is a great-aunt who lives with the family. She is a dear old lady who wears dainty little shoulder-capes, and a cap on her white curls, and a cameo brooch at her throat. She is a dear old lady, and I love her; but she has an unfortunate habit of pursing up her lips and making remarks. She listened to her great-niece with a tiny frown, and then she spoke.

"When I was a girl," she said, "I didn't go to the moving pictures!"

The girl is a dear girl, and I love her too. But she also has an unfortunat habit: she loses her temper quickly an speaks without thinking.

"When you were a girl," she answered almost angrily, "there weren't any moving pictures!"

I THOUGHT of the great-aunt and th girl when I heard the woman speak ing to her friend in the crowded subway "They didn't have crowds like this in Washington's time!" she had said.

"Well," I wanted to answer, "the didn't have subways, either!"

Customs change with the centurie just as costumes do. Crowded citie automobiles, elevated railroads an motion pictures have made our daily lif very different from the daily life i Washington's time. Our life, now days, is a busier, more hurried life th the rose-shaded, soft music, satin kn breeches life that our ancestors in eighteenth century lived. And type of courtesy is different from courtesy of the colonial days.

The tired business man in the sub got to his feet ungracefully, with h ing head. He was weary; but his liteness seemed almost more real t than the straight-backed, hand-kis politeness of Revolutionary times.

Oh, friends of mine, when we think Washington and his times, we think of chivalry and courtesy. And when we think of our vital, crammed-with-business lives we remark that chivalry is dead. But when we say a thing like that we're not telling the truth.

DID you ever stop to think that there were doubtless, in Colonial days, some very rude people? That some of the men were just as impolite as our hurrying subway crowds? That some of the men were probably more impolite when they hadn't as much reason to be? That there were probably beautiful ladies who were gracious and charming to their social equals and were decidedly horrid to folk who were not so blessed with worldly goods—the ones who served them?

No, we never think of that. For the Colonial days are rather far away, and we look back on them through a rainbow-colored haze. Somehow we can't think of a dandy in a blue brocade coat throwing his boot across the room in a fit of temper. We can't picture a stately woman in a velvet frock with a train whispering something small and cattish to her friend. We are in the habit of connecting Revolutionary days with politeness and chivalry, and pictures like that don't fit.

But we are living in today—not looking back on it. And so we don't think of looking for courtesy and chivalry and politeness. In a street crowd we are much more likely to notice the rudeness, the jostling, the pushing and shoving; we are much more apt to speak of the man who doesn't give his place to a lady than of the man who rises and does give up his place.

Chivalry is not dead. Politeness and good manners are still in vogue. Watch for them and every day you will see them. You will see old ladies helped carefully across streets; you will see busy men giving up part of their limited time; you will see smiling faces and raised hats.

Of course the chivalry isn't as spectacular—as pretty—as the chivalry of Washington's time. The background isn't as soft, as quiet, as charming. In fact, the background is so crowded and changing that the chivalry can hardly be noticed unless one looks for it. And a great many people don't look for it. A great many people wish, instead, with the woman in the subway car, that they had been born a hundred and fifty years ago. Do you?

The Aftermath

By
LILLIAN ELLA WILSON

In Rama was there a voice heard . . . Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they were not.

FROM my window I can see the city of the dead. You can't find the end of the marble obelisks. They go on and on and ose themselves in the distances, a silent nd terrible testimony to what takes lace when man forgets honor, forgets uth, forgets his brotherhood, and rgets God.

In the city of the dead are lying my husband and—my son. But the stone that bears Robert's name stands for nly a memory. Robert is not by his ather's side. He lies beneath the sert sands. A desert sun beats down pon him by day, and over him the esert stars keep their lonely watch at ight.

They say Hugh died gallantly, that he ll while leading his regiment, that giment he loved so well, into the rain shrapnel which meant death for them l as they knew, but which had to be the lines of their foe were to be oken. They tell me Robert stayed hind in a trench after orders for acuation had been given, because a ng comrade needed him. Half an r later the enemy's forces swept ss in the pitchy darkness, and he crushed beneath a hundred shrieking cursing maniacs—yes, maniacs; hat is what men become in the of battle.

hose days so long ago, when as yet e seemed something definite and a tangible thing that one could pe according to his ideals, when as the future was a wonderful picture which I painted to my fancy, I suddenly and unexpectedly discovered the true meaning of life. It frightened and bewildered me, and then thrilled me with the wonderful possibilities which before had been beyond my comprehension. My picture forgotten, my dreams buried in the wonderment of that awakening, I left the darkened room where I had held in my arms, for the first time, God's and Nature's miracle, a newborn child, resolved to prepare myself for the part for which I had been created.

He came at last, the man who, the "still small voice" said, answered my ideal of manhood. He did not enter my life till I was fitted for the part I was to play. I was no girl now, but a woman, with a purpose strong and deep. As to the man I loved, his was a nature whose intenseness and high ideals uplifted with a magnetic force all who came his way.

We were married at midnight of the New Year. It seemed to me symbolical of what Hugh and I were entering upon. But as I stood there at the altar—the wonderful music of an invisible choir filling the great church—Hugh, the altar, the church, the music and all vanished, and I stood gazing into a midnight sky. Why I did not know; only Hugh seemed in some strange way connected with it.

It lasted but a second; then I heard myself mechanically repeating the marriage vow with Hugh, and in a little while all was over.

I thought I was going to be very happy. The war between the Allies and Germany had as yet affected us little. But as matters became more and more complicated, many feared we also would be drawn into the conflict. It was common talk that we were unprepared.

Congress took hold of the situation. Step by step measures were passed to strengthen our fighting facilities. The whole country seemed dominated by the military spirit. Thus it was an easy matter when things had come to this pass to propose in earnest whether we should have military rule or not.

It was put to the people for popular vote. It carried. I did all I could to persuade Hugh to vote against it, but he like all the others was fully convinced that it was for the best.

The war finally ended. Thanks to the wisdom and excellent statesmanship of our leaders, we were not drawn into the conflict. But military rule remained with us. It had come to stay. Little by little, slowly at first but steadily, the power of the central government advanced till at last it was supreme.

WHEN Robert blessed our little home, Hugh's happiness was complete. When Robert screamed with colic, Hugh walked with him into the wee small hours of the morning, uncomplainingly. When he grasped Hugh's two fingers in his tiny hands one day, and stood on two strong little feet, Hugh laughed for five minutes, then rushed out and told the fact to every man, woman and grandmother who would listen to him. When Robert donned his first pair of pants Hugh told him he was a man now and could join the army pretty soon; told him how he would ride on a big black horse and lead the soldiers on parade day; and from that time on talked continually of Robert's future.

After this, every evening Hugh took the child on his knee and told him stories of war; told him how he must love his country better than anything else in the world; that he must fight for her and die for her if necessary. But after the stories were ended and I had carried Robert off to bed, there with his little head pressed close against me and his strong little body in my arms, I told him of One who had lived on earth and finally given his life for the sake of his fellow men. Then the child, his eyes big and deep with the purpose of his resolve, would tell me how when he was grown to be a tall man like Papa, he was going to make all the little boys and girls happy, and big people as well.

After that he would repeat his little prayer in which he told how he "loved everybody and everybody," and that he wanted to be "just like the good Lord Jesus," help everybody to be good, and die too if God wanted him to. As I watched him drop softly to sleep my heart would echo his prayer in all save the last. God forbid that my little boy ever need give his life up. If that were necessary I prayed to let me go in his stead.

It seemed strange that such a little fellow as he should think of such things. Children are by nature selfish little beings. Unselfishness and love for each other has to be instilled into them at babyhood; but here was Robert with the instinct born right in him.

ALL boys when sixteen were required to drill twice a week. They belonged to the Boy Scouts' organization, and were trained in all military maneuvers. Robert looked forward eagerly to the time when he should be old enough to belong. He was growing tall, and promised to look like his father.

When he was sixteen Hugh gave him a gun. Robert's sentiments were divided. He appreciated the gun to the extent of being able to handle it well, but there his enthusiasm stopped. He did not believe in using it for the destruction of his fellow beings. He regarded war as murder.

For Hugh and I the sun rose and set in Robert. He was all we had, so small wonder that our feeling was akin to worship. Three others, boys, had come to us, but they died before their eyes opened on the world. Though heartbroken when I had to give them back to the God who gave them, afterward I was glad.

The day Robert was twenty-one he was taken into Hugh's offices as junior partner. I shall never forget the expression on his face as he went with his father that morning. At ten o'clock they were back, Hugh grave, Robert with a strange drawn look about his eyes, his lips pressed tightly together. The United States had declared WAR.

At midnight their regiment was ordered to the Pacific. In forty-eight hours they would reach the Asiatic coast. Hugh kissed me hurriedly and went out the door. Robert held me Brakes did not work. 1 killed, 3 injured.

5 killed, 1 injured. Cause of accident—defective brakes.

Good brake lining would have saved them

Don't risk your life with defective brakes. Reline them now.

In these two accidents, men paid for defective brakes with their lives.

Are you running the risk of sharing their fate? Are you sure of your brakes? Will they work quickly, surely in a pinch? Find out right now.

Before you go out, be sure your brakes are O. K. It is probable that you need new brake lining. See to it at once.

Remember, the efficiency of your brakes depends entirely on the efficiency of your brake lining.

For your own sake—and the sake of those who ride with you—reline your brakes with the best brake lining money can buy. Fortunately this lining costs only a little more than inefficient brake linings.

The one brake lining you can be sure of always is Thermoid.

Three reasons why Thermoid is the best brake lining

There are three big reasons why Thermoid is superior to all other brake linings.

1. It has 50% more material than any woven brake lining.

This means longer service—better service. Thermoid is 50% heavier than any other brake lining on the market. That is why it is better fitted to stand the responsibilities placed on it.

2. It is grapnalized.

Grapnalizing is an exclusive process that makes Thermoid impervious to all moisture and foreign matter such as gasoline, oil, water, dust, etc. No other brake lining is grapnalized, or can be. That is why ordinary brake lining goes to pieces rapidly.

3. It is hydraulic compressed.

Powerful hydraulic presses press Thermoid into a solid mass. This makes it far tougher and stronger than woven lining. It makes the surface ideal for brake lining; it can't grab and it can't slip. The "coefficient of friction" is just right.

Have your brakes relined now. And be sure to specify Thermoid. Your dealer will be glad to supply you with Thermoid Brake Lining because he knows Thermoid will give you absolute satisfaction. He knows that the manufacturers of Thermoid Brake Lining stand behind every inch of it with this guarantee—close in his arms for one long, tense moment, kissed me full on the lips with a lover's kiss, then left without a word. I watched the lights of the aeroplanes till they were lost in the distances. Then I still stood there with my eyes fixed on the spot where they had last been, till things grew black before me and the earth was no more. The vision at the altar had come to pass.

"Thermoid will make good or WE WILL"

When I came to myself the first pale light was appearing in the east, but I cared little whether the sun should ever shine. I knew I should never see Hugh or Robert again. All that I had lived for had gone forever. True, my body still lived, its fires not yet burned out; but what had once been myself went out into the blue of that midnight sky when my life and my flesh and blood went away on their journey which ended in eternity.

I am glad now God gave me no girls. They will not have to suffer as I have. I am glad the others died. I shall not have to give them up also into the maw of that never-satisfied monster, Military Supremacy. But most of all I am glad when each day is done; glad that each means one less for me to live, and that each is drawing me nearer to the end. . . :

HUGH died believing he was fighting for his country. I can realize what it meant to him as he rode into the rain of bombs and shrapnel, leaving behind, when he was just at his prime, all that he loved most—life that had drawn us together, life that had made us one, life that had realized for him his greatest hopes—he was leaving it behind him and riding into not only death, but eternity and God.

But oh, dear heart, it was such a needless sacrifice. Your life was given, not for your country, but for the sake of that small circle of greed monsters who coin profit from war's horrors; for a few politicians who were greedy for power; for the few rich men, rich organizations and rich families that have been the uncrowned royalty of America, the America that was supposed to stand for Equality and Liberty.

It was different with Robert. Drawn into the conflict by force of circumstances over which he had no control, born into a world dominated by militarism which he had no power to oppose, he could do nothing else but go when his regiment was called. But, dear boy, you kept faith with what the inner self told you, and, when the supreme test came, gave your life for the sake of your fellow man.

THE years do not dull the pain. Though Hugh was brave, Robert noble, though our army won and our nation is still supreme, does that fill the void in my life? Can it take away the ache in a mother's heart? Can it erase what I and every other woman in my place knows—that those lives were a sacrifice on the altar of our national idol, Military Supremacy?

In Rama was there a voice heard, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted.

Gospel Transportation in the Philippines

ASK the chauffeur, alias Sunday school worker, alias superintendent of mountain guests and school children's dormitory, et cetera, for news as to the usefulness of the Christian Herald auto in Cebu. This man of many gifts is slow of speech when telling of the services he renders, but here we will gather from his list.

Sunday: News of an attack on the little band of Protestants away in the mountains at T——. A good American used up an extra quantity of gasoline to bring word to Mr. Jansen of this trouble. With much concern he told, "The aggressors stoned your workers and the people who were gathered in their home for their Sunday school preparation. The evangelist came to me as I was passing through the village, and told me they were in danger of their lives."

Monday morning about 6 A.M. we start for T——. It is a frightful road. One skid and Adios to us all. The springs oozing out from the sheer rock at one side keep the road moist in many places. In rains a greasy mud is added, while at all times the precipitous decline at the outer side of the one auto-wide mountain road speaks "Come down" in nerve-straining beckoning, while at other times it warns "You'll come to smash if you go over hers."

At length the mountain village is reached. The passing nervous impressions, and the grand scenery, with the triumphant tokens graven by the labors of men's hands, are left, and there we are speaking heart to heart with sons of the poor of the world, who through faith and obedience to God's Word have looked into the heart and mind of the Eternal Saviour. Poor people to whom the world's knowledge has been closed, but who have the mind of Christ.

That journey back must be taken before dark, but what a stirring time we had! Immense importance was lent to the humble evangelist and his wife as their friends arrived in an auto. The first house we stopped at they had fled from, moving to one in which they felt somewhat safer. But they were quickly found, and the Christians gathered. When we left all were cheered, and even the school children who had that morning been tormented to tears were eager to show how they had learned new hymns.

I cannot make out whether it was the presence of the missionaries or the Christian Herald automobile and its impressive whirring and tooting that did the greater work among the persecutors; but certainly the few words of warning spoken to the village mayor were taken with a pinch of automobile respect.

The next auto visit to T— was for the baptism and receiving into full membership of a goodly number. Soon there is to follow a church dedication, too.

A VISIT to O——. This trip in a native canoe has in fair weather taken five days. But cramped body, and skin scorched by sun and salt water, always have borne reward, for there are some six hundred Christians in O——. With what joy they welcomed the recent visit! During the first years of bitter persecution how the coming of the Christian Herald mission launch had cheered the people! And now, day by day, during the short visit, they met for Bible instruction and for consultation about the eight Sunday schools and the other evangelistic work which their volunteer workers cared for in their own and other districts.

God had considered those poor villagers worth his ministry, and had sent not only his messengers, first on foot and by open boats, then by a launch sent by his friends from far-off lands, and now by automobile through the same givers.

Another day: An auto-load of friends went to a distant village home to encourage the little band of Christians in that place by taking part in the funeral service of a little child. The father, who is now a true Christian, was formerly a revolutionary leader.

Then follow notes concerning more than one poor sick Christian who, unable to bear the movement in native vehicles, were taken to the hospital in the Christian Herald auto.

Another trip: Half buried in the mud—no, stuck!—when going to hold services in B——. For seventeen kilometers we floundered along the new mountain road, cheering on twelve men whom we had called to our rescue, stumbling, wallowing, dragging and pushing the automobile, whose wheels could not turn owing to the mud. It was another way of saving gasoline, but it still was the old way—thank God—of not disappointing the poor waiting people to whom we had given the promise of services on a certain day.

The Beginning of the Gideons

HOW strange it would be if our Father in heaven should call out from our homes an army of four hundred thousand men—fathers and sons—to be employed as traveling salesmen and agents and leave them to themselves!

A God of love could not do it. "I have loved you with an everlasting love," does not apply to any sect or creed.

Traveling men, as a whole, one time had a bad name. Why was it so?

In a class meeting a short time ago I heard a Gideon say: "When I started on the road twenty-five years ago I put in my grip a box of cigars, a deck of cards, a bottle of whisky and a gun. I was determined to get them." Holding up a Bible, he said: "Now, except my necessities, this is all I carry."

In this great army there were thousands of devout Christians. How should they know it when they met? In a small town, with but one hotel, two such men met. The inn was full except one room with two beds. The proprietor told these guests his only accommodation left was that one room, and if they could room together he could keep them. They accepted.

They sat down quietly and wrote their orders. Then one turned to the other and said: "I read from God's Word and pray before I retire." His roommate said it was his custom also. Then they read and prayed together.

In that hour began the Christian Commercial Travelers of America—The Gideons, Incorporated. We have a small button representing a pitcher from which a red flame burns, emblematical of the flame of the Spirit. By this little token we recognize one another. The traveling public is coming to know and trust it.

One morning, as an advertising agent, I was going through one of our largest department stores, when I saw a bright young man with a Gideon button. He had a heavy grip in each hand. When our eyes met, down went his grips. Taking me by the hand he said: "My brother, I am glad to see you." I said: "Where do you live?" He replied, "In Northeastern New York. I am glad to see you and beg your prayers."

We have no lodges, but camps are organized, with officers for hotel and other services. We read and sing and pray. It's simply the old-time religion, and as we tell the story, men and women are convicted and saved.

Our work has now extended to Canada, and we have undertaken to place Bibles in every guest-room of all leading hotels. To date we have placed 360,000. "Are they read?" you ask. Some mornings ago I stood at a depot awaiting a train. A gentleman approached me and said: "Sir, there are many lodges," pointing to my button, "but I think you belong to the very best." I asked him where he was from, and he said, "Boston; and I have read the Bible more in the past two years than in all my life before, as I find it in my hotel rooms."

In our work we have many encouraging experiences. Let me give one: In our meetings in the city, there came to us a dear, widowed mother in Israel. She was poor and ill. Our warm meetings touched her heart.

One cold spell we missed her from the services. On inquiry we learned that she was sick and in want. I told the members of our camp and took up a silver offering for her. I found her housed in an off street, in one small room, very ill, but able to be up. She was glad to see me, but began to make excuses for her poor quarters, saying the rent was cheap and the family good to her.

I threw the silver offering into her lap and her joy knew no bounds. She said: "Sometimes I am tempted to murmur; but I have never suffered as my Lord did."

Soon afterward, we heard that she had passed away. She had left the poor tenement for the Palace of the King.

James M. Davis,
President of the Gideons.

Sabra Phelps

"All who joy would win,
Must share it; happiness was born a twin."
Byron.

WHEN I went to live in a little New England village I heard the name of Sabra Phelps spoken so often and so lovingly that I grew anxious to see her. It is rare in this captious world to find a woman about whom at least one other woman does not make a cruel or disparaging remark. When I met Miss Phelps I wondered; she was neither brilliant nor clever. She had not an atom of style nor a touch of society polish and certainly good looks was not one of her attributes. You generally expect to find one such gift about a popular woman. I felt her charm, still I could not analyze it. Hers was a face to which Nature had been almost unkind. Her eyes were an ordinary dull gray, her features irregular, and she had ugly teeth. Her toneless hair had merely changed from the ashen brown of youth to the ashen gray of age. And yet—I forgot her looks. I saw nothing but her happy outlook on a jaded, crochety world, her ready kindness, her self-forgetfulness, her cheery self-reliance, her steady belief in frail human nature and her constant generosity with the little she had.

One day she told me it was her fifty-seventh birthday.

"That is a long time," I said, "to make one little spot in the world as happy as you have done."

"Happy?" Her eyes twinkled. "I am right glad if I have made one person happy, only I have not put in all that time at the business. I wasted twenty-five years."

"How?" I asked abruptly.

"I am plain-looking today." The woman's glance met mine steadily. "As a girl I was absolutely ugly, almost repellant. It needed no mirror to tell me so. Sometimes I felt a stranger's eyes rest on me for a minute in surprise; then came pity or repugnance. As I grew older and went out into our little social world where nearly every girl was pretty or had an average share of good looks, I felt that Nature had been cruel to me. I never had a sweetheart in my life; still men treated me more kindly than women. Sometimes a woman can be merciless without uttering a word. At twenty I withdrew from the world. I thought of turning Catholic, so I could hide my face in a nunnery. I became a recluse almost hating the world and the people in it. One day I realized that not only was I making a failure of my life but creating unhappiness for my whole family. That night I had a talk with myself and a séance with my mirror. Then I lifted the glass from the wall and resolved not to look at myself again until I had made life over. Mother became desperately ill a few days later and somehow I forgot myself. The days were so full of work and anxiety that self was almost obliterated. During her convalescence laughter had to be coaxed back to her eyes, and before she grew well I had stepped into a new world where people welcomed me with a smile and warm cordiality. I had been creating an atmosphere for myself which was murky with shadows and befogged with hopelessness. It was just as easy, I discovered—no, it was easier, to make sunshine and to dwell in the sunshine. Months later I took out the old mirror and faced myself. I had not grown comelier—that was a miracle only God himself could achieve—but I had grown pleasanter to look at. The forlorn droop had gone from my mouth; instead there were lines about it etched by smiles; and laughter had brightened my eyes. That day I realized the sin of self-pity—for it is a sin—that one human being should become a blot upon the radiance of her own horizon, no matter how narrow that horizon may be."

The Christian Attitude Toward Humanity's Need

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THIS story shows the compassionate Christ ministering pitifully to the crowds of commonplace people. Matthew and Mark use the phrase "he had compassion upon them"—in their ignorance, their poverty, their eager search for healing and for some new power in life. The Son of God looked upon them with quick, gentle sympathy. Matthew, Mark and Luke record that he resented the suggestion that he send them away hungry and forlorn. How often we can think of no solution to the problems of human need that confront us. Dismiss from our minds, send away, the specters of suffering and woe! Not so the Christ. "Give ye them."

Every one of the Gospels tells this story, and each has its characteristic touch. Mark said that they seemed to Jesus "as sheep not having a shepherd, and he began to teach them many things." The multitudes' need for instruction, for leadership, for a teaching ministry! Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all nations, teaching them. Matthew states, "And he healed their sick"—the physical miseries of the poor! At home and on the mission field the ministry of healing still exercises its Christlike powers. Luke says: "He welcomed them." Welcomed the poor, the unlearned, the suffering! There is the essence of the contrast between Christianity and other religions, Christ's and all other philosophies of life. He welcomed the proletariat, the lower classes, the despised.

How Christlike hearts go out to the distressed multitudes of today! I witnessed the Kingsland munitions fire, when thousands of shells were exploded. Around the works a village of shacks had grown up. When the disaster came the poor Italian and Polish people grasped their little children by the hand and fled blindly. They did not seem to expect any help, any care, or refuge. Just left their poor belongings and went out into the cold. Kind, friendly townspeople did care for most of them. But think of the distressed multitudes in Europe, leaving homes in flames, with no refuge, nothing but the bare, ravaged countryside before them.

Just to watch the crowds pour out of a great factory after the long, long day of dreary, monotonous toil at the machines always gives a tug at the heart of Christian teachers. There is a dumb appeal for instruction, for ideals, for something to live for, for life more abundant. But when we hear of thousands of Armenian refugees turned out to trudge through the desert, amid unspeakable horrors, we are staggered by the extent of human misery in our own day.

The Gospel and Human Need

THERE are a few who dismiss all this by a kind of easy faith which throws all the responsibility on God for man's suffering and sin. It sounds suspiciously like the sort of faith James condemned, which sees a brother or sister naked or in want of daily food and says, "Depart in peace, be ye warmed and fed." A faith that ignores human need is dead.

There is also a restricted view of the Gospel that rules out all endeavor for social justice, all interest of the spiritual church in the betterment of the conditions of life for the many. From this standpoint tenement-house reform, minmum wage laws, factory regulation, efforts for war-relief and world peace are alien to the task of Christ's disciples.

Yet Bible chapters like this furnish a challenge and an inspiration to progress in human service. The Gospel has emancipated the slaves, lifted woman to her place as God's child, and fostered democracy in government. It will yet abolish war and poverty. Christ did not acquiesce in the disciples' suggestion, "Preach to them and send them away." When Christ saw they were hungry he commanded his disciples, "Give ye them to eat."

But we are appalled at the extent of the need before us. Just now we have millions of illiterate, unevangelized people living below the normal standard in the land we love. And abroad—chaos! "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them that every one may take a little." We can sympathize with Philip. The task is colossal.

And like Andrew, when we take stock of our resources, our ideals, our abilities, our equipment, we have a sense almost of futility. "What are these among so many?" Like the five loaves where thousands were demanded. Yes, we can sympathize with Andrew too, for our supply seems indeed meager.

"There Is a Lad Here"

A MERE boy saved the situation by willingly offering what he had to the Divine Master. Somebody must make a start. There is no use standing helpless because the case looks hopeless. Let us do what we can, however inadequate it seems. And we never know when some boy is on hand who is going to be used of the Heavenly Father to solve the problems of which we despair. Somewhere there is now the lad who may lead this great republic through a mighty crisis forty years hence. Who is teaching him true religion? Somewhere, perchance, there is a lad who under God will find a cure for cancer or tuberculosis. Will he be acquainted with the Great Physician? It is a great privilege which we can share with Andrew, of leading some youth to Christ, of finding for some one his life task. The Sunday school teacher should appreciate the privilege of guiding the minds entrusted to him. There may be another Luther in your class! At least "there is a lad there" who can bring his contribution to the Christ, for the blessing of the world.

It was a red-letter day in a boy's life. His offering was accepted, blessed, multiplied. Let us not fail to make the decision days and the consecration vows of our young people significant and memorable. It is a high day when a youth pledges his life to the bringing in of Christ's Kingdom.

We Can If We Must

GIVE ye them to eat? But we can't, we can't, that is our cry. Our ability is insufficient, the need is staggering. But quietly, firmly, Christ responds, "Give ye." When we do what we can, the Almighty supplements our efforts. Man's extremity is God's opportunity. But we must do what we can. Then the offering grows under the divine touch until sufficient. There is no excuse for withholding our contribution because it is small. As in this case, we never know to what our small contribution may lead. When the ten ministers of Connecticut laid their little piles of books on the table "for the beginning of a university," who could have imagined the present library at Yale of four hundred thousand volumes, and the stately halls that surround it? It was an act of faith indeed that saw in those few books the mighty college of the future. When Adoniram Judson entered Burma his offering was less than the lad's loaves and fishes when compared with the misery and heathenism of its dusky millions. But now self-supporting and self-propagating churches dot the land.

Unnumbered are the illustrations of a heroic faith offering to the compassionate Saviour its utmost, however small, which, accepted, miraculously multiplies to the feeding of the multitudes. Many of us have witnessed the transformation of the tenements since Jacob Riis set his soul to the amelioration of conditions on New York's East Side. George Müller sees the distressed multitudes of orphans in England, lambs unshepherded, and in 1836 he launches his orphanage on faith. By 1875 "two thousand children were being lodged, fed and educated, without a shilling of endowment, without a committee, without organization, by funds drawn from all parts of the world" (A. T. Pierson). Last month I heard from Kurnool,

This New Range
Is A Wonder
For Cooking

Although it is less than four feet long it can do every kind of cooking for any ordinary family by gas in warm weather, or by coal or wood when the kitchen needs heating.

There is absolutely no danger in this combination, as the gas section is as entirely separate from the coal section as if placed in another part of the kitchen.

South India, a mission station having "seven pastors, seven evangelists, forty-eight teachers and one colporteur, all but one of these young men educated and trained in our mission school. These are the men who are carrying the burdens of the work, without murmur or complaint, in a spirit of unselfish devotion." Tell that to your friend who thinks modern missions are not a success!

What a lesson of economy here in the gathering up of the fragments that nothing be lost! We are actually careless in adminstering what we have. In our homes, in our pleasures, in our business activities we do well to heed the careful Christ. Food is being wasted, for which little children starve. Money is squandered in indulgence for which worthy causes cry aloud. In the railroad yards and at the great marketing centers heaps of produce waste and rot through faulty distribution and unregulated speculation. Yet millions are underfed in this land of plenty, and millions are harassed by anxiety for their loved ones.

Sunday School Methods

By Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Observe Promotion Sunday

THE first Sunday in October, the first Sunday in January, or Children's Day in June, are the days usually thought of for the promotion of scholars from department to department or from class to class. More and more schools are emphasizing this important step in the religious education of the scholar, as the public schools emphasize it as a step in secular education.

The word "promotion" is often applied to the passing of a scholar from one grade to another within the department, and the word "graduation" to the scholar's passing from one department to another. The time for the promotion or graduation may be Sunday morning or evening, as a part of the church service, or a week day evening. If on Sunday, the scholars should be assembled by departments or classes. These classes or departments, in the presence of the congregation, respond with the drill work on the Bible books, divisions and sub-divisions, Bible characters, recitation of Psalms and other selected Scripture, as well as the hymns learned as a part of the memory work of the year. Bibles and certificates of promotion presented under these circumstances have added values. Bibles are often presented to all Primary scholars as they pass to the Junior class or department. When the graduation exercises are held during the week, much more can be made of the event, and great enthusiasm aroused on the part of scholars, teachers, parents and friends, especially if the affair is adequately advertised in the local press.

In the country Sunday school or the one in the village, Children's Day, Rally Day, or a week evening could be given to the exercises, parents invited, and the place decorated in leaves or wild flowers. Assuming at least one class each of the Primary, Junior, Intermediate, Senior and Adult age, even if there are only a few in a class, certificates can be presented, tied in colors. The pastor or superintendent can address the graduates. Recognition may be given those who have done the Bible or hymn memorizing work, and these hymns and Scripture can be recited, papers read on Bible characters, with some Bible drill on the names and division of Bible books.

Scholars will have a larger respect for the Sunday school which in such ways takes its work seriously, and plans to make the largest use of these stepping-stones in character-making.

THE Slater Industrial School for colored people at Winston-Salem, N. C., is doing a very efficient work among the poor, handicapped, untaught negroes of the South. It has school buildings that cost $65,000 and is now endeavoring to raise a fund to extend the work, which is too small for its growing needs. The state of North Carolina has offered to give $12,000 to the trustees, conditional on their raising a like amount. Contributions can be sent to the Christian Herald in aid of this worthy institution.

Extras You Want In a Car

Mitchell cars offer you hundreds of extras, paid for by factory efficiency. They include
31 Extra Features
24% Added Luxury
100% Over-Strength

Many of these things are found in no other car. Many, when found, cost a too-high price.

They come to you in Mitchells, at a modest price, because of John W. Bate. Because this mammoth factory has been built and equipped to produce this one type economically. And because 98 per cent of the Mitchell — bodies included — is built under Bate methods here.

You Want Double Strength

In this year's Mitchells, for the first time, we announce 100 per cent over-strength. All important parts are twice as strong as need be.

To this end, many parts are oversize. Over 440 parts are built of toughened steel. Parts which meet a major strain are built of Chrome-Vanadium.

Gears are tested for 50,000 pounds per tooth. Bate cantilever springs have been so perfected that in two years not a single spring has broken.

The result means safety, low upkeep, endurance. And probably a lifetime car.

Unique Attractions

Mitchells have 31 extras which other cars omit. They are things you need and want. On this year's output we spend $4,000,000 to include them.

And this year we add 24 per cent to the cost of finish, upholstery and trimming. That out of savings made in our new body plant. This brings Mitchells to the farthest limit in luxury and beauty.

These things are due to John W. Bate, the great efficiency expert. He has spent years in our plant to accomplish them. He has spent millions of dollars to build and equip it rightly. He has traveled the world to get other men's ideas.

The result is by far the greatest value offered in any fine car. Here you get the highest standard in motordom at a modest price.

Also $1150 Now

This year Mitchell Junior —simply a smaller Mitchell Six—offers you also an $1150 car. As roomy and powerful as you need for five passengers — larger than most such cars. So you have your choice of a car for seven or five.

The Genuine — packed this way
for your protection

This is the master package. In it are packed 12 rings—each ring in its own sealed container (see point 1).

This Package Covers Five Points of Protection

1 It is your protection against substitution when you buy Leak-Proof Piston Rings. The genuine—the McQuay-Norris manufacture—are packed, individually, in these plainly labeled, sealed parchment containers.

2 It protects the garage and repair man from having palmed off on him inefficient, imitation rings which are substituted when Leak-Proof is asked for, with the purpose of deceiving him into thinking he is getting the genuine—substitute rings which, should he sell them to you, would hurt his reputation for fair dealing and mechanical knowledge and skill.

3 The package protects the rings themselves from rust and the effects of rough handling while in stock. Delivers them to you just as they left the factory—perfect in fit and finish, accurate to 1/1000 of an inch. This micro-metric care in manufacture is the McQuay-Norris method of ensuring 100% efficiency: its preservation is your protection.

4 This package covers the one piston ring that protects motor efficiency. Protects motor life because its light, equal tension minimizes wear of cylinder walls. Protects power because it prevents power leakage and ensures minimum carbonization.

5 Protects you in the matter of price. Every McQuay-Norris Leak-Proof Piston Ring is sold at a definite price. Imitations get the price of the genuine, or more if possible—otherwise they'll take less. Their prices are no more standard than their quality. Whatever you pay for them you pay too much.

Take Full Advantage of this Protection

As an assurance of getting the genuine, have your garage or repair man send you the empty containers—one container for each ring—with his bill.

Questions and Answers

W. F. R., Janelew, W. Va. "Please tell me whether there is a conflict between Matt. 25 : 34 and John 14 : 2."

There is no conflict here. The "kingdom" prepared for the elect, as described in Matt. 25, is referred to in a similar sense to the "mansions" spoken of in John 14. In the latter passage Christ uses "my Father's house," not as distinguishing heaven from earth, but rather as a description of the whole universe as an abiding-place of the Father and of the elect. The Father is with his children wherever they may be, here on earth as well as in heaven.

J. R. G., Dover, N. J. The word "few," in I Peter 3 : 20, means that so few as eight, which was regarded as a very small number, were saved.

Seeker After Truth. 1. The passage in Matt. 18 : 8, 9, has been well explained by a commentator thus: "In view of the woe to come, remove all causes of offense in thyself." Here the reference is to whatever in us, however dear or necessary, which would lead us astray, or sever our fellowship with Christ. The hand denoted aptitude for government, the foot for exertion, the eye for knowledge, all in spiritual matters. The context suggests that all these members (representing talents, et cetera) should be used, not for purposes of pride, but to the edification of the little ones. 2. In Matt. 21 : 9-16 there is described the wonderful reception Jesus received from the people of Jerusalem, who hailed him as the Messiah. Probably a majority of them cherished political hopes. Many were truly sincere, and when even the children took up the cry, Christ himself, in rebuking the Pharisees, took cognizance of the sincerity and ardor of his followers, and referred to the incident as a fulfilment of Ps. 8 : 2—"Out of the mouths of babes," et cetera.

Subscriber. Your first question is controversial. The passage in Rev. 13 : 18, about the number of the Beast, has been often discussed. Commentators hold the view that the Beast typifies the Antichristian world-power. It has the semblance of Christianity, but it is spurious, and quickly discloses its Antichristianity. Some old time authorities have held that the mark of the beast was the brand of the ivy leaf with which Antiochus Epiphanes branded the Jews; others have interpreted it as the sign of popery, and have pointed out that the Greek letters of the word "Lateinos" contain the mystical number 666.

C. L. B., Roanoke, Ind. If you have wronged any one, and the way is still open to make restitution, you should confess to the person wronged and make such reparation as will set you right. This does not mean restitution of money or other valuables only, but also includes restitution of love, obedience, respect, et cetera. It is also very often helpful to consult some friend of large Christian experience as to those things which trouble you—little or big failings, weaknesses, et cetera. Otherwise let your confession be to God, and he, who sees all and knows the heart, will show you how to rid yourself of "morbid tendencies," as you call them. Any one who is at all concerned about the right and wrong of things, and particularly one who, like you, is fearful lest she be not good enough, is on the right road and has no cause for morbid fears.

P. S. B. The law of pardon is the same throughout the Gosepls and all the Scriptures. There is but one way of salvation—through acceptance of Christ and his atonement.

G. S. R., Fredericksburg, Va. Capital punishment and life imprisonment are two subjects on which intelligent opinion is greatly divided. From a purely humanitarian point of view, it would seem that the very worst use to which a man could be put is to kill him, and that no one has the right to take away that which he cannot restore—the life itself. From a Christian point of view, the legal killing of a man may cut off his opportunity for all eternity. On the other hand, society must be protected, and until the world becomes very much better than it now is, crimes of violence will continue and must of necessity be guarded against and punished. A too pronounced humanitarianism, which would shrink at inflicting capital punishment, would remove the main deterrment to crime. Still, we should not forget that there are countries in which capital punishment has been abolished for a long time past. In France, within recent years, the death penalty was virtually suspended for some eight years through the exercise of presidential clemency. M. Falliéres was personally opposed to capital punishment, and the Socialistic-Radical party was pledged to bring about its abolition. During the last two years of this period of clemency, however, public sentiment was stirred by a series of revolting murders and a general increase of crime. This condition was so startling that the Chamber (that is, the French Assembly) voted by 330 to 201 to reestablish the death penalty. In Holland, Italy and Portugal, the death penalty was abolished by statute. Probably under war conditions the situation has materially changed. In the United States capital punishment was abolished in Maine in 1876, restored in 1883, and again abolished in 1887; abolished by Michigan in 1847, by Rhode Island in 1852, by Wisconsin in 1853.

Jennie L. T., Oakland, Calif., writes: "In a recent issue of the Christian Herald I read the morning prayer suggested by H. W. Roth. May I also suggest the following, which I not only say in the morning but find myself repeating frequently through the day?

"Dear heavenly Father, thou hast kept
My soul in safety while I slept;
Still guard and guide me while awake,
For Jesus my Redeemer's sake. Amen."

M. E. L., Somersworth, N. H. The spirit of religious intolerance is altogether out of place in a land like ours, which guarantees religious liberty and freedom of worship to all.

Y. T., Argyle, N. Y. The first three words of the first chapter of Genesis, "In the beginning," are in themselves sufficient to show that an indefinite period of time is meant. The chronology compiled by Archbishop Ussher (1580-1656), and which is found in the margin of many reference Bibles, is not to be interpreted as showing that the work of creation took place 6,000 years ago, as many have supposed.

D. C. H., Elk Lake, Pa. "In the editorial page of November 22, you refer to the Lackawanna Steel Company requesting exemption from the observance of the law requiring one day's rest in seven for its workers. I remember reading, years ago, that in France a law was passed making the day of rest one day in ten, but finally repealed, as it was found that it did not allow the workmen rest enough. Therefore, the law was changed to be one day in seven."

The law to which our correspondent refers was passed during the French Revolution, and was abolished with the calendar adopted by the revolutionists, when they returned to the observance of the Christian Sabbath.

Mrs. N. F. Holloway, Box 245, Wakefield, R. I., asks that some one send her the address of her son, Robert C. Holloway.

E. H. B., Haverhill, Mass., sends this suggestion: "The fourth day of March this year will be Sunday, the Lord's day. I have not looked it up to see how long ago the date of a President's inauguration came on Sunday. Might it not be a good thing to recommend and encourage that the coming fourth of March be marked, not in any way specially as the Presidential inaugural date, but as the day to remember and more devoutly worship and exalt the King of kings and Lord of lords?"

Mrs. G. G. B., Maypearl, Texas. All of your money is a part of the Lord's treasury, and you are only its steward. You are to use it, as you are to use your life, according as you believe it will best serve his purposes. It is not so much the amount you give as the spirit in which you give by which the faithfulness of your service is to be judged. The widow's mite was little in the eyes of men, but much in the sight of God, because her real gift was the gift of her whole heart. The gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh brought to the feet of the Christ-child meant nothing except for the spirit of the bringing. The millionaire who gives a million dollars, but gives it cold of heart and without genuine sympathy, is giving less to humanity and to God than is the penniless man who merely binds up another's wounds. The rich young man was told by Christ to sell all and give to the poor, for his own sake, because his riches were keeping his heart carnal. From the heart that is right, benefactions will flow in a stream sweet and pure, even if it must be small; but from the heart that is hard and cold, though a lake of gold be let loose, it will be unavailing, because polluted.

G. W. R., Rusk, Texas. The Old Testament preaching was one of repentance, looking to the coming of the Messiah; the New is a preaching of repentance because the Messiah has come. The old covenant remains in all its beauty; by the new covenant we are received into fellowship with him who died for us.

LEPAGE'S GLUE 10c
THE HANDY MAN ABOUT THE HOUSE

Eighteen Creeds in One

A FEDERATED church, in which eighteen denominations are worshiping harmoniously, seems to be solving the small town problem in Atascadero, San Luis Obispo County, California. In other places a federated church means the uniting of bodies already organized, while here the plan came in response to the popular wish of the people that there be, from the beginning, but one church. Atascadero, it should be said, is a colony, ten miles long and seven miles wide, founded a few years ago by Mr. E. G. Lewis.

The church was organized in July, 1915, by the pastor, Dr. Edward A. Berry, a brother of Bishop F. Berry of the Methodist Church. Dr. Berry made a systematic canvass of the colonists and found but one who opposed the idea. When the book of the church was opened for signatures, 120 members were enrolled. In less than a year the membership went to 250.

The following denominations are represented: Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, Evangelical Association, Freewill Baptist, Friends, Disciples of Christ, Lutheran, Methodist Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, South, Presbyterian, Presbyterian, South, United Presbyterian, Unifed Brethren, Universalist, Unitarian, Spiritualist, Roman Catholic.

It would, of course, be impossible to federate on a basis of doctrine, and such is not attempted. The federation is on a basis of service, and on that basis it works splendidly. Great care is taken to keep the edge of any wedge of discord from entering and destroying the ideal which the church has before it. This ideal is a community socially and religiously united for the building up of the Kingdom of God.

Dr. Berry says about it: "If this movement is not of God it will fail. If God is in it, and if it is the working out of his plan, it may prove to be the opening of a new era in the history of the church." It might be said of him that he gave up his pulpit work at one time to become a professor in the Atlantic Theological Seminary. Later he was identified with the home missionary department of the Congregational Church, in the work that denomination is doing in federating small denominational units in small towns into strong churches of an undenominational character.

The benevolences of the church are all directed toward helping the needy in the lands suffering from war.

The constitution of the Federated Church of Atascadero is as follows:

1. This organization shall be known as "The Federated Church of Atascadero."
2. Its object shall be to federate in one body all of the forces which work for righteousness in this community.
3. Membership in this church shall be open to all who are already identified with the various existing denominations, without in any way interfering with their theological opinions or their present church affiliations, as well as to all who are willing to subscribe their names to the standard approved by Christ, the Master Teacher, whom we all recognize as the head of the Church Universal, viz.: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, . . . and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."—Matt. 22 : 37, 40.
4. The officers of this church shall be: First, a board of directors, who shall care for the temporal interests of the church. Second, a board of deacons, who shall care for the spiritual interests of the church; and a minister or leader.
5. All officers of this church shall be elected by ballot, according to the by-laws of this organization to be hereafter adopted.

Thus it will be seen that the creed of this church is simple but comprehensive—Love of God and love of fellow man.

W. J. BURTSCHER.

What of John Goode?

FEW autobiographies published in recent years and dealing with the miracle of grace which transforms the heart and life of the sinner have attracted more attention or elicited more cordial approval than "The Wicked John Goode." The publication in a recent issue of the Christian Herald of a letter from a New Hampshire reader, calling in question the wisdom and spiritual profit of publishing the characters of bad men in connection with the operation of the Holy Spirit in their redemption, has stirred up a number of other readers to send us their views on the subject. We are glad to publish these letters, and will be equally pleased to give space to the opposite view in such a controversy. John Goode's story is one that needs no defense at our hands; it is one of the greatest and most convincing object-lessons, showing that we have a Saviour who "saves to the uttermost." We give some of these letters below:

"I have read the comment on John Goode by a reader in New Hampshire, questioning the wisdom and spiritual profit to be derived from such characters. Well, I differ and hold the contrary. His story warns others from traveling the same path. It shows that 'the way of the transgressor is hard,' and it glorifies God, who is able to save to the uttermost. I thank you very much for the story.
"Peterson, Minn. J. C. D."

"I have just finished reading the story of 'The Wicked John Goode.' What a mighty struggle with the demon drink, rising and falling, again and again, at last gaining the victory, by the grace of God, through the instrumentality of Dr. Hallimond and the other noble men who took him by the hand, calling him 'brother,' patiently bearing with his backslidings and not casting him off as a hopeless case! Surely there will be stars in their crowns for their noble work! And now John Goode, redeemed and cleansed, is trying to lead others to the Cross and to accept his Saviour as their Saviour. May God bless the Bowery Mission, where many a degraded one has been happily saved and restored to loved ones! Dr. Hallimond and his helpers have many discouragements, but courage and patience and a friendly hand and an earnest prayer bring their reward.
"Troy, N. Y. SUBSCRIBER."

"I looked forward from week to week to the story of John Goode. Now that it is finished, I, with others, want to change his name to 'John Did Me Good.' It is a wonderful account of sin at its worst and salvation at its best. It is not every one upon whose mind experiences make such a vivid impression that they can afterward be described so tellingly.
"Wyncote, Pa. LAURENCE S."

"The serial, 'John Goode,' is the best thing in a long time. It is a great demonstration of what divine grace can do, and it should be a great help and encouragement to the faithful workers of the Bowery Mission and its supporters.
"Richland, N. Y. L. F."

"Was surprised when I read in an editorial in your last week's issue that any one could read that wonderful life history of John Goode and not receive good. I have been wondering how many more Christian people there are who, thrown among evil companions from the time they were little children, on through life for years and years, would hold nothing back but let it stand as a warning to the young, and also for the good of every one, in the way John Goode has done. Even those in our churches, who think they have always been good, and we who pride ourselves on being better than others, may profit by such a lesson.

"When I finished reading 'John Goode' there were tears of joy in my eyes, because his dear wife was rewarded for her faithfulness by living to see her husband turn from the black road of sin to the golden road of life everlasting.

"I have carefully saved the twelve copies of the paper that give the interesting account of the life story of John Goode, and would be so glad if the Christian Herald could give it in book form. I would like to give such a book to others as a present. Many would like to have the story in a book.

"Sylvan, Pa. ANNIE M. G."

"I read with interest the story of John Goode, and also the criticism in the Christian Herald of January 24. I cannot see that the story should have detrimental effect on any one. It shows the young where sin leads to, and is a warning to them. To the sinner who is in despair, it is an encouragement to turn to Him who came to seek and save that which is lost. I attended the Pacific Garden Mission in Chicago, and found that the testimony of the saved is the greatest incentive to bring others to Christ.
"Arlington Heights, Ill. W. B. S."

"I am glad that the wicked John is a new creature, and ready to help others who have suffered the agony of sins unconfessed.
"Gates Mills, Ohio. MRS. M."

"I have just read the last chapter of 'The Wicked John Goode.' I do not care for continued stories, even in religious papers, but this has been an exception. I only wish there was more of it. It has made my heart overflow with joy to know that God is so good while men are so wicked, and that he is long-suffering while men continue in sin. This has been one of the most interesting things I have ever read. I love to read about men being saved from sin. I think it would be a good thing if this story could be brought out in book form. I am sending this [$5], and hope and pray that it may be used to God's glory in saving some men who are down and out and making them useful men, clean, sober and honest—men who, after they have been saved, will be the means of the salvation of others. Second, that it may help to give those hungry men some food. I do not know what it means to be hungry; but I do hope I hunger to be a better man. Also if it may help warm some poor, cold fellow, the sending of this will be a joy to me. May the Lord use it to make some heart as glad as mine. May he greatly bless the Bowery Mission and its noble workers. Pray for me.
"Haines, Ore. C. W. H."

"The story of John Goode should be put in book form and sent broadcast over New York and every other city in the United States. It is such lives in their saddest, blackest, most pitiful phase, which are underlying all the other strata of society—one that the business world should stamp out in its own interests. The suggestion made by John Goode—that there be places provided where a man, down and out, could get a clean 'pad' to sleep on and sanitary conditions in which to wash for 10 cents a night (and that could be made to pay expenses) should be looked into and acted on. To walk the streets in thin clothing all night rather than sleep (or only lie down under cover), and to get up nauseated with foul air and alive with vile vermin, is enough to force a man to spend his next 5 cents in a drink. The very repulsion of even such wretches shows there is a spark of decency left.

"Cannot the Christian Herald air the idea? Will not some one take the place of Jacob Riis, and start the movement? I will head the list with $10, and help till it is on a paying basis—though I am old and poor.
"Newark, N. J. FRIEND."

It will gladden many hearts to know that John Goode is telling to audiences in churches of different denominations the story of his wonderful transformation and is everywhere received with cordial appreciation. Pastors are writing to us, arranging for their congregations to hear the story of this new messenger of grace. It is one which cannot fail to inspire any Christian audience with the desire to follow the example of the Master, and to go out into the "highways and byways" to find the lost. This is an essential part of the true mission of the Church of Christ, and John Goode is proving a most efficient helper.

DEALERS, ATTENTION! Hardware dealers, automobile supply dealers and general stores will find a ready and continuous sale for the Louden Garage Door Hanger. It is now extensively used and our national advertising campaign will give a tremendous impetus to the demand for this hanger. Don't miss sales by failing to stock it. Write us today.

It Meets Every Condition Perfectly—Convenience, Safety, Space Economy, Beauty of Design, Ease of Operation, Permanence, Cheapness.

The door is made in three panels, stoutly hinged together, supported by swiveled, roller-bearing trolleys which operate on a continuous steel track.

The track extends across the door opening, inside, and along the adjoining wall, curved at the corner. The door slides smoothly around the corner—doesn't cut off an inch of valuable space—and when open lies flat against the side wall, out of the way.

When closed, it fits snug and tight. Everything is inside out of the weather, and free from obstructions of all kinds.

The Louden-hung Garage Door overcomes the disadvantages of clumsy swinging doors and posts in the yard, and solves permanently the problem of the inside sliding garage door.

A Door Within a Door

An extremely valuable feature of the Louden-hung Garage Door is the hinged section, which makes a separate foot entrance unnecessary. A small door for the man and a large door for the car, all in one, is an exclusive, Louden-patented feature—absolutely new in garage door construction.

Because of the room it saves, the convenience it affords, and the lasting satisfaction you will derive from it, you will find the Louden Garage Door Hanger a highly profitable investment.

A Remarkable New Wood Finish
Lucas
VELVO-TONE FINISH
For All Woodwork and Furniture

Stains, Varnishes and Produces Hand-Rubbed Effect in One Operation

Lucas Velvo-Tone Finish combines in a single operation what was formerly three separate pieces of work. No longer is it necessary to stain the wood, then varnish it, then rub it down by hand to produce the soft, dull finish. Velvo-Tone in one operation does all three; cuts out most of the work and a great part of the expense of the universally popular hand-rubbed effect.

The Fashionable Dull Finished Woodwork Now Within the Reach of Every One

The present day demand is mostly for the soft finish. Highly varnished woodwork is quite out of vogue. But heretofore the cost of this newer dull finish has been quite prohibitive, the different operations required and the tedious hand-rubbing putting it beyond the reach of the average home. Now in every house the woodwork can be Velvo-Toned throughout; given the same velvety effect which the most expensively finished woodwork has.

All the Furniture Can Be Modernized With VELVO-TONE

Furniture and woodwork—new or old—can be perfectly harmonized by Velvo-Tone. Tables, dressers, chairs, desks, any piece of furniture with the out-of-date high polish or Mission effect can be made to look new and attractive by this easily applied finish. It does not require any skill to use it; you can do the work yourself and get excellent results.

If you want to see what Velvo-Tone can do, try a 25c can on a table or chair whose old-fashioned finish has caused it to be discarded. You will find it a transformed piece of furniture. Your dealer will be glad to show you the attractive shades in which Velvo-Tone comes. If you do not know where to get Velvo-Tone, send us 25c for a can large enough to finish two chairs. Mention color desired: Old Oak, Golden Oak, Fumed Oak, Weathered Oak, Mahogany, Cherry Fruit, Zarina Green, Black Flemish, Natural.

Folder on how and where to use Velvo-Tone—free on request.

"Pound of Nails, Please"

WHO knows what they keep in a hardware store? The hardware dealers of the seaboard states, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, were quite certain that most housewives did not realize the real inclusiveness of a hardware stock, so they decided that instead of having the exhibit in connection with their annual convention a purely trade affair, they would bring the convention to New York and open in Madison Square Garden a Hardware Exposition and Home Efficiency Show which would be open to the public, and which would be designed to show the housewife the really intimate relation between the hardware store and modern housekeeping.

As might be expected in any hardware show, the hammer and the screwdriver, the chisel and the plane, the file and the saw were very much in evidence. But there were also stoves of every degree, fitted for burning all the fuels known to civilization. There were the old-style kitchen pans, and there were the new-style pans of aluminum, and even pans of glass; and while these latter pans were transparent, it was somewhat difficult to get near enough to see through them, partly perhaps because a really good-looking young woman was demonstrating the peculiar virtues of this oven glassware.

Then there were ice-cream freezers and refrigerators, cements for mending sudden leaks, vacuum sweepers galore, and machines for grinding meats, and machines which would make it unnecessary for kitchen knives to be sharpened on the edge of a convenient crock. In addition to all these machines, there were patent slicers for producing wonderful effects on ordinary vegetables, and there were washing-machines, which must not be omitted from the modern outfit.

Last but not least, there were lanterns of ancient designs, as well as the most modern flash-lights which make it possible to go into the dark recesses of the vegetable cellar at night after that particularly choice can of preserves which you have been saving for company, and to get out again without cobwebs on your hair or tangles in your disposition.

To what extent the housewife may have profited by the opening of a trade exposition to the public, it is not possible to state at this writing, but the people packed Madison Square Garden on the first two nights of the Exposition.

AS a matter of prosaic fact, there is hardly a more fascinating retail store than a well-kept hardware store. It is one of the odd things about human nature that we turn ourselves into exclamation marks as soon as we get inside an exposition hall and walk about its miles of aisles, gazing at things that are really very familiar to us. It is the effect produced by immensity; immensity of the hall and of the number of exhibits and of the crowds. Down the street, a few blocks from our own door, we can find almost everything strictly in the hardware line in the local store. It isn't the merchant's fault that he can't turn the store into a show place and give every individual item of his stock an electric light. It's our fault if we permit him (whether he be a hardware man or a grocery man or a druggist, or what he may be) to invest his money in the things he knows we want, and then do our buying in some huge emporium miles away.

One of the finest movements that could be built up in this country would be one that would stimulate local trade. There are enough right-minded people already in every town about whom such a movement would grow. They patronize the home stores. Perhaps sometimes they pay a trifle more for a thing in money, but they pay infinitely less in time and convenience. As a rule, retail merchants need very little encouragement to add to their stock the things that their customers demand. The whole thing works in a circle, benefiting everybody the circle touches: yourself, your neighbor who keeps the store, your town council who wants the town to grow, your institutions—church, school, library, and whatever depends upon local support to be at its best—everything in your town prospers when you spend your money at home.

THROAT Troubles ARE Dangerous

even when they are not of malignant type, because they show disordered bodily conditions.

Scott's Emulsion is a valuable aid in nature's own method of correction in many such cases.

Its cod liver oil is speedily converted into germ-resisting tissue—the glycerine is curative and healing, while the combined emulsion upbuilds the forces to avert the weakness which always accompanies throat trouble.

SCOTT'S EMULSION is good for three important reasons—it imparts strength; hastens relief of the trouble; it is not charged with alcohol.

Shun substitutes and insist on Scott's.

Young People's Topics for March 4

Service Consecration Meeting

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. James 1 : 19–27

JAMES was a practical man. Nowadays we have a lot of folks who try to justify their opposition to every enterprise that requires faith on the ground that they are practical. James wasn't practical that way; but he believed thoroughly in a religion that did something. He had little use for a faith that was tucked away out of sight in the private inside pocket of the believer's heart and could only be told about. He wanted action impelled by faith. He saw vital belief in those only who, hearing the word, became doers of the work. A great many people don't like to read the book of James; it jars on their sensibilities, which are much more tender in some cases than their sense of duty is strong; but the world—the great, outside, unconverted world agrees, completely and whole heartedly, with the view James has so clearly expressed. Do you know of a church that is growing rapidly, at whose altars souls are being saved? There are many such, and they are churches that are doing things, churches made up of people saved for service, for sacrifice, too, if need be. Service is becoming a big word in the church and out. Stores are advertising service, public utility companies are emphasizing service, church work is being reorganized along lines of community service, and the faith that is without works—is still dead.

Epworth League Topic. Acts 20 : 18–21, 26, 27, 33–38

EVERY day we lay by a folio of memories. Every act, every thought, every purpose, makes its permanent impress on the sensitive clay of memory, and the impress can never be wholly removed. If we do an unworthy deed, if we live or act or speak a lie, if we steal another's time or money, if we seek an unfair advantage in trade or employment, we may think we can do it and "get away with it." We can, for it "gets away with us," and we can't shake it. The memory of it will follow us like a faithful dog, ever at our heels. If we have sworn to the fact to our own disadvantage, if we have lived, acted and spoken only the truth, if we have been square and aboveboard in our work and play, if we have done good, have shown mercy and have loved men because Jesus first loved them and us, our days will store up memories which will strengthen us in the day of our opportunity, even as evil memories would weaken us, and they will glorify with an increasing radiance each new day through which we live. Good living, good company, good books and days spent in the open, are all sources of memories which accumulate in blessing as the years advance.

A man in a certain city was suddenly stricken down. He had had wealth and position and had been considered a bit austere. But when the news of his death spread over the city, it met an unusual response. A poor widow came weeping to place a single rose upon his casket. He had canceled the mortgage on her little home. An old soldier, leaning heavily on his cane, came for one last look at the man who had been his friend. From all over the city came the old, the poor, the crippled, not persons known to the charity organizations, but people who were making an honest fight against hard conditions. Unknown to his associates this man had been a friend to hundreds, and whatever memories he may have taken with him over yonder, his memory remained, revered and honored, in the hearts of many he had helped or encouraged.

Eighty-one Years a Teacher

SUNDAY school teachers do not seem, generally speaking, to stick to their charge so tenaciously as Mrs. Anna M. Bruen, who teaches the Ladies' Bible Class in the First Presbyterian Sunday school, Belvidere, N. J. Mrs. Bruen was born March 22, 1822, and is now more than ninety-four years of age. She began teaching in Sunday school eighty-one years ago, when a mere girl of but twelve years of age, and has been a Sunday school teacher continuously, Sabbath after Sabbath, ever since. Her record for punctuality is quite as remarkable, for during all these years she has seldom missed meeting her class on time each Sabbath; only on account of quite infrequent illness. One summer, on account of a severe fall, Mrs. Bruen was unable to go to the Sunday school to teach her class, but, at her request, the members came to "the Manse," where she taught them in her sick room—and nearly every Sabbath morning during this period reported a full-roll attendance. It is said that every woman teacher in this entire Sunday school has been drawn from Mrs. Bruen's Bible class.

Mrs. Bruen is still a student of the Bible and of methods, and attends Sunday school Chautauquas, institutes and summer schools. Her example is a verification of the truism that when Sunday school teachers stop studying the Bible it is time for them to stop teaching. Her testimony is that the office of Sunday school teacher is the choicest privilege that any Christian has.

Back in the thirties, when Mrs. Bruen began to teach, the "burning of black stones" for fuel was a late innovation; students and teachers did not "burn the midnight oil" then, because houses were lighted with home-made tallow candles; and Sunday school lesson helps were entirely unknown. Primary schools were at that time far from numerous, and the Sunday school teacher's principal task was to teach the rudiments of an education to enable scholars to read the Bible for themselves. Back in those days it was not customary to have heat in church and Sunday school buildings, and the worshipers carried their "foot stoves" to keep their feet from freezing. One of Mrs. Bruen's choice mementoes is the identical "foot stove" which she and her mother used in their constant Sunday school and church attendance.

In addition to teaching her Bible class and directing their week-day activities, Mrs. Bruen also leads a mission study class, composed of some twenty-odd intermediate Sunday school girls, meeting every Sunday morning just before church service. In this mission study class there are represented four generations of the Bruen family: Mrs. Anna M. Bruen, the teacher; Rev. James De Hart Bruen, her son, pastor of the church and superintendent of the Sunday school; Henry Munro Bruen, the leader's grandson, missionary to Korea, and Miss Nan Bruen, the latter's daughter.

Mrs. Bruen avers that her experience as a Sunday school teacher "has taught me not to lean on my own understanding," but to "prayerfully and carefully prepare for the lesson, and then trust results to the Master." At my request she set down six rules which she had found helpful in her work as a Sunday school teacher, the result of her study of Sunday school class work and methods, and which she recommends that teachers observe:

First: Prayer for my scholars.

Second: Visiting their homes, especially absentees.

Third: Being regular and punctual in my attendance.

Fourth: Trying to live what I teach.

Fifth: Loving my scholars, and letting them know that I do.

Sixth: Treating the worst ones as though they were what they ought to be.

Mrs. Bruen is still active in mind and body, and recently said: "One must grow old in years to really enjoy life, for growing old is but entering into a deeper realization of life's privileges, and it also makes one's vision clearer toward a brighter future." C. W. BAINES.

RAYNTITE

The Ideal One-Man Top Material

THE modern one-man top demands light weight. Rayntite single texture top material weighs about half as much as double texture material of equal waterproofness.

It is guaranteed one year against leakage, but built to last the life of the car.

Its strength is ample to stand the strains of service.

Why make your car top heavy, and the "one-man" top a joke, by using material twice as heavy as it needs to be?

Rayntite has been on the market and in active service on thousands of cars for nearly two years. We have yet to receive the first claim under our guarantee.

Now Made in Two Varieties

RAYNTITE No. 1. Single texture with Fabrikoid surface, and RAYNTITE No. 2. Single texture with Fairfield Rubber surface

Each is guaranteed one year against leakage

If the car you are considering is not topped with Rayntite, find out whether you or your wife can really handle the one-man top.

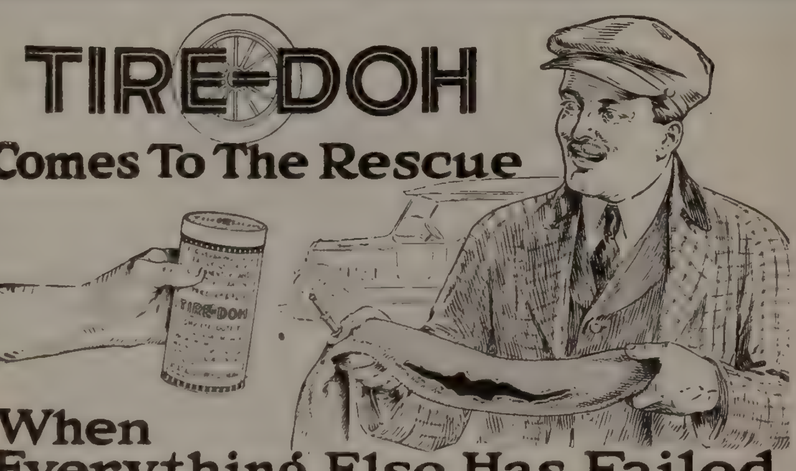
TIRE-DOH Comes To The Rescue



When Everything Else Has Failed

Copyright 1917, Atlas Auto Supply Co., Chicago, U. S. A.

There is no blow-out too large, no tear too ugly, no puncture too small to repair with Tire-Doh. And when other methods prove incompetent, you can bank on Tire-Doh to do the job thoroughly, quickly and economically.

Repairs Biggest Inner Tube Tears TIRE-DOH Lengthens Life of Outer Casings

No heat nor tools are needed to repair your tubes—just Tire-Doh and your fingers. No danger of burning or overcuring the rubber and causing it to crack or leak. Kneaded into casing cuts and sand blisters, Tire-Doh will prevent many a blow-out and add thousands of miles to life of tires.

Not a Tire Filler: Tire-Doh is a secret process compound that becomes an actual and permanent part of the rubber. It stretches with the tube and never loosens.

"At noon we went to the uncle's temple," said Mr. Vories. "The old priest was hardly cordial, but his family made us welcome and served us two with dinner in a guest room. When the food was set down before us by the maid, Chadani San hesitated a moment and then said, 'Will you please pray, as you do at home?' After dinner we entertained the priest's little girls with pencil pictures and stories for a while. That night, we slept at the temple. In the evening two former friends of Chadani talked with us for an hour and a half, during which period they consumed thirty-seven cigarettes. They were boarders at the temple, and showed us a flashlight photograph of a recent social gathering there, in which the old priest sat in the midst of a jolly crowd of young people, a heap of empty bottles in the foreground with the tobacco and cakes, two young men with their arms about painted girls, one of the men drinking liquor from a glass. So, all unconsciously, they were displaying to their visitor the inner life of the temple, just as frankly and unreservedly as the Christian social life in its simplicity had been discovered by the young priest!"

Events followed in rapid order until the time when Chadani, forced to attend a farewell dinner to a departing friend, had the maid substitute tea for saké in his bottle. The ruse was discovered, and Chadani was given the choice of drinking as a Buddhist or going out in disgrace, disinherited of his promising future in the big temple. He chose. Later, when he returned to his island for a visit, he was imprisoned. Mr. Vories, with an interest in a new recruit that does not distinguish all missionaries, took the long railway journey to Hachiman and through an assistant freed the young man and took him away from the island, where every man knew about the case and where the sampan men had been forced to refuse passage to Chadani San.

Chadani has become an effective evangelist, with a mighty longing to save his whole island for Christ. For a year he has been in the army. Three letters from him to "Mother Vories" are sufficient to show that he has learned the fundamental lesson that the missionary to the Orient finds most necessary in the Christianization of the East—that Christianity is a life and not a preachment.

Soon after Chadani was drafted for the army, Mr. Vories and Mr. Yoshida called on him. I shall transcribe first Chadani San's letter to the former, without correction:

"December 13, 1915.

"Dear Sir: Thank you very much for your to-day's coming and Mr. Yoshida. My some officers corled me for your name and he thinks very qurious for your coming and he sed, "He is a foriner, but he is a very kindness, I think" and I sed you are my brother so that you are come to me, but he is very qurious for my anser and he asked, "Why he is your brother? I think he is American and you are a Japanese" and I anser our are son of our God so that we are brother together. If he is American, he is liveig in God country and he and I berived our God so that he is my brother, and he is very qurious for this answer. Yours truly, "Reijyo Chadani."

This letter came within six months of the time that Chadani San first met Mr. Vories. World brotherhood is not always taught so quickly.

The day after Mr. Vories's visit, Chadani San opened his heart to Mother Vories in this naïve letter, written on two postcards:

"December 14, 1915.

"Dear My Mother: Thank you very much for your 7 inst. Now I am very well and all-time I pray for our God and when I have freely time I am reading your last letter and Mr. Vories's and Mrs. Waterhouse's so that I think I am not forgot my English.

"Last day Mr. Vories came here and I was very happy for this meeting and I wish to see your good smiling face. But now I can not go back to your home but 4 months after I will go out anywhere I think.

"To-day one soldier must go in guard-house, who is this month into our army and I think very sorry so that I ofered to my officer while he will into guard-house I will stay there with him and I will help hem and by and by believe my God and I think he will be soon good Christian and I must make him. But now my officers are conference about my ofered. If this things be make it my officer's decision soon I will go and help him.

"But there is very cold place and eating only small and can not dress our kimono and when we sleep we can not take bed or covering. But, my mother, I must obey our God and I must take my cross so that I will go and help him. But my mother, our God with me alltime, so that I am very happy and alltime I smiling if this things maked it.

"This is very great question for our Christian and soon many people belived our Godway. Please pray for this question and I will make it. Please take care of your health and I wish to say best words for your family and Mrs. Waterhouse. Your son,

"CHADANI."

The soldier was being imprisoned for being homesick—a poor twenty-year-old lad—and Chadani thought friendship would help as much as bedless sleep and "eating only small," and the result of the conference was that the officers, in a strongly militaristic country, refused to allow Chadani to suffer with his friend, but decided to release the soldier entirely. Chadani bent his shoulders to receive the cross and turned to find it was not there. His spelling is poor and his English faulty, but for six months' Christian his Christian belief is not bad. Thanks, prayer, happiness, sacrifice and love are shown in a single letter.

His letters are gems, but one more must suffice. In it he turns over his first army convert to Omi Mission:

"November 20, 1916.

"My dear Mother: Thank you very much for your good letter. Now we are very busy so that can not write so many time but 2 or 3 day will pass we will get time to write to you.

"Soon new army member will into this army like last year I was into army and then people have many anxias for army workes. I will teach them for our Father's way and teach them will come into Omi Mission.

"Mr. Yokouchi will go out 23th of this month and that day of 9.5 A. M. will busit your home and tell for our Army and my now workes. And next month first he will live in your home so that please teach him for Father. He is very kindly man and very lively young man. God take care of yourself and please pray for me. Your son, "CHADANI."

In such simple words the young soldier turned over his lieutenant to his friend of seventeen months for Christian instruction and service.

Not long ago I was bearding in his lair a confirmed enemy to missionaries, and I asked him about Mr. Vories. He lost his spleen at once and his face betrayed real enthusiasm as he replied,

"The more missionaries we have of his type, the better. I know no one who does not believe in the sincerity and godliness of that man's work."

THE "Sociological Special," consisting of one Pullman car, one welfare exhibit car, and twelve specialists in public health and other civic activities, including church work, which exists to give impetus to the growing movement toward better living and better living conditions in the South, began a new campaign on January 28. The car usually spends a week in each place at which it stops, its coming and its activities are well advertised, and it is said to be reaching the people effectively. The work is under the direction of the Southern Sociological Congress, which has recently moved its headquarters from Nashville, Tenn., to Washington, D. C.

Among the Evangelists

EVANGELIST I. E. Honeywell and party, of Oak Park, Ill., have been conducting a union tabernacle campaign in Owosso, Mich. During the first week, over 1,200 confessed Christ.

Evangelist O. A. Newlin and party, of Winona Lake, Ind., after holding a series of meetings in Aledo, Ill., and Ligonier, Ind., are now in Vicksburg, Mich. Hundreds have been led to Christ, and through the influence of the meetings held in Ligonier, a civic league has been organized to fight the liquor question and promote civic righteousness. This party expects to open a campaign in Defiance, Ohio, on February 25.

The Clark evangelistic party, of Kansas City, Mo., are holding a series of meetings at Cawker City, Mo.

Evangelist Clyde Lee Fife and party, of Plymouth, Ind., have just closed an effective campaign in Havana, Ill., and many have been converted. The evangelist has been asked to return to Havana in the spring, when the people will vote on the question of prohibition. Mr. Fife has accepted the return invitation, and will make a big effort to "put Havana dry."

Didn't Know Her Own Name

MISS KATHERINE WAMBOLD, a medical missionary at Seoul, Korea, tells this amusing anecdote:

Dr. H. C. Whiting, who is in charge at the hospital, writes: "We get some very ignorant patients. A few days ago a woman came, and Dr. Chyu asked her name, but she did not know what it was. He then asked what her husband's name was, but she did not know that; so he asked what she called her children. "'Oh,' she replied, 'I call them First, Second and Third.'

"He then tried another tack. 'Is your husband called Kim?' 'No.' 'Perhaps it is Song?' 'No.' 'Could it be Pack?' 'Yes, that is the old man's name.'"

As a contrast to this experience she writes that recently the Woman's Missionary Society had as presiding officer a Korean, and all the program even to the map lesson was given by Korean women, who a few years ago could not read or write.

In Next Week's Christian Herald

A GROUP of Americans has been going about China getting great crowds to come and see a number of remarkable exhibits, among which is a bell that rings every eight seconds. Why does it ring every eight seconds? When the Chinese discover the mystery, there is instantly set loose in that whole section a mighty power (not the Gospel) for the betterment of that land. A well-illustrated article tells what this group of Americans has done.

A little old lovable specimen of a man just happened to be in front of Frank Thomson's office when the latter rushed into the street at the crisis of his life. This little old fellow, without ever knowing it, saved Thomson's home from being wrecked by divorce. How this came about is told in a gripping story, "When the Clock Struck One."

The working out of Industry's creed, by which the worker may "live well and die without fear," is further described in the concluding chapter of Miss Tarbell's article begun in this number, on "Health for Every Man."

Miss Margaret E. Sangster has as many friends as the Christian Herald has readers. We think none of them will be disappointed in the special thing that she does in the issue of February 28.

A full page of pictures will give you a vivid impression of the conditions under which the Shackleton Antarctic Expedition came to a hand-to-hand fight with death.

For the rest of the features and departments we shall have to refer you to the number itself.

You Care for Your Home—Do You Care for Yourself?

IF I should ask any home-owner if he would permit a drain in his house to be clogged up for twenty-four hours, the answer would be perfectly obvious—a most decided "No!"

Because he knows that the health of himself and his entire family would be jeopardized by even the air that such a condition would cause them to breathe—

That such a condition in the human system should also be given prompt and serious attention is proved by the fact that the vast majority of human ills would not trouble us if Auto-Intoxication were not present; any physician will tell you this. Accumulated waste is the most fruitful cause of Auto-Intoxication. And you probably know that the very first treatment given by a physician when you are ill is for the purpose of removing that waste.

Everyone is very guarded about proclaiming a cure nowadays—we are living in the dawn of the day of prevention.

Nearly half a million Americans are now preventing Auto-Intoxication by the occasional use of the Internal Bath on which Charles A. Tyrrell, M. D., of 134 West 65th Street, New York, has specialized for twenty-five years. The result of his practical experience and investigations is summed up in a little book called "The What, The Why, The Way of Internal Bathing." This he will send to you free of cost if you will write him and mention having read this in the Christian Herald.

It is remarkable how enthusiastic so many people can be about their feelings the morning after a properly administered Internal Bath—but whether you consider using this Nature treatment or not, it would probably be worth while to write for the book. It is certain that you will learn useful facts about yourself that you have never before known. (Advertisement.)

Dust
O-Cedar

Dust shows more plainly on oak than on any other wood. This dust seems to dissolve and form a scum, thus clouding the real beauty of the grain of the wood.

To thoroughly dust, clean, polish and beautify furniture or floors made of oak, simply dampen a piece of cheese cloth with water, wring it almost dry and then add

O-Cedar Polish

Go over the surface and polish with a dry cloth. A sparkling, clean, bright, lasting lustre is the result—a lustre so dry and hard it will not collect dust.

The same O-Cedar Polish should be used for cleaning, brightening, polishing and beautifying all wood work and furniture of every kind.

O-Cedar Polish is sold by all dealers in convenient sizes—25c to $3.00. Your money refunded if you are not delighted with the "O-Cedar Result."

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

EVERY answered prayer is a miracle of grace, whether it be a prayer for salvation from sin, or a prayer for the indwelling spirit, or for a path of service, or for material help. The prayer marks the boundary of our human self-sufficiency and shows us entering the realm of God's mercy. God did not give us minds and muscles, wills and energy, merely to enable us to apprehend his goodness and to throw ourselves at his feet. He expects us, since we are created in his image, to play the man, to use all our powers, to press always forward toward the goal set for us by his providence. Then, when we have done all we can, he stands ready to add his strength to ours; when we fall in honest weariness he lifts us up, and in the power of his Spirit we go forward again and achieve.

Rev. J. G. comes to us with a story which will make glad every member of the Prayer League. Last year his bishop sent him to a church whose people were discouraged, threatened with the loss of their church furniture through foreclosure of a mortgage, and ready to quit. He called them to prayer, and he sent a request for prayer to the League. The Lord heard the prayer and moved a member of the League in New Mexico to send one dollar to the Christian Herald to be sent anonymously to the struggling church. Only one dollar! But what a powerful dollar it became! The minister took it before the church and called it "the first missionary messenger of the Lord, sent to comfort and help us." Then they deposited it in the bank, gave it a room in "the inn" to rest up and wait until the Lord should send more such missionaries. In about a month this congregation, heartened and encouraged by the silver missionary from Texas, found it possible to raise $175 more—175 other missionaries, to be added to the first one in the bank. A payment was made on the mortgage, the confidence of the congregation was restored, and soon the debt was canceled, the pews were paid for, harmony returned, and the people, enthused and inspired, now press forward, "working, shouting and praising the Lord for the wonderful things he is doing for them." Was ever one dollar better invested or given a better opportunity to multiply itself for the glory of God?

The same minister, a father too, praises God for the return home of a son who had wandered away from God and from home, and for whose reclaiming prayer was asked. He writes that the boy is now at home, at work and doing well, and he asks prayer for a daughter drawn away from church and home, that her eyes may be opened and that she may return to the Lord and to better associations.

L. L. praises God for his goodness in shielding her from two great sorrows which threatened, from which she prayed to be delivered. She writes, "I would gladly shout his mercy from the housetops."

H. A. T. sends two instances of answered prayer. At one time, when appendicitis was little understood, he was so violently ill that two physicians agreed he could not live. Neither of them had ever performed or seen performed the necessary operation. He prayed for strength and recovery, being joined in earnest supplication by his mother and an aunt, and strength was given him sufficient to withstand the operation at inexperienced hands and to make a swift recovery. Later, after his marriage, relatives attempted to break up his home, almost prevailing upon the young wife to leave her husband. Prayer and loving forgiveness of wrongs admitted brought reunion to the home, and nine years of happy married life have proven a continual answer to his prevailing prayer.

"Radiolite" Strap Watch

YOU see at the top of this advertisement a picture of the Ingersoll "Radiolite" watch in the dark. Its hands and figures glow brightly, being thickly layered with a new self-luminous substance of great brilliancy and lasting power.

What does "self-luminous" mean?

"Self-luminous" means that the light comes from within. Merely phosphorescent substances borrow their luminosity from outside light, i. e., they glow for a few hours (at most) after exposure to outside light. But "Radiolite" gets its luminosity from an element within itself. That element is radium.

Millions of little batteries

Every particle of radium is like a little battery, in that it sends out energy in every direction. This radium—in infinitesimal quantities—is imprisoned within the crystals of another substance, made of twelve different minerals. And the radium makes this other substance glow, just as electricity makes the filament of an electric light glow.

This crystalline substance is the most responsive of all substances to the action of radium. A microscopic amount of radium will keep it glowing with a brilliancy that remains undimmed for at least ten years—probably much longer.

Ingersoll
RADIOLITE WATCHES

There are five models of Ingersoll "Radiolite" watches. There is one for every person and for every purpose. In the country or city, motoring or walking at night; boating or camping; in the darkened theatre; or in the bedroom at home, people find them useful. Nearly one-third of the Ingersolls now sold are "Radiolites."

All these Ingersolls also come with plain dial; and there are other plain dial models, from $1.50 to $6.00. At all dealers; or if the dealer has not the model you want, it will be sent on receipt of price by any one of our three branches named below.

Repairless Roofs

Asphalt Shingles are going on thousands of roofs whose owners are tired of repair costs.

They are buying Asphalt Shingles to stop those expenses. They want a roofing that does not crack or leak. One that will last long after other roofings would have worn out.

They find these advantages in Asphalt Shingles. And with them they find a triple-thick roof — three substantial proofs that it cannot leak under any circumstances.

Asphalt Shingles

"The Roof that Stays Young"

No other roofing at a moderate price looks so beautiful. Rich, permanent colors that last. Evenly cut shingles that lay smoothly on the roof. Fire protection, too. Sparks will not ignite them. These are reasons why so many thousands of home owners are demanding Asphalt Shingles.

Reliable quality Asphalt Shingles are made with a strong felt, saturated or coated with Asphalt, with crushed rock products tightly embedded on the surface.

CALL on your Contractor, Lumber Dealer or Builder's Supply Man and insist on getting reliable quality Asphalt Shingles. This will insure you a roof that stays young.

THE approaching construction of a new and elaborate building in Brooklyn for the Eastern States Mission Headquarters of Utah Mormonism calls attention to the spread of this organization. With an income from tithing of $1,887,920 a year—this was the total in 1914—besides the profit from fourteen enterprises doing a business of $20,000,000 annually, the "church" is able to keep a large force of missionary "elders" in the field.

The Utah Gospel Mission has just issued a complete report covering work from 1901 to 1915, inclusive. In the West, the mission workers in 1915 made 14,170 calls on families numbering 80,000 souls in 153 settlements, in 133 of which there was no Christian work. In 140 places 284 special Gospel meetings were held, the total attendance reaching 22,641. In the course of the work, 1,589,960 pages of Gospel literature were given out, and 1,975 Bibles, Testaments and portions were sold or given away. In the fifteen years, 174,835 visits have been made to homes by colporteurs, and 67,000 more have been made by invitation, reaching altogether 633 settlements, of which 513 had no organized Christian work. In 2,672 meetings 199,963 persons have heard the Gospel message. By wagon and on horseback the workers have traveled 71,000 miles, and the pages of literature used totaled 16,963,330. In the East 640 addresses were made, about 4,198,000 pages of literature were circulated, and the total cost of all the work for the fifteen years was but $42,672.04.

Bright Chinese Orphans

THE Christian Herald has recently received from the Friends' Mission at Nanking, China, some very interesting letters concerning the progress of the orphans in care of the mission. Miss Esther H. Butler, treasurer of the Mission Orphan Fund, writes: "I take pleasure in sending to you an account of the five orphans we still have out of the original number (twenty). You are certainly doing beneficent work for the helpless and suffering in all lands. May God's blessing be on the Christian Herald and its readers in all their efforts, for they have been saviors of very many in China."

Rev. Walter R. Williams writes of Lin Bao Hwa, one of the orphans at the Luho Mission: "He is now fourteen years of age, is a quiet, thoughtful boy, a real Christian, and fully appreciative of what has been done for him. He is in school and is applying himself to his books very satisfactorily. His natural endowments are in his favor, and he is inclined to be studious. This morning I called him to my room and told him I was about to write you a letter. He said, 'Please thank the Christian Herald friends who are my supporters. I hope they are well and happy. I pray for them and would like them to pray for me. I want to be a true Christian.' We have no support for this boy other than what the Christian Herald is sending. He, with two sisters and a brother, was left to us with neither father nor mother. Lin Bao Hwa promises well, and you may be assured that you are making a profitable investment in his young life."

The same missionary writes about another orphan, Dong Chen En, aged thirteen: "When he first came to the orphanage, his little frame was diseased and dwarfed almost beyond description. He was slowly nourished back to improvement. There are no public orphanages in China for such cases—'the tender mercies of the heathen are cruel.' The hardships and neglect he suffered in his early years seem to have dwarfed his intellect as well as his body, so that he is rather backward; but he is a good boy and very earnest in his desire to be a true disciple of Jesus."

Miss Laura M. Stanley, one of the missionaries, writes this note about Wan Yueh Hwa: "She is growing into a fine woman. She dearly loves little children and is one of the best girls in her class. She is in her first year of high school. Her mother, her sisters, and, we fear, her father also, are dead. When she is through the school she will probably be able to take care of herself by being made useful in some branch of our work.

"Another girl, named Suda," Miss Stanley writes, "is a very remarkable girl in some ways. We believe she will make a mark in the line of work she finally chooses. She is now a very earnest Christian. The Bible women are delighted when they can have Suda's help teaching women to read. She has such a kind way with her that the women like her very much. She enjoys going out to the Chinese homes and inviting people to our meetings. She throws her whole energy into everything she undertakes. She has not a single relative living that we know of. She was brought to our gate when only a few weeks old. We believe your money is well spent in saving and training Suda."

Of the total 650 of China orphans now in our charge in the various orphanages, there are still many who are not supported by regular patrons. It would be a great pleasure to the missionaries if they could be so provided for that there would be no further trouble or anxiety about their support. Any reader who feels led to have a part in this work can do so by writing to the Christian Herald. Meanwhile, all gifts for the general support of the orphans will be gratefully welcomed and duly acknowledged.

The Oven Means More Than The Recipe Boss Oven

BOSS Glass Door OVEN

No matter how good your recipe, your baking won't be best if you constantly chill and jar it by opening a hot, heavy door.

Think what superfine pastries and cakes you can bake with the Boss Glass Door Oven! And so conveniently, too! No opening of doors, no shifting of pans, no jarring or chilling.

Just look in thru the glass door and watch the Boss bake. The Patented Deflector distributes the heat evenly, so that every part bakes alike. The asbestos lining holds the heat in the oven. Every Boss Oven, made for oil, gas or gasoline stoves, is guaranteed satisfactory.

BOSS OIL-AIR STOVE

The Patented Oil-Air Burner burns 1000 times as much air as oil. It's a close-up burner—gives a hot flame right on the pots and pans. Fires up instantly, cooks quickly without heating the kitchen, makes irons sizzling hot in a few minutes. A Boss Stove is a good investment. The great saving in fuel pays for the stove in a year's time. Simple and easy to operate. Made in 2, 3, 4 or 5 burner sizes, with or without high shelf, reservoir or hot water heater. Write for booklets showing various sizes and styles, also your nearest dealer's name.

"America's Greatest 'Light Six'"

HAYNES

"America's Greatest 'Light Twelve'"

Greater power—longer life—lower upkeep costs!

8,000 miles on tires. Remarkably high mileages from gas and oil. A mere fraction of a cent per mile for repairs. Everywhere you hear it said "The Haynes is a big, powerful car but you can afford to run it."

A 100,000,000 mile "endurance run," by some 15,000 Haynes "Light Six" owners during the past 2¾ years, is made the basis for all statements herein contained.

For the 1917 Haynes is akin in power-plant, weight and principal mechanical structure to Haynes "Light Sixes" of the last 33 months.

The Haynes "Light Six"—the car YOU get with its regular stock gear ratio—will perform for years as follows:

Any speed between one and sixty miles per hour without shifting from high gear.

Pick-up from a stop to thirty miles per hour in 7½ seconds.

Climb "low gear" grades on high.

Develop more pulling power at moderate speeds, or through sand, mud and snow, than any other 3½ x 5-inch 6-cylinder motor.

That upkeep will be extremely low for years to come. That long life is a certainty. That depreciation will be slight.

"Demonstrations" prove little. What "doctored up," specially-geared "stock" cars, nursed along by skilled professionals, can do, proves nothing.

Fifteen thousand owners have found these cars close to mechanical perfection. A few minor structural betterments have been the limit of change. This despite our quarter-century of automobile and motor building experience.

Thus—in 1917 cars, which for refinement and modernness of equipment, excel all other new models—are you able to know accurately in advance: That good performance is permanent.

But take 15,000 cars. Let 15,000 average everyday motorists run them for 100,000,000 miles. Let them drive over all kinds of roads—in weather fair and foul—for periods up to nearly three years. There you have a test. There you have a true examination for endurance. The results of such use means everything.

And such is the 100,000,000 mile "endurance run" which assures the long life and permanently low after costs of each Haynes.

Merry Moments

CARELESS. It is the law of a school in a town near Boston that only children born in that town shall attend. One little girl in this town was born while her parents were at their vacation in the country. This made her ineligible as a pupil of this school. In telling a playmate about it when she was old enough to understand the situation the child said:

"You see, I was born while I was on my vacation."

THE RULING PASSION. Order and cleanliness were the ruling passions in Aunt Abby Blank's life. One day a chandelier in her home fell, bringing a great deal of plaster with it. Aunt Abby was sitting directly under the chandelier and was bruised, stunned and temporarily unconscious. When she revived her first feebly uttered words were,

"Bring—a—dust-pan—at—once—please."

DOG ARITHMETIC. A little Chicago boy was in a physician's reception room with his mother. The doctor owned a little dog, which had a very long body and very short legs. The boy spent several minutes looking at the pictures on the walls, and finally exclaimed: "Say, mother, do you see all these pictures? Every one has a dog in it. I know why. It's because the doctor likes dogs. And say, mother, he has the funniest little dog you ever saw—it's two dogs long and only half a dog high!"

DADDY WASN'T HER COMRADE. A friend had a little girl who was greatly attached to a dog, Dandy, which had been her playmate from her babyhood. But Dandy was getting old and feeble and tiring even of a dog's life, so it was decided to hasten his departure to the paradise of dogs. As Marie was an excitable, hysterical child, the mother dreaded to tell her of the separation from her pet, but after luncheon she said: "My dear, Dandy is sick and old and cannot enjoy life any longer, so we are going to give him something and without any pain he will go to sleep and never waken." To her surprise the child made no protest, but a short time after she heard screams from the nursery and found Marie in hysterics. To her inquiries as to the cause, between her sobs Marie managed to say, "Nurse says Dandy is going to die." "But I told you so at luncheon," replied the mother. "Oh!" sobbed the child, "I thought you said Daddy."

RADA E. PAVLOVA, born near Philippopolis, accompanied a sick missionary out of the war zone, and during her vacation is giving addresses in this country. When her father's home was opened to "the new religion" the house was used as a target of persecution. The windows were smashed; mud and stones were hurled at their gate, and the bread usually baked in the public oven was returned unbaked; Bibles that had been given away or sold were gathered up and made into a public bonfire. But in the city where God's Word was burned and near the place of the bonfire there stands now a little church in which every Sabbath the Gospel of Jesus Christ is preached according to the "new religion." For God's Word then and there, as everywhere, prevailed. Miss Pavlova has been for twenty-seven years in missionary work in Macedonia and a teacher in Monastir, where she hopes soon to resume her work.

THE Senate on January 25, passed the House bill to provide a National Leprosarium for lepers in the United States. The United States Public Health service is authorized by the bill to proceed with the selection of a site and the erection of buildings. It is expected that this law will not alone provide care for the lepers but will make it possible to entirely eliminate leprosy from the country.

THE National Board of Fire Underwriters has compiled through many months of hard work an interesting comparison of fire losses in New York State, New Jersey and Pennsylvania for the year 1915. It is shown that strictly preventable causes were responsible for 21.7 per cent. of the fires in New York, 14 per cent. in New Jersey, and 17.4 per cent. in Pennsylvania. These causes include defective flues, fireworks, gas, hot ashes, grease, matches, open fires and lights, rubbish, smoking, careless handling of petroleum products, and fires caused by stoves and steam pipes. Partly preventable causes, listed as electricity, explosions, exposure, incendiarism, lightning, sparks from fires or from machinery, and spontaneous combustion, caused 31.9 per cent. of New York's fires, 23.9 per cent. of those in New Jersey, and 35.3 per cent. in Pennsylvania. Unknown causes are charged with 46.5 per cent. of the fires in New York, 62.2 per cent. in New Jersey, and 47 per cent. in Pennsylvania. The unknown causes no doubt include a large percentage of preventable beginnings, the evidence of which was destroyed in the resulting fire, but in New York alone the loss from purely preventable fires in 1915 was $4,358,618. It is apparent that the total elimination of preventable fires would not only save much property but would also tend to reduce the rates for fire insurance by about 20 per cent.

BECAUSE of the statement of a committee investigating the high cost of living that trademarked brands of merchandise increase the cost of living, the American Fair Trade League recently made public letters from forty of the leading manufacturers of trademarked goods in the United States. Nearly every letter emphasizes the fact that the advertised price was a part of the assets of the manufacturer and could not be raised without hardship to him, because the popularity with the public had been based upon uniform quality and price. Of the forty, thirty-one reported that they had not raised prices at all since the European War began, while thirty-four replied that they had not raised prices to the consumer. The packer of a well-known brand of sliced bacon stated that although raw bacon had gone up from 14½ cents to 17½ cents since 1915, no advance had been made in the price of the trade-marked packages.

83 per cent of the 654,653 higher-priced motor cars built in 1916 have Timken Bearings at one or more of the points of severest service—wheels, differential, pinion shaft and transmission.

These are cars priced above $700, built in factories having a yearly output of one thousand or more. The 83 per cent that are Timken-equipped represent a total of 535,235 cars whose builders considered quality of greatest importance, even though the cost was more.

The superior quality of Timken Bearings has been proved and is accepted by automobile engineers and motor vehicle builders.

This is the standard of quality, safety and economy that your car should possess.

The above chassis shows where to look for Timken Bearings in high grade cars.

The high quality cars listed below are equipped on the front wheels, rear wheels, differential, pinion or transmission with Timken Bearings to take the heavy loads, the sudden shocks and the grinding side-pressures that would wear out and destroy cheaper bearings of less proven quality.

Two chains, one on each rear wheel, are absolutely necessary—

One is rather a detriment and in most cases is even inclined to accentuate the skid and throw the car out of balance.

Is it any wonder the differential looks pained and worried when inexperienced motorists insist upon working it overtime?

Do you know the purpose of the differential and how it operates?

Without it no motor car would be able to turn a corner evenly and smoothly.

Power is supposed to be transmitted evenly to both driving wheels. When either of these wheels meets with resistance, the ever watchful differential transmits that power to the other where there is less resistance.

Now, what is the result when a chain is used on only one wheel?

A certain amount of resistance or gripping.

So the power naturally goes to the other wheel and as this has no gripping surface, it spins.

The specific purpose of the chain is thwarted, worse still, it has a natural tendency to accentuate the skid.

Furthermore, can't you see this spinning will unnecessarily wear the tire and throw your whole car out of alignment?

Suppose one of your brake rods smashed and only one remained effective. What would happen when you applied the one brake?

Your car would swerve, of course. An added uneven strain would be thrown upon the whole mechanism, doing probably irreparable damage.

The conditions are similar.

The necessity for brakes for both wheels and chains for both wheels is obvious and clearly defined.

If one chain would do the work, why use more?

But motorists and mechanics who are well posted gaze with pity at the man who foolishly drives with only one chain when two are absolutely necessary on the rear wheels and two on the front wheels are an added precaution.

SCARING CHINA INTO HEALTH

By CHARLES M. STEELE

WHILE American bankers are busily loaning money to build railroads in China, and American merchants are busily buying and selling goods in Chinese treaty ports, another group of Americans in the Cèlestial Kingdom is doing a work of greater importance. For these men are teaching China to be healthy. In a land where for 2,000 years the quack doctor with his horn spectacles has been the sole source of information on matters of health, they are spreading abroad modern ideas of preventive medicine, private hygiene and public sanitation. And the people, from mandarins down to coolies, "hear them gladly."

Public health education in China is being carried on by the Council on Public Health, an organization formed for the specific purpose and representing three great institutions—the China Medical Missionary Association, the National Medical Association of China, and the Young Men's Christian Association. (The second is a professional organization like the American Medical Association in the United States.)

Like every other successful institution, the Council does its work through an energetic, forceful individual. This man, Dr. W. W. Peter, is giving his whole time to public health education. He went out to China as a medical missionary, later entering the service of the Young Men's Christian Association. That institution, wisely recognizing the value of social and educational activities in addition to strictly religious work, maintains a lecture department, which spreads information on all sorts of subjects from forestry to aviation. A health department was added with Dr. Peter in charge—and from that grew the work of the Council on Public Health.

Possessed of unbounded enthusiasm, Dr. Peter is carrying on his campaign of health education in China with all the zeal of an evangelist—and such he really is. He has gone, and is constantly going, up and down the length and breadth of the Middle Kingdom telling thousands how flies kill people, how filth in houses and streets is as dangerous as poison, how the "coughing sickness" (tuberculosis) can be avoided, relieved and controlled, how plague can be prevented, and other vitally interesting things about public and private health.

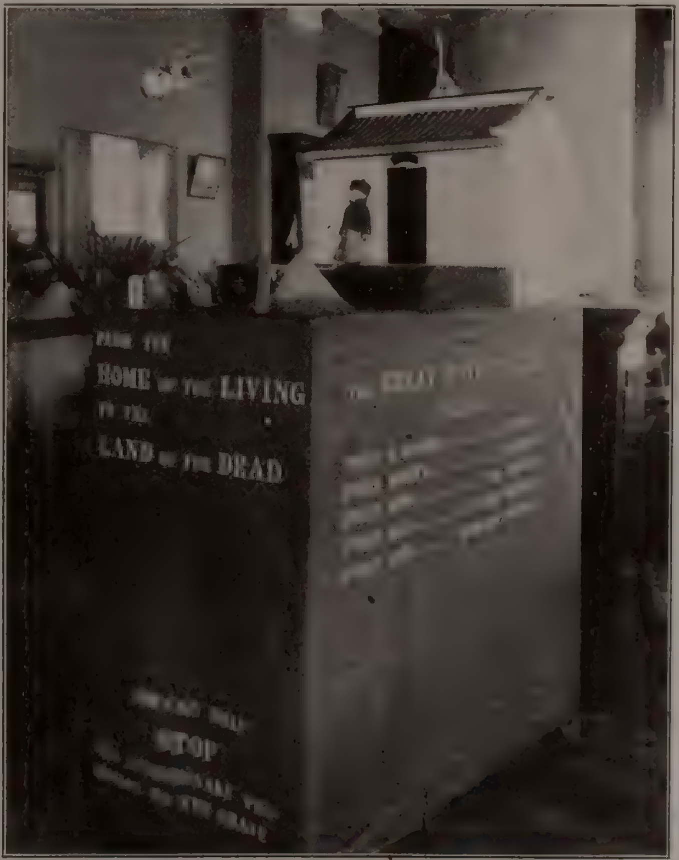
IN fifteen of the leading cities of China Dr. Peter has conducted "health campaigns" within the last year and a half. Between 175,000 and 200,000 people have attended the meetings and seen the exhibits. Officials have become deeply interested in the work and are glad to lend their influence and active support to it. Leading men and organizations throughout the country are now sending to the Council on Public Health invitations to conduct campaigns in their cities and towns. In Peking, where 18,000 people attended forty-six meetings last May, there was a Public Health Campaign Committee organized under the auspices of the Ministry of the Interior. At one of the Nanking meetings for women, the governor's wife, Mrs. Feng Kuo Chang, spoke for half an hour. It is an unprecedented thing in China for a woman to address a public meeting.

During the health campaign meetings are held daily for a week. Admission is by ticket, which can be obtained from the police or through some other agency for distribution. Every morning and afternoon the people are invited to inspect an elaborate health exhibit, prepared by the lecture department of the Young Men's Christian Association, and set up in some large building. This health exhibit covers 680 linear feet of wall space—an eighth of a mile. There are about fifty sections, including placards, signs, diagrams, pictures and mechanical devices. The mechanical devices used are exceedingly ingenious and effective. One of them is a model of a Chinese house. Out of it comes the figure of a man, who walks across his front yard and then falls into a coffin, whose lids open to receive him. The lids then close and the coffin disappears below the ground. This happens every eight seconds. Placards in Chinese and English explain that some one in the world dies of tuberculosis every eight seconds, and point the moral, "You can help stop this unnecessary procession to the grave." This is a new idea. The Chinese, reading the placard, ask "How?" and the instructor explains.

Dr. W. W. Peter, Health Crusader

Another mechanical exhibit consists of a bell which rings every thirty-seven seconds. A sign announces that every time this bell rings some one has died from tuberculosis in China. Still another and very startling mechanical display consists of a dial with a revolving hand pointing to numbers around the circumference. A bright light is fixed right over the dial, and the placard reads: "This counter was started when the conference opened, and has been counting the number of deaths from tuberculosis in the world ever since."

After seeing the health exhibit, which always attracts great interest, the people are invited into a large auditorium to hear and see a demonstrated lecture on "Some Relations Between National Health and National Strength." In the demonstrations human subjects are used, students acting parts to illustrate the points under discussion. Electrical and mechanical appliances are also freely used.



The world's death walk exhibit that makes the Chinese gasp

Dr. Peter says that mentioning "National Strength" in the title and discussing it in the lecture always wins immediate attention. National strength, he says, is a thought that appeals to the Chinese. They know they are a weak nation among the powers of the world, and they are eager to learn anything that will help to bring them from a position of weakness to one of strength.

One day of the week's campaign is reserved for women. On this day the health exhibit is explained as usual, but the lecture is entirely different. The subject is "The Care of Your Baby." This lecture is demonstrated also. A real baby on the platform with different kinds of clothes, a bath-tub, various kinds of foods, appliances for artificial feeding, nurses, and—more important than all—the mother of the baby herself, make the lecture of an hour and a half seem only thirty minutes long. The "baby lecture" is generally delivered by some local woman doctor, and has often assumed the form of a real play.

In the evening the exhibit and lectures just described give way to stereopticon talks on such subjects as these: "Sanitation of a Chinese City," "Flies Kill People," "Tuberculosis," "Infectious Diseases." These lectures are delivered both by Dr. Peter and by local physicians, native or foreign, who have been educated in America or Europe. So great are the crowds for the evening meetings that generally it is necessary to secure three or four extra halls in different parts of the city and hold several meetings at the same hour.

THE tangible results of the campaigns are very interesting. In Hangchow the campaign paved the way for a smallpox vaccination crusade. In Kaifeng, where the meetings were held in a large theater turned over to the committee, a Public Health Society was formed, having as its leaders the eight government physicians, who had the responsibility of caring for the health of many thousands of soldiers. In another city, the campaign was followed by a "clean-up week." In Changsha, Hunan Province, where thirty-six meetings were attended by 30,000 people, the results of the campaign are now taking form in a $20,000 hospital for tuberculosis and contagious diseases, erected by public subscription.

At Hangchow, in the gloomy halls of a Buddhist monastery, about 300 Buddhist monks, some of them already sufferers from the dread "coughing sickness," listened to a lantern slide talk and heard for the first time in their lives the teachings of modern science and the uses of air, light, soap and water.

At Weihuei, Hunan Province, an amusing incident occurred during the campaign. Following the lecture, in which the dangers of the fly had been emphasized, some Chinese ladies were being shown the health exhibit. One of the pictures showed a common house-fly magnified many times. On seeing it, one of the ladies exclaimed, "Is that the kind of flies they have over in America? No wonder Dr. Peter talks about the danger. If we had such big flies here in China, we would have to be careful of them too."

On his way to the meeting one morning in Changsha, Dr. Peter noticed that in every shop people were reading a little pamphlet, "Hygiene and Sanitation Indispensable." Wondering who was supplementing the campaign in this commendable fashion, he secured a copy. In the first few pages he found much good, sensible advice on health matters, but the book wound up with the exhortation: "Now the way to secure all the advantages of hygiene and sanitation mentioned in this book is to buy Dr. So-and-So's Pills in large quantities"—naming a well-known brand of American patent medicine. The fakers and sellers of patent nostrums are always on the alert to push the sales of their frauds to the Chinese.

Besides the formal health campaigns conducted by Dr. Peter, the Council on Public Health extends its educational work throughout China through a "Health Publicity Bureau" and a "National Lantern-Slide Exchange." The Publicity Bureau prepares newspaper articles on health subjects, and twice a month "copy" is sent out to as many newspapers and schools as agree to use it. At present about 150 newspapers are printing the articles, carrying the health message into scores of cities and towns. The Lantern-Slide Exchange loans slides on health subjects to schools, churches, local physicians and other interested persons or organizations. These slides are traveling constantly and reach parts of the country where the formal health campaigns have not yet been conducted.

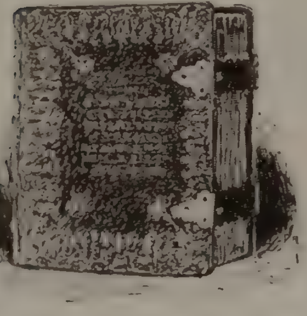
Another special piece of work of the Council is the circulation of an Anti-Tuberculosis Story Calendar. This is a large sheet, about 20 by 30 inches, printed in two colors and illustrated with pictures showing how tuberculosis is spread and how it may be prevented. Over 430,000 copies of this calendar have been distributed through the local Young Men's Christian Associations and through the interest of public officials. In three instances officials have given as much as $100 each to distribute.

RECENTLY the Council has conducted a National Health Essay Contest. Three gold medals, or their equivalent in money, have been offered for the best essays on "Present Health Conditions in China and How They May Be Further Improved." The essays were allowed to be written in either English or Chinese, being not less than 2,000 nor more than 8,000 words or characters in length. The contest, which was open to all undergraduate Chinese students of middle schools and colleges, closed December 31, 1916. A board of five judges will announce the decision June 1. The prize-winning essays will be published in pamphlet form and also printed in newspapers throughout China.

In his office in the Young Men's Christian Association at 4 Quinsan Gardens, Shanghai, Dr. Peter sometimes permits himself to indulge in dreams of the future of this great health movement in China. In such a mood not long ago he wrote to the author a letter in which were these words: "Some day I hope that public health education in China will be as attractive to Chinese and foreigners as Dr. Grenfell's work in Labrador is to all reading people at the present time. We are now in the first stage of a pouring-in process. China is just acquiring a stomach for these so-called Western ideas. You and I may not be alive when the process of digestion is completed. But when this process is completed we hope that China will be in possession of a health conscience, that she will stand as an equal of other nations in making contributions to science, particularly to medical science. What a thing to contemplate, to feed the soul upon, it is to close one's eyes and dream these dreams!"

The Bible in the Inauguration



The Bible of the first Presidential Inauguration

THE BIBLE was accorded a place of marked honor at the inception of the national government of the United States, and after the lapse of one hundred and twenty-eight years it still maintains the same position.

When Washington was about to be inaugurated in New York, April 30, 1789, it was found that there was no Bible about the newly remodeled Federal Hall, which stood on the north side of Wall Street, at Broad, where the Subtreasury Building now stands. Robert R. Livingston, chancellor of the state of New York, who was to administer the oath to Washington, knew that there was a Bible at the Masonic headquarters on Broadway just above Wall Street, about a block away, and sent a member of the order to borrow it; and the Bible is still a much-prized possession of St. John's Lodge No. 1 of New York.

The Federal Hall had a large open balcony at the second story fronting on Wall Street and in plain view for some distance down Broad Street, so that the President-elect was clearly seen by thousands as he came through the middle door at the rear of the balcony, followed by Chancellor Livingston and Secretary Otis bearing the open Bible upon a red velvet cushion, while the members of the Senate and House of Representatives came through other doors.

Washington laid his right hand upon the pages of the Bible opened at Genesis, chapters forty-nine and fifty, gave the words of the oath as prescribed in the Constitution following the Chancellor, and then, as the latter lifted the Bible, stooped and kissed the open page; and one of the spectators records "the devout fervency with which he repeated the oath, and the reverential manner in which he bowed down and kissed the sacred volume." The date of this Bible is 1767; it is eleven inches long and nine inches wide, bound in red morocco, highly embossed and gilded, and having two silver clasps. Among the verses which the lips of our first President may have touched is this auspicious one: "His bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob" (Gen. 49: 24).

From Washington's time down there have been only slight variations in this part of the ceremony of inauguration, and it has taken place in the most public manner. This use of the Bible rests on custom, not law. The clerk of the Supreme Court provides a copy for each inauguration. In some cases, the President-elect has a Bible which he desires to use, and then the one purchased remains in the Supreme Court. The copy intended for Mr. Wilson's use in 1913 is now there.

Just before the oath is administered, the volume of Scripture is opened and held between the clerk or his deputy standing at the left of the new executive and the chief justice standing at his right, and the right hand of the President rests upon the opened pages during the taking of the oath. Then the open book is lifted by the clerk or deputy and kissed by the President. Reaching back now through many years the usage has obtained that the clerk shall note and mark the verses touched by the lips of the President, and that the Bible thus used and marked shall be presented a day or two later to the President's wife, or, if there chance to be no "first lady of the land," to the President himself.

As the Scripture copies on these occasions are opened at random, it is interesting to note how the passages which have been marked cluster around the central part of the Bible. Many of them fall in the Psalms, two or three in Proverbs, and I Kings, I Chronicles and Isaiah have each a passage. Very naturally even at random the book would be opened somewhere near the middle in most cases.

The exception is James 1: 22–25, which is the passage marked at the inauguration of President Roosevelt. As this was a Bible presented to him and used when he was inducted into the office of governor of New York and selected by him for his inauguration after his regular election as President, we can almost fancy that the book under the tutelage of our most strenuous executive had acquired the knack of opening on these verses.

When Mr. Cleveland came to Washington for his first inauguration, he brought with him a little red Bible given him by his mother when he, as a boy, started out to make his fortune, and which he had always cherished as a keepsake, and on this he took the oath as President. Mr. McKinley used one presented to him by a number of Methodist bishops. The Bible used by Mr Wilson in 1913, when he became President, was the one employed when he entered upon the office of governor of New Jersey, and beautifully inscribed with the circumstance of its use. The verses which his lips touched, were Pslam 119 : 43–48, a portion of which read: "So shall I keep thy law continually for ever and ever. And I will walk at liberty: for I seek thy precepts. I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings, and will not be ashamed." It is probable that this same Bible will be used at President Wilson's second inauguration.

When we turn to the Supreme Court, instead of many Bibles we find but one small volume, now celebrated as the Justices' Bible, used continuously during the one hundred and sixteen years since 1800 for the installation oaths of all the justices and the pledging of allegiance of all the attorneys who have practiced before that court. No wonder that on an average for about every decade of this period a new or extra outside cover of black leather has been required to keep the red morocco binding of the little book in such freshness as it still possesses. This Bible is five and a half inches long and three and a half inches wide, and tradition says that it formed one of twenty thousand which Congress imported in the early days of the republic to relieve the Scriptural dearth of the country. The title-page shows that it was printed at Oxford in 1799. This Bible has always been in the care of the clerk of the Supreme Court.

The lower Hudson on February 14, New York's coldest day of 1916, was nearly choked with floating ice

Collapse of Cuban Rebellion. Charging that President Menocal and the Conservative Party had carried the recent election by corrupt practices, the Liberal Party in Cuba started a rebellion on the eve of the reelections which had been ordered in Santa Clara and Oriente provinces. The Menocal government apparently had advance information of the threatened revolt, for the first evidence of trouble in many parts of the island came in the arrest of Liberal leaders. Ex-President Gomez was reported as leading the forces of the rebellion. The Menocal government took rigorous measures to meet the situation, calling for volunteers to replace troops who had deserted to the rebels as well as to create a sufficient force to restore order. Secretary Lansing on February 14 sent a note to the Cuban people through all the consular agents of the American government in Cuba in which he warned the insurgents that the United States would not support any government resulting from revolt, and called attention to the agencies provided by law for the settlement of difficulties. The United States government offered to sell 10,000 rifles and 5,000,000 rounds of cartridges to President Menocal. Tentative plans were also made for a third intervention, should it become necessary, the last intervention having been in 1906. At last reports the loyal Cuban troops had succeeded in dispersing every band of rebels with which they had come in contact, and the rebellion had already dwindled to guerrilla warfare in the mountains except in Oriente province, where Santiago de Cuba and some nearby towns were in the hands of the Liberal forces.

Ohio Women to Vote. The Senate of the state of Ohio on February 14 passed the bill, already passed by the House, by which the women of Ohio, like the women of Illinois, will be given the right to vote for President. The governor is said to have intimated that he will sign the bill. The addition of the 24 votes of Ohio will make a total of 120 votes in the electoral College representative of states where women may vote for President. A resolution proposing an equal suffrage amendment to the constitution of Texas was defeated in the Texas legislature on February 6. On February 7 the Senate of New Hampshire defeated a woman suffrage measure, and on the same day the Senate of the state of Maine received from its Judiciary Committee a unanimous report in favor of a resolution providing for woman suffrage through a constitutional amendment. It is expected that Maine will vote upon the question next September.

Another Mexican Raid. Villistas under command of José Ynez Salazar raided an American ranch near Hachita, New Mexico, February 12, carrying off three Mormon cowboys, afterward occupying the American-owned cattle ranch of Ojitos, in Mexico, forty-five miles southwest from the point of the raid. The bodies of the three Americans were found by civilian scouts along the trail of the bandits' retreat in Mexico. At this writing American troops had not followed the bandits into Mexico. The force under command of Salazar was a part of the Villista forces which occupied the territory evacuated by the Pershing expedition.

The Academic Censor. Count Ilya Tolstoy, son of the famous Count Tolstoy of Russia, who is in this country lecturing on his father's work and on Russia, was prevented from giving an address at Columbia University Saturday night, February 10, by authority of Professor J. D. Prince, head of the Department of Slavonic Languages. Count Tolstoy was a guest of the International Club assembled at Philosophy Hall, and the ban upon his speech was issued under authority of a university regulation which enables any head of a department to muzzle any person whom he personally dislikes or opposes. It was suggested later that the reason for the prohibition was due to a misapprehension of the relations of the Count with the radical revolutionary party in Russia, he having met the "Mad Monk" Iliodor at Carnegie Hall recently, and the meeting having been given the color of an endorsement, whereas the Count, it is now declared, had gone merely from curiosity. Count Tolstoy's secretary stated later that the address he had planned to give at Columbia was one which had been approved by the Russian authorities at Moscow, and that, far from being unpatriotic, he had himself served in the Russian army in the present war, and had three sons at the front, one of whom was a prisoner in Austria. The incident justly stirred up both students and faculty, the faculty however attempting to justify the action, while student mass meetings, roundly condemned it.

An Indian State Council. A meeting which may have historic results occurred at Delhi, India, November 15, according to correspondence of the Associated Press received in America about the middle of February. It was a conference between the Viceroy of India, representing the British government, and forty Indian princes and chiefs, rulers of most of the territory of the Indian empire. They met at the invitation of the Viceroy to consider questions of general importance to their states and people and to render advice to the British government on certain matters. It is stated that this is the first time that the Viceroy has formally recognized the native rulers in this way, previous conferences among smaller groups never having considered general subjects affecting the native states as a whole. The princes themselves had hitherto maintained rigid exclusiveness within their own domains, refusing to discuss the affairs of their states with each other.

National Food Cost Inquiry. On February 10 President Wilson directed the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Agriculture to begin an immediate investigation of the causes of advancing food prices in the United States, with special reference to alleged violations of anti-trust acts. Preliminary plans are being worked out between the two departments. In ordering the inquiry, the President called attention to the fact that while the population had increased 26,000,000 since 1900, the production of the two leading cereals, corn and wheat, had shown only a slight advance, and the production of meat products had decreased 29 pounds per capita. . . . The state of New York is considering the establishment of a Department of Agriculture, Food and Markets, which will have broad powers of regulation over the supply and distribution of food in the state. . . . Owing to congestion of eastern railroad terminals and resulting embargoes the cities of Pittsburg, Philadelphia and New York and the whole New England territory at the middle of February were face to face with an actual food shortage. A conference of railway managers on February 15 arranged to meet this situation with a comprehensive scheme of train movements by which food trains would be given right of way and certain definite amounts of wheat and flour would be moved eastward at regular intervals.

For a Great Navy. The House of Representatives at Washington on February 13 passed the largest naval appropriation bill in the history of the government, the total appropriations being $368,553,388.07, about $55,000,000 in excess of last year's bill. A few years ago $125,000,000 was a large naval budget for "Columbia." The building program provides for three battleships, one battle cruiser, three scout cruisers, 15 destroyers, one destroyer tender, one submarine tender, and 18 submarines, and increases the authorized cost of the four battle cruisers authorized at the last session to $19,000,000 each, and of the three scout cruisers to $6,000,000 each.

Fragments of News. A great demonstration for peace was held in Washington Monday, February 12, and 250 delegates, including both men and women, went from New York City to take part in it. . . . Great Britain is reported to be planning to take over the cultivation of 2,000,000 acres in western Canada as a means of providing for the payment of her war debt. It is also suggested as a part of the plan that the farms be sold on easy terms to the veterans of the war to enable them to get a new start. The plan has, however, not yet passed the stage where it is merely talked about. . . . American marines in February began a thorough scouring of Santo Domingo in an attempt to corral a marauding band under the leadership of one Evangelista, who seems to have been somewhat misnamed, since he is credited with at least thirty murders, and stealings innumerable. . . . In 1787 Governor Phillipp, sailing from England to Botany Bay, stopped at Rio Janeiro and took with him to Australia specimens of prickly pear in an endeavor to transplant to Australia cochineal culture. It happened, however, that the good governor got hold of specimens of the pear for which the cochineal had little use, and now Australia is having a serious fight with the prickly pear pest, which is estimated to have robbed the community of about 20,000,000 acres of good soil. Two American experts are assisting the government in destroying the unwelcome guest. . . . The United States Circuit Court of Appeals on February 6 ruled that Cuyahoga County, Ohio, could not levy taxes against John D. Rockefeller, since his summer home at Cleveland didn't make him a legal resident. Ohio had attempted to levy taxes on $311,000,000 worth of personal property. . . . The Congressional investigation found the source of the famous "leak" in the prattle of a child, and the investigation ended after discovering that this scandal, like many others, had been based upon insignificant information magnified by considerable imagination. . . . A special commission investigating the New Jersey state prison found the conditions extremely bad, many provisions of the law being in a not innocuous desuetude, and recommended radical changes in the conduct of the prison. The investigation was the result of charges made by a prominent I. W. W. leader, who served a year in the prison for his participation in the Paterson silk mill riots. . . . The Federal Shipping Board on February 11 asked President Wilson to turn over two idle army transports for needed commercial service in the coastwise trade between Atlantic and Pacific ports through the Panama Canal. . . . The United States National Museum now has on exhibition the first linotype machine. It is estimated that there are over 24,000 linotype machines,

Federal Board to Fix Paper Prices. Facing the possibility of criminal prosecution in United States courts, newsprint paper manufacturers on February 16 proposed to the Federal Trade Commission that the commission fix a reasonable price for the output of plants in the United States and Canada. The commission announced that it had taken the proposal under consideration and would reply immediately and it was generally believed that the answer would be an acceptance. It is expected that the commission will control both output and price, and that an arrangement will be entered into whereby the manufacturers will keep a sufficient number of machines on print paper to insure an adequate supply at a fair price to all publishers.

New Postmaster in Gotham. President Wilson on February 16 sent to the Senate the nomination of Thomas G. Patten, Representative in Congress from the Eighteenth district of New York, to be postmaster of the city of New York, succeeding Edward M. Morgan, whose term expired December 14, 1915. Mr. Patten is reported to have the support of Tammany Hall. Mr. Morgan was a Republican who was promoted from Assistant Postmaster.

Senator Stone Accuses Press. Senator William J. Stone of Missouri, speaking to the Senate on the neutrality measures passed by the Department of Justice, is reported to have said: "There is no shadow of doubt in the mind of any intelligent or fair-thinking man that there is a cabal of great newspapers in this country which is seeking to create a condition to coerce the government of the United States into an attitude of hostility to one of the belligerent powers." The senator declared that "Men who try unduly and by false statements to involve this country in the disasters of war are public enemies."

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

DURING the past week the relations between the United States and Germany have suffered no official change. Ambassador Gerard left Berlin February 10, and proceeded to Berne, the Swiss capital. Mr. Gerard planned to return to America by way of Paris and Spain. About 120 Americans, officials and others, accompanied Mr. Gerard. The American Chamber of Commerce in Berlin has issued an address to American residents in Germany advising such residents having interests in Germany to remain, assuring them that in any event their lives and property will be safe, and that it would be unnecessary for them to make the pecuniary sacrifices which a hurried departure would involve.

On Wednesday Count Bernstorff, the German ambassador to the United States, with his suite, for whom a safe-conduct across the ocean had been arranged by the United States government, left New York on the Scandinavian steamer Frederik VIII for Copenhagen. No untoward scenes marked the departure of either ambassador from the capital to which he had been accredited.

Mr. Gerard has given formal notice through the various press agencies that he will give no interviews of any character to the press, and has forbidden any member of his official family to do so, so that it will be the part of wisdom to reject as fabrications any interviews published in the papers which are alleged to have been given by any American diplomatic or consular official lately in Germany. This word of caution is necessitated by the fact that some spurious interviews have already appeared in some American papers.

The relations of the United States and Austria are still unsettled. The President has not yet received the new Austrian ambassador, a formality which is necessary before the ambassador can enter upon the functions of his office.

A Word in Passing

ARE you a pretty good, ordinary sort of a fellow, measured by the Patternmaker's rule as described on Page 232?

The remarkable article with which this issue begins, and the human message which radiates from the story, "When the Clock Struck One"—do these make distinct impressions on your mind? We might mention, by the way, that the exchange of views on page 238 is not of such a character as to debar men from reading the page.

But what we started out to say here in this little space has to do with next week's issue rather than this one. The trouble is, we have not left ourselves enough room to do justice to the coming number. We can mention but few features, and that briefly.

What would you think of going to church where you could scarcely move about without tramping upon other worshipers? Is your church like that? And what would you do about church carpets if you had a congregation that wears hollows in a stone floor? You will read about such a condition of things in the article on "A Persistent People."

If the Japanese ever conquer America they will probably impose their marriage ceremony upon us. Consequently it will be well worth your while to know the important features in the twenty-stage affair. That being the case, the March 7 number of the Christian Herald will be invaluable, as they are there described in pictures.

There will be a delicious little story, based on the actual experiences of a minister and his wife who relapsed into humanity for a moment and acted just like some of us would in the face of (what they thought was) a chance to become better off.

"In the Sweep of His Garment" is the title of a story by the author of "Peter's Roses," which appeared in the Christian Herald of February 7, and we are very strongly inclined to recommend that you set aside an hour on Sunday afternoon March 11, to read it, if you think you can wait until then after getting your copy of the paper.

Just as I expected. I scarcely begin to mention next week's issue, when—see what I'm up against.

Austria is reported to have adhered to the German plan of unrestricted submarine warfare. The sinking of an American vessel in the Mediterranean, laden, it is said, with lumber, which the United States does not recognize as contraband of war, by an Austrian submarine, emphasizes this. Latest reports indicate that the vessel was properly warned, her papers examined and her crew given time to get away in her boats. It seems most probable, however, that eventually diplomatic relations will be broken between this country and Austria. Bulgaria has also announced her adherence to Germany, but no official attitude has yet been assumed by Turkey. It may, however, almost be assumed that Turkey will remain faithful to her allies.

The fate of the German raider or raiders lately operating in the South Atlantic remains unknown. Various rumors of battle between these German vessels and a British cruiser off the Brazilian coast have come to us during the week, but none are definite in character or precise in the results of the battle, though late reports claim the sinking of one raider.

EXCEPT on the Picardy front and in the neighborhood of Arras, events have been very commonplace and unimportant in the western front during the week. Here the Germans made a small trench raid on the French lines, and there the French returned the compliment, while all along the line there was desultory and scattered artillery duels and intermittent grenade and mine fighting. All of which resulted in practically no changes in the respective positions of the combatants.

On the Picardy front the fighting was more severe, and for the most part centered immediately south of the Ancre River, the northern boundary of this sphere of action. On Saturday, February 10, in a night fight the British captured a strong system of trenches to the north of Beaumont-Hamil in the Ancre region, extending over a front of more than three-quarters of a mile, and took a couple hundred of prisoners.

The economic situation in Italy is a matter of some interest. As regards foreign commerce available statistics show that whereas in 1913 her exports for the first nine months of the year were $375,000,000, in the same period in 1916 they were $340,000,000. That Italy is not a wealthy country is more or less a commonplace, and with her income from tourist traffic entirely cut off, which in normal times runs well over $200,000,000 a year, and the remittances from Italian emigrants abroad cut down from $76,000,000 in 1913 to $7,000,000 in 1915-16, it is difficult to see how she can pay, as pay she must, for the excess of imports over exports for the year 1916, which amounts to $655,000,000. Indeed, this impossibility is reflected in the Italian budget for the financial year 1915 16, which is burdened with a deficit of $164,000,000 to be carried forward.

White bread is now unknown, and a "pane unico" or standard bread, of one quality, size and shape was introduced at the beginning of this year and is now the only bread procurable. There are now three sweetless and three meatless days in each week. Sugar is very scarce, and butter has almost disappeared from the markets. Eggs are very difficult to obtain, and vegetables are also scarce and dear. The whole food problem in Italy has been greatly complicated by the fact that the harvest of 1916 was moderate or worse.

The Rumanian front has been very quiet, except on its extreme northerly end, south of Kimpolung, in Bukowina, where that crown land and Moldavia join. Here, near Jacobeny, a three-day battle between the Russians and Teutons ended in the defeat of the former and their subsequent retreat, leaving behind them about 1,500 prisoners, besides a considerable quantity of artillery and munitions of war.

Greece is in a very serious plight, owing to the lack of food. The warships of the Allies continue to blockade her coast, and are now reported to be themselves blockaded by the Teutonic U-boats, so that Greece gets absolutely nothing from the outside, and persons are reported to have starved to death in Athens and elsewhere. In addition, Piræus, the port of Athens, was almost destroyed by fire in the past week.

On Friday and Saturday there was some rather hard fighting in Mesopotamia. The Turks made attacks on the British right four times, but without any gains, while on the left the British strengthened their hold on the recently won Turkish trenches. Finally the British made a successful attack, after artillery preparation, on the building of a licorice factory and the surrounding trenches, and took both factory and trenches. As a result the British established a new line on a front of 6,000 yards, about 1,000 yards in advance of their old positions. The British state they have inflicted heavy punishment on the Turks. Since then the British claim to have crossed the Tigris and as a result thereof to have completely surrounded Kut-el-Amara, but this claim is disputed by the Turks.

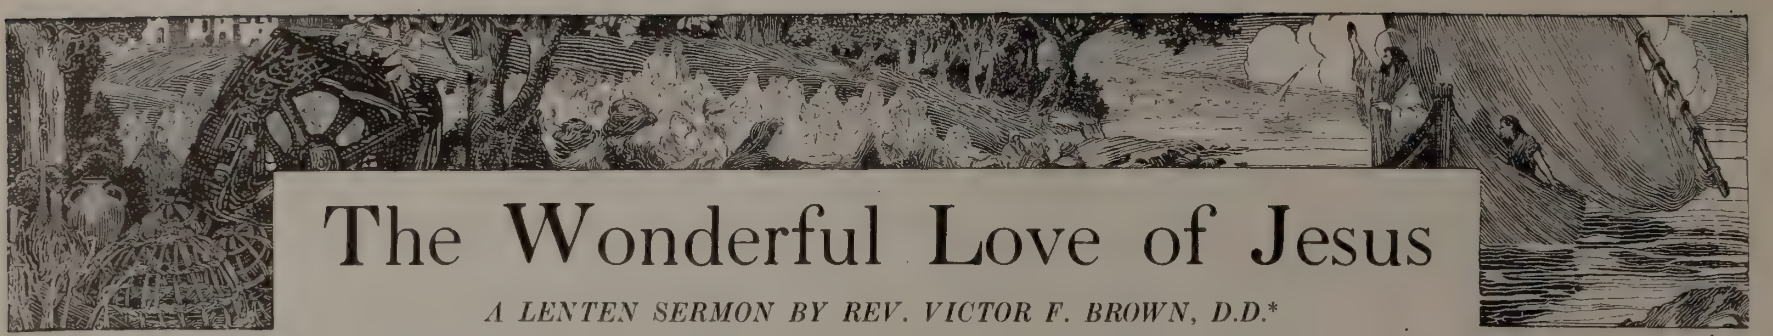
The submarine campaign against Great Britain, now that the "days of grace" have expired, proceeds unrestrainedly. Since the first of February the results as reported to us are that approximately 215,000 tons of shipping have been sunk, mostly British. This is at the rate of about 15,000 tons a day. In addition the campaign has had a very considerable effect on the traffic with Great Britain of neutral ships, the majority of these remaining in port.

GREAT BRITAIN on February 16 made public Admiralty orders creating a new danger zone to replace the former zone in the North Sea. The new zone lies entirely to the eastward of the barred zone declared by Germany and leaves an open channel through the North Sea from the coast of Holland to Scandinavia for neutral shipping. This may or may not have been the object of the zone, for naval men hold it to portend increased activity of the British navy.

The latest loan of the British government is reported to have been a great success and to have been received with enthusiasm throughout the empire, completely covering the need of the nation for the present, and creating a reserve in excess of $2,000,000,000 for the new financial year.

German troops after artillery preparation attacked French trenches in the Champagne district, near the town of Ripont, about half way between Verdun and Rheims, advancing to the fourth French trench over a depth of half a mile on a front of about a mile and a half, taking 858 prisoners, including 21 officers, and 20 machine guns.

The Ferry Route from Tarrytown to Nyack, across the Hudson, usually a three-mile sail, was frozen solid on Lincoln's birthday, and traffic crossed on the ice for the first time in six years. This car has stopped at Rockland Light



The Wonderful Love of Jesus

*A LENTEN SERMON BY REV. VICTOR F. BROWN, D.D.

TEXT—Matt. 21 : 9. "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. Hosanna!"

IT is the anniversary day of that brief period when Jesus made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem as a King, and when he was honored with such a genuine and spontaneous greeting as is nowhere else recorded in history. Others had won their honors on the field of battle, and brought home with them, amid the pomp and glory of a mighty triumph, the captives they had taken. But here was one who had never gone forth on any such mission of conquest, whose life had been lived in the quiet service of a broken and needy humanity.

It was a time of great expectancy. Everybody was expecting something, just what he did not know. The priests had been studying the ancient prophecies and declared that the Messiah was about to come. Others looked for a political revolution, for conditions were almost intolerable. It was just such a time as some of us have seen in the religious world, when everybody is expecting some great demonstration of the divine might and power. Everywhere the air was charged with anticipation.

GOD had sent forth his Son into the world because things were not right. That is why Jesus paused that memorable morning, in his triumphal entrance into Jerusalem, over the brow of the city, and looked upon the glory of its temple, and remembered all for which it had stood in the history of the Hebrew race, and all for which it now stood in the minds of the multitudes who had gathered from all over the world—and wept. Jesus wept over the city because he loved it. He wept over Jerusalem just as thousands in our own day have wept over their own beloved cities, now lying in ruins; just as you would weep over the impending and certain doom of the city that you love. But he did not tarry long to weep. Time was short, and the need of the world too great. He must hasten into the city, for the day of his opportunity had come. Messianic hopes ran high. The Deliverer had been promised. The three years of his public ministry had made many hope that he might be the promised Deliverer, but there were thousands in the city who had never heard of him at all. Yet when the little procession of Jesus and his disciples reached the outskirts of the city, some one recognized him and said: "He could calm the seas in their fury; could not he become our King and Deliverer?" And another said, "He opened the eyes of the blind"; and another, "He has even raised the dead—surely this is our Deliverer!" And the children begin to sing, and the young people to shout, and men and women to follow him into the city, tearing palm branches from the trees—emblems of royalty—and casting their garments before him as the throng accelerated, and singing and shouting "Hosanna! Hosanna! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!"

The rising tide of popularity sweeps on with irresistible force, defying the laws which made it a crime punishable by death for one either to receive or to render such triumphal honors without permission, yet Roman soldiers themselves, and Greek merchants and foreign traders were all swept into the current and shouted his praise, saying, "Hosanna! Hosanna! Blessed is God's man who cometh in his name to redeem Israel." At last the Emperor of human hearts had come! What cared they for the Roman tyrant so long as they might have him whom their hearts craved?

BUT the real mission of Jesus Christ was to become the King not of the world as such, but of each individual life in the world. Standing upon the heights of eternity, he looks off to the city of your soul, and sees therein the evil thoughts, passions, hatreds, malice, envy, jealousy, that are the real foes to your highest and best self. He is coming to you, coming with help and not hurt, coming with blessing, coming with life. Others are acclaiming him King, but he seeks the sovereignty of your soul. To deny him that place, to forbid his many mighty works in you because of your unbelief, as Jerusalem did, is to court the forces of death. This is the essence of sin. Jesus knew that sin was a reality. Paul knew it, Martin Luther knew it, Augustine knew it. And so do you.

In every great congregation there are those who dare not turn about and betray the sin of their soul. The secret is one they may have kept for many years; though they have hidden it, yet the flush upon the cheek, the nervous twitch of the face or the restless movement of the body reveals the secret of the soul which was thought long since forgotten. At such times, men in great agony of soul have left their sin and in the presence of just ordinary congregations like ours, have wept bitter tears of repentance and cried aloud for forgiveness of God.

I am not speaking now of those base and degrading sins which defile the body, though one might well do so, for the mask of purity is often worn even in the house of God. But I speak of the sin of the self-centered life, which thinks only of its own prosperity and success. The sin which freezes up the fountains of tender affection as it did in Thomas Carlyle, whose bitter lament ran through his life all the rest of his days.

BUT Jesus Christ came into this world that he might take captive the city of the soul; that he might rule its thoughts, its ideals, its passions, its fellowships, its life.

Sin always means suffering. Somebody must suffer for sin. The sinner may for the time have little pang for the wrong he has done; but ask that sinner's wife, or mother, or child how much they have suffered for the theft, or for the dishonor, or for the secret thing which they have found out, and which Joseph Parker once described as a clenched fist smiting in the face of God. Truly sin means suffering; that is inevitable. And though men may not recognize it as sin, they are willing to admit that men must lie on the bed they have made, and they must hang their heads for shame at the thought of the sorrow, the remorse, and the guilt.

Jesus Christ knew all of this. He knew, too, that such people are worth saving, and he was willing to undertake the stupendous task. He reached out his hand to the fallen and lifted him up, and said, "Go, sin no more." And he has been saying that to repentant sinners ever since. By some divine process which we cannot understand, but which we know to be true, he takes the sin from us as though it had never been, and gives us a new heart, a new outlook, a new passion that every moment of our lives may count only for the highest and holiest things, both for time and for eternity. This is very far from saying that he takes away all of the suffering that sin entails upon us here. The scar will always remain; the conscience will never cease from its tortures; memory must abide. But, marvel of marvels! Christ has the power of so dealing with your sin that it is no longer yours but his. When he bore its deepest humiliation and died upon the cross, he bore the burden of our sin, and in so doing wrought a work which is for you and for me, as the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. When he passes into the city of a man's soul, he enters into its deepest need, bears its deepest burden, lifts the load, and forgives the sin. He brings peace and the assurance of pardon, and he also brings to us the desire to suffer with him in the salvation and service of humanity.

HOW much does Christ love you? There are some things you can never measure in the terms of the yardstick. How far is it from the mother's heart to the heart of her wayward son in the far country? How far is it from the heart of the infinite and compassionate God to the heart of the sinner who is far from God, and who knows it to his shame and sorrow?

I had a lesson in this the other day as I read with understanding the meaning of the "cubit," which was a part of the measure of the altar that was built to the worship of God. Now, a cubit is the distance from your elbow to the tip of your longest finger. Sometimes a mother will reach out her hand in love from one end of the world to the other, and even across the seas, for her wayward son or daughter. But even this cubit will fail. Sometimes it is the cubit of that cherub which God lets down like a little of the essence of heaven into this world of sin, to reach out after the father and mother and bring them back into the paths of uprightness; but even this cubit may be too short to save. It is his. But the reach of his arm that was measured on the cross never fails; for hath he not said : "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me. . . . Neither shall any man pluck them out of my hands."

What is the measure of the cubit of divine love? One friend was calling upon another in his home. In the midst of the conversation, a little boy of two and a half years came in from play, and said: "Papa, I want you to show Mr. —— how much you love me." The father tried to tell him he was busy and to go out and play; but nothing would do until the father stood up and reached part way out with one hand, saying, "So much." "No; more than that," cried the child. Then the father put out the other hand the same way. "No, more than that," still came the answer. Then the father threw his head back, and put both arms full out, but kept his hands closed, and still the little fellow said, "No, papa; more than that!" At last the father stretched himself up to his full height, with arms extended and fingers held out as far as they would go, and then the child cried joyfully, "See, that is how much my father loves me!"

Yes, that is how much Christ, our Saviour and Redeemer, loves us. Loves us until his hands are stretched out with nails pierced through the palms, and the crimson of his sacrifice, like dew, falls upon the parched ground, to wash away the sins of the world, your sin and mine.

The Pattern-Maker's Rule

By
REV. CHARLES STELZLE

MY chum was an apprentice in the pattern shop. Sometimes I ate my lunch with him, and then together we roamed about the shop, studying the new machines as well as the old ones. But one of the things that strongly impressed me was his own set of "shrinkage" rules. I discovered for the first time that every pattern was made larger than the cast was intended to be, as when the pattern was put into the sand, and the mold was cast, the casting came out smaller than the pattern, because of the shrinkage of the cooling metal. For cast iron the rule was made an eighth of an inch larger to the foot; for brass, three-sixteenths; and for steel, one-quarter of an inch.

But so our models and our ideals always suffer in the work of embodiment. Beethoven tells us that his beautiful symphony is but an empty echo of the heavenly music he heard in his dreams. It lost its divinest charm when he transferred it to manuscript. Emerson says: "Hitch your wagon to a star." It may be easier to build castles in the air than to construct huts upon the ground, but the man who never has a vision cannot even build a hut that will really be worth while. The dreamer has his place in the world's work, for every machine and every great enterprise was dreamed out before it was worked out. But dreaming and doing must go together. Each by itself alone makes man either a drone or a drudge.

Especially should the intensely practical man, the "hard-headed" fellow, learn to center his thoughts on things that are not always to be found in the workaday world. It will give him a broader outlook, and it will round off some of those sharp corners that sometimes irritate his fellows.

THAT pattern-maker's shrinkage rule taught me that if my life was to square itself with the plans laid out for me by God, so that it would harmonize and fit in with other worthy lives and plans, my ideal as to what I should be and do must be higher and better than the average, for those ideals would suffer grievously when transmuted into practical every-day living. If my ideals were higher than the average, perhaps I would make a pretty good, ordinary sort of a fellow.

An art student once fell asleep over the task given him by his master. As he lay there, the master came into his studio, and with a swift glance saw the narrowness of the student's unfinished work. Taking a crayon he wrote across the face of the canvas the single word, "Amplius"—larger. When the young fellow awoke he grasped his master's idea, and as he realized how cramped had been the vision of his work he received a new inspiration, and later he became one of the world's greatest painters.

As Jesus looks into every man's life, he writes across it the word "larger" fuller. He himself said: "I am come that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly." It would truly be a fine thing to measure up even to the best that has already come to us in our visions, for if we were one-half as good as we know how to be, we would be twice as good as we are.

The Place of the Solved Problem

SUNDAY, March 4. Ps. 73 : 17. "Until I went into the sanctuary." The psalmist was filled with confusion until he went into the sanctuary. And the sanctuary is not necessarily a temple made with hands. It is possible to be in a place of worship and not be in the sanctuary. We can enter the door of the church and still be in the street. That was the deadly bane of Pharisaism. It was inside the house made with hands; it was outside the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. When we are inside the material walls there is a further journey to be made before the sanctuary is reached; we have to pass through the walls of the letter into the spirit, through the roadway of formalities into vital communion, through every ecclesiastical commonplace into the secret place.

And yet a church may be, and ought to be, the best of all ways of getting into the sanctuary of the Lord. Its walls are the witnesses of wonderful experiences. They have no speech nor language, yet they echo the songs of pilgrims who have found the eternal peace. The church is fragrant with the mystic incense of victorious suppliants. It carries venerable stores of precious traditions. And in the church we meet fellow seekers, intent upon the sanctuary—one with an anthem, another with a burden, one with a sigh and a cry, and another with a song of deliverance.

So long as this psalmist remained outside the sanctuary he was shocked and perplexed even to despair. All things seemed thrown together into a jumble, a jarring discord, a hopeless entanglement to which he had no clue. All the ground around him seemed to be one wide, marshy waste in which he could find no footing. Everything yielded! There was no rock, no Rock of ages!

And in this perplexity and sinking of mind and of heart he "went into the sanctuary." And something happened which lifted him out of the horrible pit and the miry clay, and set his feet upon a rock, and established his goings. He was steadied. He was quieted. It was not that he received some brilliant and satisfying interpretation of events, but that there was given to him an assured and satisfying communion with the Lord by whom the events were controlled. He did not find a clue, he found his God; not a clear explanation, but a great Companion. The miracle was not that his path was made to blaze with light; it was rather that the Lord touched him and the fever left him.

"We touch Him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again!"

And in these awful and chaotic days the way into the sanctuary is open, wide open! And the Lord is waiting for his bewildered pilgrims, waiting with the gracious gifts of assurance, courage and peace.

"In His Will Is Our Peace"

MONDAY, March 5. Gal. 2 : 20. "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." Is it possible so to modify the tendency of human nature as to set up another personality than our own as the center of the circle of life? Of course it is possible. It is actually done in the realm of human relationships. When a man marries, if he have a worthy idea of marriage, he deliberately shifts his loyalty from his own personality to that of another. No man is worthy the love of a pure heart who does not count himself as henceforth not at liberty to consult his own comfort first. Every mother knows this experience. The whole philosophy of selfishness is shattered by the first sight of a baby's face—nay, by the first thought of the little life so helpless, so dependent, yet so divine. No true mother puts self before the interests of her child. If, then, the miracle of the uncrowning of one's self and the crowning of another personality as the supreme object of solicitude be so common, who shall say it is either impossible or unreasonable for us who would follow Christ to make him supremely the center of our lives?

This is the program of the Christian life: self dethroned, Christ enthroned, and then the adoption by us of his standard of values. What are the things of greatest value? They are the things which Christ put first. We must care for the things he cared for, and we must care most for the things he cared most about. The supreme values of life must be in our lives what they were in the life of our Lord.

Jesus put before all things else something he called the Father's will. The fact is, he had no will of his own. Nor should we have. The late Hugh Price Hughes once defined Christian perfection as "an earnest desire not to have one's own way." Gladstone held this to be the finest of all Dante's lines: "In God's will is our peace."

Workers in the Vineyard

TUESDAY, March 6. Matt. 20 : 4. "Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right I will give you." Enforced idleness, where there is willingness to work, is regarded as a great misfortune, and the victims of such a calamity justly become objects of popular sympathy. Quite as justly, however, self-imposed idleness is universally censured. Labor is a moral duty. Even in paradise, before the fall, there were no idlers. But, while men readily agree that non-workers are an undesirable element in the social organism, and while they promptly fasten the stigma of laziness on the drones in the bee-hive of humanity, indifference in regard to the affairs of religion, lack of interest in the work of the church, are too easily condoned.

As Adam and his descendants were bidden to subdue the earth by their physical and mental toil, so the church and her sons and daughters are told to make the world subject to Christ in the obedience of faith. There is much to do for every Christian. It is not necessary that every one be given some distinct office in the church: everybody can speak and live for Christ among the members of his family and in his immediate neighborhood. The vineyard of the Lord is wherever there is a believer in Christ, at home, in the factory and shop, in the office. The call to work in the vineyard is a call to each Christian to let his light shine in his particular place, and to make the many-sided efforts of the church more productive of good by his personal cooperation. Much of the church's strength is latent, but there is also much unused power that should be harnessed and put to work. The reward is sure: "Whatsoever is right I will give you."

The Lack of Faith

WEDNESDAY, March 7. Matt. 14 : 29. "And Jesus said, Come." When Peter saw the winds boisterous and the waves billowy, he began to sink. We become like what we look at and think about. If Peter had kept his eyes on him who said "Come," the sea would have been as firm as the land. Jesus is safer than a boat, stronger than the storm and mightier than billows. When he speaks there is a great calm. "It is I; be not afraid," has assured myriads of troubled hearts, and his gentle reproof, "O thou of little faith; wherefore didst thou doubt?" has encouraged multitudes to believe when winds were contrary and seas rolling high. He who says "Come" will care for you and uphold while walking on the waves. They will be rock beneath your feet.

Our part is to step out by faith upon the seeming void. His part is to find a place for our feet, to extend his hand toward us, and throw his protecting power around us.

Doubt is a libel upon Christ's call and character; fear is faith in the devil's lie. It is the pallor of distrust on the countenance of the soul. The trustful heart exclaims, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him."

"Oh, deeper thou than doubt can go,
Make my poor hope cry out, 'I know!'
My feet, attuning to thy will,
Shall, heaved and tossed, walk toward thee still;
For I shall reach and clasp thy hand,
And, on the sea, forget the land!"

Nothing Is "Too Good to Be True"

THURSDAY, March 8. Heb. 3 : 12. "Take heed lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief." Jesus distinguished between honest doubt and stupid unbelief. With the former he was always patient. To the latter he spoke words of scorn and condemnation. The gentle Jesus who always pitied doubters is the same who spoke of the Holy Spirit as sent into the world to convict the world of sin "because they believe not in me." Sins, whether they be of the intellect or of the will or of the flesh, have their roots, their source. Dishonesty has its root in covetousness. Impurity has its origin in self-indulgence. Censoriousness has its source in pride. What are the secret roots of unbelief?

All unconsciously pessimism is at the root of much of our unbelief the pessimism which says of the blessed doctrines of our faith, "They are too good to be true." We lose our friends by death, and all the torrents of sorrow pour upon our naked hearts. We read the promises of the Word of God, and we say, "Would that it were so, but it is too good to be true." Why not say, "It is too good not to be true?" On the whole, the better a thing is, the sweeter a promise is, the more likely it is to be true; for God is good, and human life is the special object of his goodness.

In the Race to Win

FRIDAY, March 9. 1 Cor. 9 : 24. "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain." Ambition has its dangers. The person who sets out to surpass all others that engage with him in a common pursuit is apt to hear himself charged with selfishness. The paths to glory in this world are like the route over which a conquering army marches, spreading devastation far and wide and littering its path with the wreckage of men's fortunes. Worldly ambition is an awful thing to contemplate. Will not this summons, then, to outstrip all who are with him in the race for the goal of eternal glory inject an unholy stimulus into the life of a Christian? Not so.

Ambition is in itself a pure and noble motive of action. It becomes evil only when employed for wicked ends and in sinful methods. The salient point in the picturesque appeal of the apostle is, that, like the runners in the Corinthian races, the Christian must have his eye fixed on the mark he wants to attain and throw himself heart and soul into the business before him. He must give his very best to his Christian profession. It is an essential part of this very profession that the Christian is a generous person, a genuine gentleman of the heart, who never takes advantage of another's weakness but renders every possible aid to the unfortunate. This is part of his race.

Moreover, the Christian is engaged in a determined conflict with his old nature: he conquers egotism in himself, and that, too, is part of his race: "So run, that ye may obtain"—that is the truth which the apostle wishes to drive home. Do not pretend to run; do not have your name entered as a contestant and start out with the rest, and then, after a feeble attempt, drop out of the race and grumble about your poor chance and the other fellow's luck.

Patience

SATURDAY, March 10. James 5 : 8. "Be ye also patient." Patience judgeth not another hurriedly. She thinketh no evil, is not easily provoked, suffereth long and is kind. Tertullian personified patience, saying, "She is the pilot of peace; she fortifies faith, establishes humility, assists charity, bridles the tongue, restrains the hand, rules the flesh and preserves the spirit. Her countenance is tranquil and peaceful, her brow serene, contracted by no wrinkle of sadness or anger." An Arab proverb reads, "Be patient, and the mulberry leaf will become satin." "He that believeth shall not make haste" to judge his fellows by appearances.

A professor once said to his young student, "Hold your book in the other hand." The boy went on reading, apparently paying no heed. "Do you hear, sir?" The student ceased reading, still holding the book as before, but now having his head cast down. "Sir!" shouted the professor. Hereupon the boy raised his other arm, from which the hand had been cut off. It is said that the professor rushed from his desk, and, going down on his knees before that maimed lad, in the sight of all the class pleaded, "Will you ever be able to forgive me?"

Proper patience, Christlike gentleness would have saved the professor his humiliation and passionate utterance of misjudgment. A man once loudly complained of a crying baby in a sleeping-car, saying, "Where is that child's mother?" A voice choked with emotion replied, "My friend, if you must know, this child's mother is in her casket in the baggage car." "Oh," said the complaining traveler, "I will come down and help you care for the little one."

"Enduring patience makes the burden light."

The Great Ideal

THE highest peace ideal would wholly exclude war, except when it is unavoidably forced upon a nation as a measure of defense against actual aggression. But until humanity is regenerated, the ideal will remain impossible of attainment. Isaiah and other prophets held it steadily in view, yet it was afar off, and related to some future age. Are we any nearer it today?

We recall that many years ago a man had a glimpse of the great ideal. Jean de Bloch, an educated and keen-minded Polish Jew, who rose to the position of minister of finance in Russia, became the means of inspiring the Czar with the vision of a "world peace" court. Sixteen years before the present war began, De Bloch wrote a book, entitled "The War of the Future," the thesis of which was that war between the great powers was no longer possible as the arbiter of international disputes. The next great war of nations, he declared, must result in economic exhaustion and the dislocation of the social fabric, ending in peace by "a kind of stalemate." His predictions were forgotten; but the whole world knows the history of the Hague Court experiment and its disappointing failure. It gave brilliant promise at the outset, and treaties of peace and arbitration multiplied. Yet not one of these signatory powers wasted a moment in considering those treaties when it served its purpose to make war.

But it may well be claimed that after the present war the nations will have learned better than before to value world peace. There is little doubt that the peoples themselves have undergone a radical transformation in their attitude toward war. If governments and peoples have so changed toward war as to consider it a positive evil, and peace as something to be universally desired, then the way may be clear to make history on a new and beneficent basis. It is a great experiment, and well worth trying. Some day the great ideal will be translated into reality, but before that time human nature itself will have been transformed. And such a miracle can only be accomplished by divine power.

The "Cost of Living" Investigation

"GREAT bodies move slowly," and governments are no exception. At last we have the prospect of an official inquiry into high food prices. It could easily have come at an earlier stage of the trying experience to which the public has been subjected at the hands of middlemen and speculators in the necessaries of life—the firstn-amed class making what they could out of the dire necessity of the people, and the other class sending the food out of the country wholesale, to get still bigger prices elsewhere. Congress should have taken practical action sooner, to be of real service. As it is, the investigation is now to begin under the direction of the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Agriculture. It will continue probably six months, and $400,000 is asked to meet expenses. The inquiry will dig deeply into the charges of price manipulation, and any evidence of restraint of trade, or of combinations in the nature of conspiracy, will be thoroughly ventilated. For weeks past the Department of Justice has been gathering data on the cost of living, which will be turned over to the investigators. Every detail of food production, distribution and consumption will be dealt with, and the farmer, the packer, the commission dealer, the wholesaler and the retailer will each have their innings, to explain the rise in prices which have forced the necessaries of life from 15 to 100 per cent. above the normal figures of two years ago.

There is, of course, a fair probability that other influences may result in greatly changing the situation long before the government investigation has run its course. Thousands of food-laden cars are stalled on Western railroads, which, when brought to market, will meet new conditions that may force prices down automatically. The interruption of shipments for export will doubtless be another important factor in the reduction of food values in the near future. Still, the official inquiry will not be without its value, even if results should come late. It is due to the producer, the retailer and the consumer alike that it should be thorough and should result in the passage of preventive legislation. J. J. Dillon, New York State Commissioner of Foods and Markets, in discussing the cause and remedies of the high cost of food, has attributed present conditions to (1) waste on the farms; (2) waste in transit through lack of proper crating, packing and standardizing; (3) waste in the cities through delays in delivery, owing to the food being passed from one dealer to another in speculation; (4) waste through needless destruction of wholesale stocks of food by careless inspectors condemning in bulk, when much of it might have been saved. He has shown that farm products frequently go through as many as seven hands in passing from one jobber to another, and that, when the housewife becomes the final purchaser, she has to pay her portion of the accumulated costs of waste, commissions, extravagance and profits. The farmer and consumer are the two greatest losers by this irrational and expensive system, under which the farmer has to bear 65 per cent. of the price paid by the consumer to distribute the produce. The middlemen, of course, save themselves and very often the farmer gets too little. Cooperation in production and marketing is needed for the farmer, and a system of terminals and markets, under state control, would go a long way toward eliminating the unnecessary middleman and the speculator, as it would bring food straight from the farms to points where it could be distributed direct to the retailers. But the whole subject has many ramifications, and altogether it constitutes a problem that will tax the wisdom of the investigators.

IGNATZ PADEREWSKI, in telling of the condition of Poland, so sorely stricken by the war, has put into a single sentence a whole tragic chapter. "Not even the children are left," he writes. "All the little ones under seven years of age are gone!" This remorseless war has swept off these tender victims through exposure and starvation. Can there be a sadder picture than this? What has already taken place in hapless Poland is now going on in even a larger degree in Syria, Armenia and Persia. Great multitudes of refugees, driven from their homes in the villages where they were born, are destitute and starving. Only a few days ago we received news of whole communities in western Persia that are gradually being wiped out by hunger and disease.

While vast sums have been contributed for relief work in other lands swept by the war, little has been done for the sufferers in the Near East. Their need is great and very urgent. The Christian Herald readers gave $25,000 toward purchasing the food cargo of the "Christmas ship"; but that cargo, when distributed at Beirut, will afford temporary relief to a mere portion of the million and a half who are perishing in the territory between the Black Sea and the Persian Gulf, and eastward as far as Damascus. Providentially, the way to sending relief to these sufferers is still open. Their call for help is one to which we cannot turn a deaf ear. The mothers and children of the lands that gave the first welcome to early Christianity hold out hands of supplication, inviting us to "come over and help" them ere they perish.

We urge every reader to have a share in this lifesaving work. Send in your gifts to the Christian Herald for the mothers and children of Persia, Syria and Armenia. Invite your friends to join you in the effort to save these sufferers, for the sake of him who died for the sins of the world. In the hands of our faithful missionaries, your help may be the means of great and rich blessing.

Tomorrow

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, in her little book, "Christ Is Coming Tomorrow," makes a banker say to his wife: "Well, Mary, I don't want to meet him; I wish he would put it off. I would be willing to make over three million dollars to him to found a hospital if that would buy him off." But the wife replied, "Is he not our best Friend?" "But, Mary, I hate these things. Look here; there are a pile of bonds which stand for millions. Tonight it's mine, and if he comes tomorrow it will be so much waste paper. I'd give half, yes, the whole, not to have him come these hundred years."

Many people, if they were sure Jesus was coming tomorrow at 1:30 P.M., would continue their sinful careers until one o'clock, just as they do now, until death stares them in the face.

What is the creed of unbelief? There is no sin, no future, no accountability, no inspired Word. Man is only an animal; therefore, give free rein to the passions, for tomorrow we die. When the clock of eternity strikes the hour of his coming, will not the ungodly tremble as they behold the handwriting of doom upon the walls of destiny? Modern Sodoms, vile resorts, calloused criminals and scoffers will then arouse from their horrid nightmare, finding that He whom they have pierced is the Lord God Almighty, who will not free the guilty.

What an awakening that will be! As Jesus wept over Jerusalem, so he weeps over the cities of today because they refuse to know the things that belong to their peace. As it was in the first coming, so will it be at his second appearing. One has said appropriately, "Herod prefers the company of Herodias; Pilate chooses Cæsar's friendship; Judas takes the silver; Israel selects Barabbas and sends Christ to Calvary."

Our Lord will soon call you into eternity; he will surely come; he will not tarry beyond the hour appointed. Therefore revel no longer amid the ruins of your immortal nature. All your riches will be whirled away by the first wind from the eternal sea. He who has paid the price of your regeneration has waited long for you to accept the priceless pearl, the unspeakable gift. Rejecting him will be an everlasting loss.

Columbia and Suppressed Speech

A COLUMBIA professor has involved that great university in an extremely awkward situation, for which it owes official apology to Count Ilya Tolstoy and to the American public. In forbidding Count Tolstoy from speaking before the International Club, a student organization, after he had been invited and the audience had assembled, Professor Prince not only exceeded his authority but outraged the cherished American principle of free speech.

The disposition shown by the Columbia authorities to sustain the stand taken has not been accepted in good part by the students and many members of the faculty, nor will it be so accepted by the people of this country. If the great institutions of higher learning are not to lead in the defense of free exchange of views on political and sociological questions, where are we to look for the security of this precious right? Is a tax-free institution, built up with the money of the people, to be permitted openly to defy and outrage one of the most fundamental principles of this republic?

Advancing the Banner of Temperance

THE decision upholding the Webb-Kenyon law has given incalculable impetus to the prohibition movement. States that have held back, or qualified their anti-liquor laws, in fear that absolute prohibition might prove contrary to the United States constitution, are now rapidly asserting themselves strictly.

Oregon and Tennessee have joined the absolutely dry column, forbidding the shipment of liquor into those states. Arkansas, also, has stopped all importations. Both branches of the Indiana legislature have shown strong majorities for their prohibition bill. Florida, Utah and New Mexico are soon to act in conformity with the pledge of their elected officials. A bill forbidding importation and also considering anti-liquor advertising has been favorably reported in the South Carolina House. There is tremendous demand in Georgia for a special session of the legislature to make the state absolutely dry. It is the same in Mississippi, Kansas and Oklahoma, with a possibility that South Dakota will also fall in line. In the West Virginia legislature only three votes were cast against the rigid bill. In Iowa the Senate has voted, 45 to 3, to submit a prohibition amendment.

A decided majority of the states are in the dry column as a result of last fall's elections. When legislation now under way is enacted there will remain only twenty wet states. And of these twenty "wet" states, the majority have local option laws of one kind or another restricting alcoholic trade.

The Senate on February 15 added amendments to the Post Office Appropriation bill which would make criminal the importation of liquor to any of the states which prohibit its manufacture and sale for beverage purposes, and which would exclude liquor advertisements from the mails in states which legislate against such advertising. The National Prohibition Constitutional Amendment was favorably reported to the House of Representatives on February 15 and it was announced that it would probably be passed within a week.

A CONTEMPORARY suggests that there is too much of the "high-brow" about our modern church worship, in both the preaching and the music. Looking to the effective work of Mr. Sunday and other evangelists among all classes, it concludes that what is needed today is a fresh and more definite statement of the eternal truths of the Gospel. Put more briefly, the majority of the churches need a rigorous spiritual arousal. A spiritually dead or moribund church cannot be expected to awaken sinners or to do real service for the Kingdom.

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Men's School of Politeness

THE New York and Queens County Electric Railway has opened a "politeness school" for its employees. Some 650 of the men have received an average of three lessons each in politeness, but special attention was paid to giving finishing touches to the conductors. The school has thus far cost $2,500, but the company has noticed a big diminution in minor accidents within a few weeks, which alone will pay the expenses of the school. Complaints have fallen off, and several moving picture shows have asked the privilege of catching a real polite conductor assisting a woman with several children on or off a crowded car. In the early days of railroads and street cars, the greatest bully was the best conductor, the man with big arms and a strong nerve, who for the least "sass" would slap the face of the too inquisitive passenger, or would put off the car any one who dared question his word or authority. Things are all changed. While there are still exceptions, the conductors on the railroads and trolley lines are as a rule attentive and polite. The men who have bands on their coat sleeves indicating five, ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five or more years of service are the ones who are universally kind to the public, and especially tender to old people, children, and invalids of one kind or another. Few things so prevent friction and promote efficiency in all the callings of life as genuine politeness—not the hollow pretense of it, so often substituted for it, but the genuine article itself, which is in reality friendliness of disposition. The highest type of human politeness is Christian courtesy. How true these words: "A man that hath friends must show himself friendly; and there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother." (Prov. 18 : 24.)

Found Insects in Oysters

SOME weeks ago the captain of a foreign ship, in port at Baltimore, at an entertainment given by friends, was delighted with the oysters which were on the menu. Just before the ship sailed, these friends sent to it several barrels of these oysters as a present to the captain. When he made the trip back to this country his friends asked him how he liked the oysters. He said: "Don't you know, we had to throw nearly all of them overboard; they were no good. Practically every one of them had a live insect on the inside, and knowing they were not fit to eat we let the whole lot go to Davy Jones." Investigation showed that the insect was the little oyster crab, which is a great delicacy, preferred by many to the oysters themselves, and which the epicure knows is a sure guarantee of the quality of the bivalve. It was a good joke on those sending and the one receiving the present, at which neither side laughed very much. The captain especially was mortified and grieved. He knew more about the surface of the salt water than about some of the things that live in it. How often valuable things in life are thrown away on account of some supposed impediment which through ignorance has been misunderstood! How often through ignorance are the judgment and conscience perverted, so that things that are good appear to be bad, and those that are bad appear to be good The prophet thus refers to such: "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!" (Isa. 5 : 20.)

Automobile Kills Wildcat

ONE of the municipal judges of Milwaukee the other day was making an automobile tour with his wife and four children in a thinly populated district, when he saw an object in the road some distance ahead which he took to be a dog. On coming closer he saw that it was of the cat family, but too large for the domesticated animal. Recognizing that it was a wildcat, he put on speed, but the savage creature, with glaring eyeballs, sprang at the car, doing the latter no harm, but breaking its own skull. The judge said it was fortunate the beast did not wait a second or two longer and leap at the side of the car, as it would have landed on the inside and might have done great damage. The judge took the body of the wildcat to Marshfield, where he had it stuffed for preservation. Cats, domestic and wild, were known among the ancients. They have a place in Grecian and Roman literature. Aristotle, Herodotus and Cicero make mention of this animal. In Egypt the domestic cat was counted a divinity, and worshiped, and embalmed after its death. It was a capital offense there to kill one. The prophet in predicting the destruction of Babylon by the anger of the Almighty thus refers to wild animals making their homes among its ruins: "And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses." (Isa. 13 : 22.)

Chicago's Tenement Explosion

BATTLING against cold, ice and tons of débris, firemen, policemen, and volunteers searched for victims of the explosion that made the Ghetto tenements on Newburg Avenue, Chicago, a tomb. Seven were taken out dead, and twenty more were reported missing. The mayor and city authorities did all they could in finding the bodies and in caring for the suffering. The scenes at the tragedy were heartrending. Examples of heroism were numerous. It is charged that a drunken gas inspector failed to mend a leak he was ordered to stop, and the igniting of the gas caused the explosion. Whether this is the case or not, in these horrors, all too common, there is nearly always some one to blame. In the midst of every conceivable horror and accident, it behooves us to heed this injunction: "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh." (Matt. 24 : 44.)

Where Presidents Have Worshiped

HISTORIC St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church, just across Lafayette Square from the White House, in which more Presidents and men prominent in Washington official life have worshiped than in any other church in the national capital, celebrated its centennial anniversary in January. The present rector is Rev. Roland Cotton Smith. St. John's was the first building to be erected on Lafayette Square after the White House, which was completed in 1800. The Presidents of the United States who worshiped here were John Quincy Adams, Madison, Monroe, Van Buren, William Henry Harrison, Tyler, Taylor, Fillmore, and Arthur; and in more recent times the White House was represented by Mrs. Roosevelt and Mrs. Taft, who made St. John's their church home. Other prominent people were regularly seen in the congregation, including Stephen Decatur, Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Chief Justice Fuller, Salmon P. Chase, Benjamin F. Butler, Lewis Cass, George Bancroft, Winfield Scott, and George Dewey. Its rectors officiated at nearly all of the early White House weddings, many notable ones having taken place within its sacred walls. The denominations have been pretty well represented in the presidency. Grant attended the Metropolitan Methodist Church, McKinley the Foundry Methodist Church; Benjamin Harrison and Cleveland attended the Presbyterian Church; Wilson is a Presbyterian, and, like Cleveland, the son of a Presbyterian minister; Garfield was a member of the Disciples Church, and Roosevelt attended the Dutch Reformed Church. Churches like to have the President attend their services, as it adds social prestige and increases the audience. It is not the number of Presidents, or generals, or admirals, or senators, or distinguished officials that dignifies or honors a church, but the presence of Christ in it, and a loving brotherhood, rich or poor, high or low. In the church of God men and women are on the same level. And yet the example of great men bowing in worship before a common Father is excellent. The Psalms contain many references to the good effect produced by reverence for God's house on the part of the leaders of the people. David says, "I will bless the Lord at all times. . . . The humble shall hear thereof and be glad." . . . "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord." (Ps. 34 : 1, 2; 122 : 1.)

60 Years' Continuous Service

GEORGE B. CORTELYOU, president of the Consolidated Gas Company, and a group of other officials called at the company's offices on the occasion of the sixtieth anniversary of the employment with the company of Mr. John O'Connell, general foreman of the works. Mr. O'Connell came to New York from his birthplace, Mallow, County of Cork, Ireland, in 1857 and entered the employment of the old New York Gas Light Company as clerk. He is a widower and the father of fourteen children, five of whom are living. A feature of the reception was the presentation of sixty ten-dollar gold pieces to Mr. O'Connell, representing the years of his service. The veteran employee blushed with modesty and was overwhelmed with gratitude at this recognition of his long and faithful service, and expressed that gratitude in becoming words. On January 5, his fellow employees presented a watch and chain to him on the occasion of his seventy-eighth birthday. Mr. Cortelyou in presenting the purse of gold said: "John's getting better all the time." What a splendid life Mr. O'Connell has had! How grateful to a good Providence he doubtless is for giving him health! What constancy in his character, what honesty in his conduct! What a fine example he is of a man minding his business and doing it well! This little occasion is a splendid object lesson on the dignity of labor and the beauty and value of harmony between capital and labor. Constancy in the divine life is thus enjoined: "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." (I Cor. 15 : 58.)

Poplar Tree Disease Spreads

ALTHOUGH New York was not included among the states where a serious fungus disease of poplars was reported by the Federal authorities, the State College of Agriculture announces that the disease has been found on Long Island. This disease somewhat resembles that which destroys the chestnut trees, and may be found on any species of poplar or cottonwood. The fungus which causes this disease, according to the authorities, was imported from Europe, and is especially severe on stored or transplanted nursery stock. The State Agricultural College of New York at Ithaca has collected much data, which will be furnished on application to those whose trees are threatened with this blight. Everything that lives has some enemy to fight it, some seed of death to destroy it. The insect attacking beautiful trees, lovely flowers and luscious fruits is a type of the disease that lies in wait for body and mind, and stings and blights the soul. Wise as science has been in discovering the causes and remedies of disease in the physical and moral realm, there are many blights that are still left without a cure. But there is no necessity that sin, the disease that threatens the soul, should remain uncured; for Christ is the Physician and his own heart's blood is the remedy. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." (I John 1 : 7.)

When the Clock Struck One

By
GRACE S. SHEPHARD

FRANK THOMPSON let fall the last closely written sheet of his wife's letter from his shaking fingers and slumped down in his chair.

He had been a fool, a consummate fool, he told himself fiercely, in the revolt of reacting emotion; but that Edith — A divorce !

His eyes traveled back over the pages on his desk. "I write this because I did not want a scene, and besides, I wanted to get away where I could think clearly. . . . I hope it can be done without publicity, but I demand the children. I must have them. Oh Frank, surely you will see the justice of this. Remember, I have gone to death's door for each of them, I——"

A feeling of strangulation seized him; a frightful sense of suffocation which blurred everything before him. Did he remember? Clutching up the letter, he crushed it into the envelope and thrust it into his pocket, slammed the cover on his desk, and snatched up his hat.

The only definite idea in his mind as he banged the door of his private office behind him was that he would get a drink. A stiff glass of whisky would clear this tumult in his brain, give him a grip of himself.

"EXCUSE me; ain't you Jim Thompson's son?" He whirled fiercely upon the speaker, and instantly something in the quality of the eyes looking into his restrained the words on his lips.

"Yes."

"Parker's my name; Jo Parker, that owned the ranch next to your pa's up in Colusy County. Don'no as you remember me. You wan't more than knee-high then."

Something intangible swept the soul of Frank Thompson; a breath as of great virgin forests, of wide stretches of newly cut hay, of meadows sweet with forgetmenots and clover.

"Remember you? Well, I guess!" He gripped the sun-burned hand with a fervor he could in no wise have explained. He only knew that in upon the tumult of emotions consuming him had entered something quieting; something sweet and refreshing. Mr. Parker's wrinkled face lighted with honest pleasure.

"I felt sure you was Jim's son the minute I set eyes on you," he declared ingenuously, "an' sez I to myself, 'I'm a-goin' to speak to him, anyway.'"

"Mighty glad you did. Will you— Let's go and have a drink."

"I don't drink, myself, but I'll go along with you as fer as you go. I wanted to ask you a little about your pa. I always set a good deal by Jim Thompson, an' fer that matter I dun'no but he did by me. We was allus good friends, him an' me, an' I felt terrible sorry to hear of his death. There was an item in our paper about it, but I never got to hear any of the partic'lars."

A feeling akin to shamefacedness swept over Frank Thompson. "Father had so many friends. If I'd thought you'd been interested, I, I could have written, or sent you the San Francisco papers."

"Oh, it wan't to be expected you'd remember me, not seein' me since you was such a little shaver. This where you was goin' in?" He nodded toward the flashing doors just swinging to behind an ingoing customer.

Thompson took out his watch. "I believe it's something to eat I want, instead of a drink," he declared with attempted joviality. "I had no idea it was so late. We'll go where we can have a talk while we eat."

The little man pulled out his own old-fashioned timepiece. "Well, I declare! I been so interested gawkin' round that I hadn't noticed it was dinner time, but now't I come to think of it. I don'no but I do feel kind of empty. Yes, I don'no but I do."

"You came down to take in the Fair, I suppose?" queried the younger man, accommodating his impatient strides to the slower gait of the other.

"Yes." He hesitated, then went on a little haltingly. "First off I thought I wouldn't. Didn't seem like I could, some way. Ye see, my wife and I had planned to come together. She was terrible interested lookin' for'ard to it, Lyddy was, an' when she took sick an' died last fall, why, it didn't seem like I had any spirit for it, some way."

FRANK THOMPSON, glancing down at the wistful old face, with the unseeing eyes fixed on memory's perspective, felt a sudden sharp constriction in his throat. Involuntarily he slipped a guiding hand under the limp arm as the crowd thickened at the corner.

The old man roused at that. "My! Ain't it wonderful where all the folks come from?" He looked about animatedly. "Ye'd think it was a parade, wouldn't ye?"

He yielded himself readily enough to Thompson's piloting through the thick of the automobiles, street cars and hurrying pedestrians of the crossing, chuckling a little breathlessly when they reached the vantage point of the other side.

"Much ez your life's wuth to get acrost, ain't it? Still," the stooped old shoulders made a pathetic attempt to square themselves; the thin old face was lifted determinedly; "I don'no but it kinda livens ye up. I don'no but I'm glad I come, after all."

The activity of the hotel lobby as they entered reduced him to silence, nor did he recover, indeed, until they were seated at a table in the glittering dining-room.

"Pretty fine!" he chuckled, then comprehensively. "Reckon they don't make 'em any finer than this anywhere in the world."

THE LAMPS OF GOD

VERSE AND DECORATION BY HAROLD SPEAKMAN

OUT in the silent vastness of the night,
Foot-free I wander, musing on the wide
Star-studded portals and the timeless light
Of suns which in the gates of heaven tide
The mighty shocks of each millennium
With steadfast glow, and light the age to come.

Shine on, ye lamps of God, that bring to me
Unceasing promise of eternity.

The affectionate pride of the early Californian to whom San Francisco would remain always and forever "the city" glowed in the wrinkled face. The faded old eyes were alight with love and admiration. And again, glancing across at him, the younger man felt that curious tightening of the muscles of his throat.

The old man ate with the appetite accustomed to the hearty midday meal; and Thompson, going through a pretense of the same, found himself taking in something far more stimulating than the physical food on his plate. So refreshing was it, so temporarily obliterative of the fear at his heart, that he laid swift plans whereby he might prolong the surcease.

"I ain't been to the Fair yet." His guest's voice broke in upon his momentary abstraction. "Thought I'd take a little time to look round the city first. Ain't been here since '99. The summer of '99. So I sez to myself that I'd take a couple of days to look round the city."

"NINETY-NINE!" Mr. Thompson's plans instantly formulated themselves. "See here, Mr. Parker," he laughed almost buoyantly, "I'm going to take charge of you to see that you don't get lost. There have been some few changes here since the summer of '99."

"I wouldn't want ye to put yourself out." He looked across at him in deprecating uncertainty.

"I shan't," insisted Thompson, heartily. "Don't you worry a bit about that. But I'm bound you shall see the town right."

"All right, then, if it ain't a-goin' to put you to too much trouble."

Before the last course Mr. Thompson telephoned for his car, and it was waiting before the door when they left. They drove first to the modest rooming-house his guest indicated, where he had left his luggage.

Frank Thompson, himself, had been living at the club since his wife's departure for the East three weeks before, but in the impetus of his determination to cling to this unlooked-for surcease of his misery as long as possible, he had decided to take Jo Parker to his own house. There would be no trouble about it. Old Maggie and her husband Tom, the gardener, were in charge of the place, and he could depend on old Maggie. She still retained her skill at old-fashioned cookery, and the enthusiasm in her voice when he telephoned his wishes left no doubt of her approval of his whim.

Mr. Parker's straw suitcase secured, they drove to the luxurious offices in the great building which had been almost the last material expression of the senior Thompson's ambitions, and his old friend's ingenuous admiration of it fully justified the son's pride as he showed him through it.

"You're sure you kin spare the time now, to drive me round?" asked the old gentleman anxiously, when his host, after a few instructions to his secretary, closed the office door behind them.

"Sure, sure!" insisted Mr. Thompson, with an attempt at jocularity. "I've time to burn."

Indeed he would not for the world have relinquished the hope of respite from the misery that was throttling him, and which the old man's naïve companionship promised.

"I been thinking—" It was much later in the afternoon. Mr. Parker gazed absently at the vacant tracts owned by the Thompson estate past which they were driving, tracts which would some day be residence sections. He had already been shown the three imposing structures in the wholesale district, the shabbier store buildings dotted here and there, the blocks of flats and other material evidences of the Thompson wealth— "I've been thinkin', the last time I ever saw your pa was about a year before he died. He had been on a trip East, and on his way back he stopped off special to see me an' the old place. My wife she made me kill a chicken, an' she got up an extry supper, an' after supper Jim an' me sot out on the front porch till past midnight talkin' over old times. An' sez he to me then, sez he, 'Jo,' sez he, 'I've made a pile of money since I left here, but,' sez he, 'I ain't never been happier in my life than when I was runnin' that ranch yonder.'

"I think he meant it, too, when he said it, but still I've been thinkin', it must be a lot o' satisfaction to a man to see his money pilin' up and knowin' that he's goin' to put it into a block o' houses like them you showed me, or a great buildin' like that; that's got most every kind of business you can think of goin' on in it, an' them businesses reachin' out to every part of the world, as you might say.

"Yes, I can see how there would be a kind of visionin' goin' on with makin' money, same as there is with plantin' grain, about the crop that it's goin' to bring; an' it's the visionin' that keeps ye boosted up an' happy, whatever you're doin'. I can see how Jim would get a lot o' satisfaction out of makin' his money, seein' the things he was goin' to do with it."

He sank into a reflective silence as the machine sped smoothly out into the boulevard, a silence which thrust the younger man back into the purgatory of his thoughts again. He was aroused by the old man's next question.

"You've got a lot on your shoulders, though, ain't you?"

"Yes." Thompson did not realize just how much of bitterness escaped with the monosyllable. "I have."

"I mean"—the old man was still staring dreamily ahead—"I can see how there'd be a kind of visionin' goin' on with making money, as I say; but just spendin' it! That's different. When you've got a thing right in your hands without any trouble of gettin' it, why, there ain't any romance to it, somehow. Your father kinda had the best of it, it seems to me. But I s'pose you're a-visionin' things for your children."

A sudden grip at his heart wrenched a groan from Frank Thompson in spite of himself. He smothered it under an exclamation at the chauffeur as the machine skidded on a slippery curve.

THE tour ended finally in front of his own house on one of the commanding sites of the city. In spite of himself Mr. Thompson shivered as he put the key into the lock. But the place was not so tomb-like as he had feared. Maggie had exceeded her instructions. The shades were up in all the rooms, the whole house had been aired and warmed, and though the silence smote him sharply, there was nothing funereal in it.

Maggie herself served a delicious dinner, and the two men lingered a long time at the table afterward, the old man expanding in naïve enjoyment of his own conversational powers, under Thompson's tactful guidance. At last, however, he came back from his reminiscences to an abrupt realization of the beauty of the modern room in which he sat.

"My! But this is a pretty room, Frank." He stared about appreciatively. "Mighty pretty. And all these here table fixin's. I'm sorry your wife ain't to home. I'd ha' been proud to make her acquaintance. Your pa told me what a fine girl you'd married. An' the kids—he was terrible proud of the kids."

His host rose abruptly. "I want you to see some of the other rooms," he said, his voice not yet quite normal from his recent violent coughing.

"My! But you have a grand fine place, Frank!" His guest's shriveled figure seemed to expand with delight as he stood in the library, finally, and stared about at the books and furnishings.

"This is my wife and—the kids." He had braced himself for this moment, yet his hand shook a little as he lifted Edith's silver-mounted photograph from his desk.

The old man scanned it eagerly. "My! but she's pretty, Frank; mighty pretty. An' got a mind of her own, too, I bet. Yes, sir. No shilly-shally about her. An' these are the kids?"

"This is Dorothy, and this"—the thrill of pride was shot through with twinging pain—"is 'Jim Dick.'"

"Named after your pa, eh? I remember his name was James Dickson. An' a chip o' the old block, too. Ye can see it stickin' out all over him. Ain't that Jim's jaw to perfection? Yes, yes. An' your own's jest like it. An' the little gal, she's the picture of her mammy all right. My! But ain't she just about the prettiest thing ye ever laid eyes on?"

He continued to stare admiringly at the group as Frank replaced them on his desk.

"You've got a fine lookin' family, Frank. You have so. A handsome family an' no mistake. Must be terrible lonesome for ye without 'em."

Thompson did not answer. He was wheeling an easy chair into the embrasure of the great circular window which took up the northern end of the room. He faced the chair toward the window, though the shades were closely drawn.

"I want you to sit here, please, Mr. Parker," he beckoned. "Now, just a moment till I turn off these lights."

The next moment the room was in darkness, and the next the window shades shot up, revealing the exquisite jeweled panorama of the Fair Grounds on the curve of the Bay below. The old man gave a little gasping exclamation.

"How's that for an electrical display?" chuckled his host.

"Luella said ye couldn't describe it." The trembling old voice held an awestruck note. "She said ye had to see it to understand."

Thompson lighted the softly shaded lamp on the great desk in the middle of the room, and established himself comfortably in a companion chair beside his guest, prepared to point out the exceptional features in the glittering scene below; but he soon saw that the old man was attending but absently to his efforts. The explanation came after a little lull of silence.

"Don't seem right that Lyddy couldn't ha' lived to see it. I can't get used to her bein' gone. Been thinkin' about her all day, wishin' she could ha' rid round in the automobile with us. And now—this. Don't seem right, some way."

His voice trailed brokenly into silence, and a helpless sense of inadequacy kept Thompson also mute.

"No, I can't seem to get used to it, some way. Ye see, we wan't never separated, not to speak of, Lyddy and me. That is, not but onct." He hesitated, then faced Frank in the dim light. "She left me onct."

In spite of himself, Frank Thompson started violently. The old man's eyes dropped to the shimmering vista below. "It was my own fault. I made a fool of myself."

Again his listener winced. Then he found himself leaning forward with a curious tense sense of expectancy.

"I've never told any one, even my own son. It was before we come to Californy. We hadn't been married a great while. Our boy wasn't much more than a year old. It seems too silly to think about now, the start of it.

"The County Fair was goin' to be held over to Thurston, the town jest across the river from us, an' of course we was 'lowin' to take it in. At least I was, an' I s'posed Lyddy felt the same. But; lo and behold, when the openin' day came, if she didn't balk like a mule. She wan't goin', she said. She'd been kind o' contrary for quite a while back, without any cause that I could see, an' I was kind o' countin' on the Fair comin' to take the kinks out of her.

"'What's the reason?' sez I. ''Cause I don't want to,' sez she. Mind you, she hadn't let on she wan't goin' right up to time to get ready that first morning. If she'd been sick it would ha' been different, but it wan't anything but pure contrariness, as far as I could see, an' I jest made up my mind that I'd show her. So, sez I, 'I'm goin' to the Fair,' sez I. 'If you want to go along,' sez I, 'you be ready by the time I get hitched up.'

"Well, I kind o' fooled along at the hitchin', so as to give her time, and then I druv round to the front door, an' I hollered, 'Well, are you goin'?' There wan't no answer, so I clim out and went round to the kitchen door, an' blame me if that door wan't locked. I jest rip-snorted round that house an' into the buckboard, an' I went down that road like death was after me.

"You know what a county fair is. Everybody for miles round goes to it, an' of course everybody we knew was askin' about Lyddy an' why she didn't come, an' I felt so kind of cussed that I kep a-drinkin' at every whip stitch. An' then, all of a sudden, while I was roamin' round in the pavilion where the prize veg'tables an' fancy quilts and such like was, somebody hollered out, 'Why, here's Jo Parker!' An' there was Emily Pollard a-reachin' out her hand.

"She was a girl I used to be sweet on before I met Lyddy. She'd gone to the city three years before to work in a millinery store, an' I hadn't seen her since I was married. She was a good-looking girl anyway, an' dressed up in city style like she was, I tell you she looked stunnin'. She introduced me to a girl friend she had brought up with her from the city. Will Dunbar was with them. He was Em'ly's cousin. An' before I knowed it, him an' the other girl and me and Em'ly was walkin' round takin' in the sights and talkin' about old times like there wan't no sech person as Lyddy in existence.

"Ye see, Em'ly always was a good talker, an' I wan't reely responsible, as ye might say, for I wan't nothin' of a drinker, never had been, and the liquor I'd had just made a fool of me; made me feel kind o' smarty and puffed up when I saw folks a-starin'.

"I hung round with them all afternoon, and come closin' time, Will says, 'Say, Jo', we ain't never had that try-out we was goin' to between your horse and mine. The girls have got to go back to the city by the evenin' train,' sez he. 'Let's give 'em some real excitement before they go. Come on, Miss Wilkins,' sez he, 'we'll race him and Em'ly down to the Farley Oak,' sez he. With that he helps Miss Wilkins into his buckboard, and sez he, 'Come on, now, if you ain't afraid.'

"Well, I wan't goin' to stand any such taunt as that. I helped Em'ly in and away we went. I beat him by a neck, an' then we heard the whistle, and just managed to catch the train. And when that train finally hove out of sight, I begin to come to a halfway idee of just what a fool I'd been makin' of myself.

"I've no idee to this day how I got home, but it was bright moonlight, and the horse knew the way, and I rounded the last turn about midnight. I druv straight to the barn an' I managed to unhitch the horse somehow, and then I jest rolled over into the hay and slept. It was near noon when I come to myself next day. There wan't a sign of life around the house, an' I kin feel it now, that feelin' that hit me right in the stomach when I opened the kitchen door, like there'd just been a death in the house.

"There was a lunch set out for me on the kitchen table, and propped up agin the sugar bowl was a piece o' paper with big writin' on it to ketch my eye; 'I've gone to father's. Lyddy.'

"She'd left me. She was terrible proud-spirited Lyddy was, an' I knew what the neighbors would ha told her about my goin's-on at the Fair. But 'stead o' bringin' me to time, as you'd ha' thought it would, it jest seemed to raise the devil in me worse than ever. Well, I fit it out with myself during the next few days, and the week after I hitched up and went over to face Lyddy.

"There was a hill on her father's place where Lyddy an' I used to spend a lot of time durin' our courtin' days. There was a mighty pretty spot at the top where you could look out over the surroundin' country, an' we used to set there by the hour plannin' out what we was goin' to do when we was married.

"Somethin' kim over me to go up there before I went on to the house, so I hitched my horse at the foot of the hill and started up the path through the woods. I got pretty near to the top before I seen that Lyddy was standin' there at the summit. She didn't see me. She was starin' out over the valley. There was the pitifulest look on her face, an' her hands were kind of clasped up to her breast, and of a sudden, as I looked at her, I sensed it that my Lyddy was facing another trip through the valley of the shadder of . . . motherhood.

"I just laid right down there in the dirt at her feet; but she forgive me and went home with me, an' the next summer we come to Californy; and, as I say, we ain't never been separated since, not to speak of, till now.

"One lesson like that's enough for a man if he's really white. There's somethin' inside of ye that tells ye when ye've got the right woman for a wife, an' if you ever come nigh to losin' her onct, ye ain't goin' to philander round to risk it the second time. Not if you're in your right senses, ye ain't. That's the reason I've never had much use for whisky since then, either. I found it wan't much of a help toward keepin' ye in yer right senses."

A SINGLE stroke chimed out from the clock on the mantel. The old man started up with a little snort of amazement.

"That ain't one o'clock, is it?" He scanned his own watch in the dim light. "I swan to goodness, if it ain't. And if I ain't talked the lights all out at the Fair, too, and didn't know it! Say, you'd orter of choked me off."

Choked him off! With that secret story in his own heart running step by step with the recital! An indefinable sense of gratitude for the whole unique experience of the day filled him instead; a feeling too subtle and intangible for words, however, so he only found himself saying with cheerful matter-of-factness, "You can sleep as late as you like in the morning, you know."

The little man shook his head. "I never kin sleep after sun-up. Seems foolish, but I never can."

"Still, sometimes we do break the record," smiled the younger man, slipping his hand under his guest's arm with a gentleness amounting almost to tenderness as they started up the stairs.

Frank Thompson had no thought of sleep when he returned to the library. He did not glance at the clock when, hours later, he sealed his letter to Edith and slipped out to the post-box to mail it.

A streak of pink in the eastern sky caught his eye as he remounted the steps on his return, and he walked out on the terrace which commanded the full expanse. It had been long since he had seen the sunrise, and a curious exaltation mingled with the vague sense of solemnity in his heart as he watched it now. A step startled him presently.

"I didn't know as it would have the same feelin' in the city, but I see it does." Jo Harper's wrinkled face looked strangely illumined in the reflected light. "There's always a kind of a feelin' of hope about a sunrise, some way."

Among the Workers

IN many homes there is a wealth of good reading which has served its purpose there. Such literature might be utilized in missionary work. The Paper Mission receives applications from missionaries on large needy fields throughout the great West, from all over the Southland, also from Cuba, Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands. Rev. B. A. Loving, superintendent of the Paper Mission, Woodward, Oklahoma, will send any interested inquirer the name and address of persons to whom literature can be sent.

THE Home Mission Committee of the Lexington, Va., Presbytery is anxious to secure two competent Christian women to take charge of its Irish Creek mountain school and mission, located in Rockbridge County, Virginia. Rev. William E. Hudson, superintendent, Staunton, Va., will answer all applications.

MISS EDNA M. BRACK, appointed to the Weihsien station of the Presbyterian Mission at Shantung in 1913, who sailed for her field in September, 1914, after a year of postgraduate work at the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York, and had already won a place for herself in the hearts of her fellow missionaries and of the Chinese as well, died on the field October 10.

BECAUSE of the reduction of the number of National Guard troops on the border to 50,000 men and the withdrawal of General Pershing's expedition from Mexico, five of the Y. M. C. A. buildings at military camps were closed. The work continued in the remaining thirty-five buildings, which must still serve 90,000 soldiers. From the beginning of the border work to December 31, the total attendance at 523,911 religious services in these buildings reached 5,167,058; 12,083 men joined Bible classes; 19,085 signed cards indicating a purpose of better living; 12,234 men decided for the Christian life and 39,675 copies of the Scriptures were distributed.

I have just received the book, "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." I am greatly pleased with it and feel sure that it will do much good, and help many dear ones who need spiritual encouragement.

FROM ONE WOMAN TO ANOTHER

Conducted by MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

A Number of Letters:

SOMETIMES, when I'm feeling blue,
Tired-like, and lonely, too,
I get letters out and read them,
And I find a lot of cheer;
Words of comfort when I need them,
Good ideas, something new;
Ah, I feel as if folk love me,
And the sky seems warm above me;
Strangers seem like friends —and near!

Letters—what they mean to me!
Putting other lives before me,
Lives that are so fine they awe me,
Simple lives quite like my own,
Lives as mellow as the tone
Of an organ thrilling o'er me—
Words from folk I never see.

SOMETIMES when I'm feeling blue,
Tired-like, and lonely, too,
I get letters out and read them,
Finding friends when most I need them.

"IN Our Church We Have a Fine Missionary Society, But—" That's the way a letter from the Middle West begins. It goes on this way:

"The missionary society is doing splendid work. By strenuous efforts in the past years we have largely avoided the 'refreshment' craze and have attended to business. Lately there has been developing (and rapidly) the idea of trying to 'win new members by serving refreshments.' Though the character of the 'feed' (as students call it) is supposed to be regulated by rule, yet more and more time, money, and labor is expended upon each passing monthly meeting.

"Lately we had a 'praise service,' with refreshments. Our offering, in envelopes marked 'thank offering,' was twenty-two dollars. The refreshments cost nearly eleven dollars! Out of all proportion is the second to the first.

"Now what can we do to make our good energetic women in the churches realize that now—while we are surrounded by such misery as the world has not seen for fifty years—is the time to drop these 'feeds'?

"I believe most heartily in social gatherings, in get-together meetings for social, civil, and religious betterment. Please do not think me a grumbler, for I love people, fun, music, and so forth; but I do believe our women who have dinner or luncheon at noon, and will have their evening meal at the regular time, are not in need of special refreshment at 4:30 P.M. We feed not the hungry, starved mothers of families but those who come from comfortable homes and probably never have known actual hunger in all of their lives.

"With the thousands of our needy sisters in this and other lands calling for Bible schools, teachers, preachers, hospitals, and daily bread, and one decent garment to put on, are we not mocking our Lord with such praise services as mentioned above? Does not our Lord stand before us, and say:

"'O my daughters, what will it have advantaged you to give luncheons, teas, and suppers to serve refreshments when the price of them would have purchased hundreds of loaves of bread and butter for the soul-hungry ones whose uplifted hands appeal to heaven for help?

"'At the missionary teas you feed not the hungry but the full. The little you make would be trebled if you gave the full cost of time, labor and food. I, the Lord, ask self-denial. The extra feeding is self-indulgence.

"'I gave my life for thee. What dost thou offer me?'

"The women of the churches should send out a call to Halt! Look! Consider! and Remedy this extravagance! Thousands in Mexico are starving, so say our missionaries in private letters—so say our native Christians who write to us, begging help; and yet nothing is being done by any organization (as far as I can learn) to relieve the distress next door.

"Let your imagination fly over these beautiful states and pause at the multitude of teas, luncheons, and so forth, given in and by the churches to raise the money for strictly missionary work. You'll come home, tired out."

"I Used to Burn My Hands When I Took Pans Out of the Oven," writes Mrs. F. H. F. "But the other day I decided that there should be a safe way to do one's baking. So I took a piece of ticking one yard wide and cut across from selvage to selvage and sloped it toward the middle—until it resembled a large slipper sole. I then padded each end, thickly, for about ten inches, and placed another layer of ticking over it, forming on each end a small pocket. By putting a hand in each pocket one may take a large pan out of the oven with no danger."

"I've Been Wondering Much Over the Golden Rule"—the letter signed L. M. S. begins. "As I read of how one person will take the advantage over his weaker brother, I am made to wonder what a different world we would have if everybody heeded the true meaning of the Golden Rule.

"Everybody would be good, loving, gentle, heedful of the well-being of all around her. Then no one would lack in kind words and acts toward others in the common walks of life.

"If we would follow the Christ's example and give a soft answer when grievous words are spoken against us, what blessed lives we would live and what a splendid world we would live in!

"Let every American citizen walk through life worthy of the teachings of the Golden Rule, with all lowliness and meekness and long-suffering—forbearing one another in love, and endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

"Is It Wrong to Tell a Lie," questions an anonymous letter, "when telling the truth will make a loved one miserable? I have often wondered, and now the time has come when I must make a choice.

"My mother taught me to pray and never to tell falsehoods. My Sunday school teacher and my pastor have often cautioned us about sin. The worst sin, they have told us, is the sin of telling an untruth. When I was in school I once had to learn a memory verse that went like this:

"'Live pure, speak truth, right wrong.' And yet, although I've been brought up with all of this for groundwork, I sometimes wonder if a lie is not justifiable—if there are not extenuating circumstances."

"Why Wouldn't It Be a Good Idea," says a letter from Arkansas, "to start a wonderful summer resort, laid out on the plan of an ideal village? There could be resident doctors and ministers at the summer resort to teach us how to live so that we need not have any diseases of mind, or body, or soul. If we did not have any diseases of mind, or body, or soul, we would not need a resident sheriff or a jail.

"We might also occasionally invite lawyers and statesmen to visit the summer resort so that we can have a fair knowledge of the laws and problems of our country.

"If large communities would get together and have just such summer resorts I think vacations could be made profitable and helpful. Very often vacations are wasted when, physically and mentally, the vacation is needed."

"I never knew how much letters meant," writes a girl who is teaching far out West, "until I came out here. If it wasn't for my work I would be very lonely indeed.

"My work, however, keeps me rather well occupied. I teach three grades, three high-school classes, and give music lessons, besides evening and Sunday classes. And I do housework, too."

"Friday night is our 'social night'—We push back the tables in the dining-room and play games with the children. A good many of the older Indians come, and we surely have a funny crowd. Most of the women wear blankets and moccasins, and the men have their hair down in long braids. The men, however, are progressing faster than the women, because they object to having their wives dress well or learn anything. It was the women here who objected when the government required legal marriage. They said they wouldn't be able to run away when they wanted to. The Indian divorce custom was to put a blanket between the couple, with their belongings in it, cut it in two, and give each half.

She Won Out

MRS. ANNETTE ADAMS has the distinction of being Uncle Sam's only woman prosecutor. As assistant to the United States District Attorney in San Francisco she made the closing argument in the sensational Bopp neutrality case. Mrs. Adams worked her way through the California State Normal School and afterward taught in a small schoolhouse. While teaching she studied law, and took her degree as doctor of laws, from the University of California. After practicing law she was appointed by President Wilson to the office of Assistant United States Attorney.

One Indian admired our electric lights so much that he bought some bulbs and wire to put up in his house. In a few days he was back. He said the bulbs were no good; they wouldn't burn. Of course the connecting wire meant nothing to him.

"It's interesting—my work. But sometimes I get lonely for the white faces that I love. And letters mean such a lot to me!"

"What is wrong with the movies?" questions a mother of four children. "There was a time when I liked to go to our picture house and take the family. That was when the photoplays were sweet, clean plays—inspired plays. That was during the time when little romances were acted out, and little village stories—stories with pleasant endings.

"Now the photoplays are very different. It seems that I can never go to our picture house without seeing some 'vampire picture' or some unpleasant and embarrassing situations. I'm afraid to take the children to see a play unless I have first seen it myself.

"It seems to me that moving pictures might be very instructive and that they might have educational value. They could be a great force for the good of the community. But they're not. What is the matter with the movies?"

"I See by the Papers" That

MISS MABEL T. BOARDMAN of Washington has organized a Woman's League for Red Cross Service in time of war.

That when the president of the Woman's Equal Suffrage party offered the services of her followers to the United States government for military service, it became apparent that the party was divided. Though many of the suffragists believe in military training, an equal number are believers in peace at any price. This state of affairs has caused dissension and not a little unpleasantness.

That Mrs. Sanger, birth control propagandist, is now serving a thirty-day sentence in the workhouse. She is a model prisoner, and announces that she will obey all the rules of the institution.

That the club women of the United States are heartily endorsing the daylight-saving scheme. "While women will never unite to be time servers," said Miss Helen Barick Boswell at a luncheon of the National Daylight Saving Committee, "they will all unite as time savers."

That many women of our large cities are making a house-to-house canvass to determine church membership. All denominations—Protestants, Catholics and Jews—are cooperating in this movement.

A Sheaf of Ideas

I Have Learned this Week through my mail basket that—

A woman in the mountains of Tennessee, with no one to offer her even a little help or sympathy, has started a mission Sunday school. The school building is made of rough unpainted logs and it is sometimes rather cold, but she has filled it with the brightness of love and the warmth of human kindness. She is going to teach the poorest, most ignorant children to know God.

And I have learned that—

One of my correspondents, who is over eighty, has written an editorial good enough to be printed in the town paper. She has kept so up-to-date in her mind that, even though her hair is white, she is still very young in spirit.

And I have learned that—

A woman living, almost alone, in a tiny farm house in the middle of a vast plain has started a little friendship circle. Every week she exchanges magazines and letters with other women who are also living in isolated places. "It is almost as good as having neighbors!" she says.

A girl, gently bred, with a comfortable home, and plenty of money, and indulgent parents, has given them all up to sail across the seas and be a missionary. She will be situated in a disease-crowded community, where typhoid and leprosy and cholera lie ever in wait.

And I have learned that—

A little crippled girl in Georgia, a girl who is too weak to sit up, or read, or sew—a girl who is not strong enough in body to do anything but stay very still, is strong enough, in courage, to sing as she lies back on her pillows. "It isn't hard when you get the habit," she says. I have learned these things from my mail basket. But—what could YOU have taught us?

Industry's Creed for the Conservation of Human Energy and Betterment of Human Life. Second Paper

A DIAGRAM from the files of the Clothcraft Shop of Cleveland shows how practically a good medical department follows up an examination. The card not only presents the state of things in the case of Jane Doe when she was first examined but it shows what has been done for her. We see that she had at the start no organic disease, but that her tonsils were enlarged and five teeth needed attention. She suffered from headaches and sore throat, and the card shows that the cause of each was sought. In one case she had not been getting enough sleep. At another time it was anemia that was behind her ailments, and she was given a tonic and the nurse was directed to follow her up constantly about fresh air and the need of more sleep. She was persuaded to have an operation for her tonsils, which is reported successful. This seems to be doing a good deal for Jane, but it is only the beginning. So long as she is with the Clothcraft Shop, every time she complains, every time her work begins to fall off in quantity or quality, every time she doesn't appear at her machine, the reason will be sought and the remedy applied.

In this particular shop, the medical department is maintained as an arm of the employment and service department. There is a graduate nurse in charge of the work, there is a dispensary, waiting-room and rest room, and a consultation room for the factory physicians. And there is a medical staff, consisting of a physician, an oculist and a dentist. All of this is paid for by the company. Outside service from the factory physician is furnished to employees and their families at special rate.

There is no phase of the Clothcraft management from which it is believed a more direct return in dollars and cents comes than from this medical service.

It will be noticed in the above record that Jane consented in August of 1914, when it was found that she was anemic, to "go to summer camp." This shop is one of many in the country where the value of the annual vacation in keeping up efficiency has been amply demonstrated. Employers have come to the practice slowly. Men and women who work with their hands have never been generally considered fit subjects for leisure. Too often their only vacation is forced upon them by unemployment. Instead of being a time of pleasure, it is one of deprivation and anxiety. This is one of the inequalities of the working world which distressed good Sam Jones of Toledo—"Golden Rule" Jones—most sorely.

"It really seems a long way ahead," he wrote despondently once, "to the time when carpenters, blacksmiths, sewer-diggers, street-pavers, bricklayers, plasterers, streetcar men, drivers, railway men of all sorts, from the trackmen down to the superintendent, lumbermen, stone-men, farmers, kitchen-girls, laundry-workers, factory girls, shop girls, clerks, and indeed all sorts of workers, will have work and due wages with a vacation or rest time as certain for all as it now is for the teachers, the preachers and the majority of the professional classes.

"I am inclined to the opinion that today vacations, trips to Europe and the mountains and the seashore are more generally the privileges of those who do not work at all than of the workers of any sort."

Sam Jones never neglected an opportunity to hit at the social injustices in his own little world. In 1899 he inaugurated in the Acme Sucker Rod Company an annual week's vacation on full pay for all those who had been six months with the concern. His political enemies sneered at his vacations. A hostile newspaper declared that there were few large concerns in the country that did not give employees a week's vacation with pay. The editor would have been hard put to it to name a dozen where the men outside of the office received even a day with pay. Vacations come in many large concerns in the natural order of business. They are an incident of the annual shutdown for repairs and painting, but the men as a rule pay for them. Sam Jones was ahead of his world in this practice as well as in some others. He might have retaliated with incidents of men dropped entirely because they merely asked for vacations! There are still too many old-fashioned employers who don't want a man around who thinks that a week or two off in the summer is a good thing!

ONE of the most successful and sound developments in the vacation idea of which I know is that in the Pilgrim Steam Laundry of Brooklyn, N. Y. It was fifteen years ago that the first experiment in vacations was made by the firm. At that time, even more than today, people were insistent upon having their soiled linen collected on Monday and delivered not later than Saturday noon, which gave a very short week. Fewer people left their city homes for the summer months too, making the work heavier in proportion in the summer. The giving of vacations, at the proper vacation periods, was consequently a very difficult matter.

However, the feeling that it would be impossible to build up a stable and permanent organization without such a period for rest, relaxation and pleasure caused the management to attempt a vacation program. For three years the plan was to collect the names of those who wished to take a week off at their own expense, and to supply help for those weeks.

Twelve years ago the plan developed a little farther, and one week's vacation was allowed with pay to those who had been in the employ of the company for two years or more. Those who had been in the plant for one year and less than two were still allowed one week's leave of absence without pay in every case where arrangements could be made.

From these beginnings the vacation program was gradually extended as the growth and development of the business justified it, until at its present proportion: Superintendents receive four weeks' vacation with four weeks' pay. Heads of departments receive two weeks' vacation with two weeks' pay. Employees of one year receive one week's vacation with one week's pay. Employees of from two years upward have their choice in several combinations of part vacation and special pay.

Generous as this program is, the firm is not content. They believe that in the interest of efficiency they should enlarge it, and this undoubtedly will be done as the business justifies it.

Let no one think that an employer's work is done when he arranges for vacations for his force. Frequently it is only begun. It is a pathetic fact that to large numbers of people, particularly girls and women, the idea of a vacation is bewildering rather than exciting. Take girls of foreign parentage, even those born in this country, and it is not an infrequent thing for them to say when a vacation away from home is suggested, "I never heard of such a thing!" or "What can I do? I never have been out of New York," or Rochester, or whatever it may be, "in my life." That is, the idea of a vacation falls on the stoniest of ground. There is neither interest nor anticipation awakened. It is a gift of which they do not know the use. They do not want it because they never have learned the meaning of it. An employer who really knows his people and has come to this idea of vacation by the only sound process, that is, the recognition that change and recreation are absolutely essential to a stable interest in work, knows that he has on his hands a delicate educational task, one the more complicated because he generally does not know where to advise them to go.

It was a sympathetic sense of the difficulty great numbers of girls in New York City must have in placing themselves for their summer holiday and a fear that this difficulty might retard the growth of the vacation idea that four years ago led the women in the Metropolitan Section of the National Civic Federation to form a committee to collect and distribute information.

An investigation committee was sent out to look over boarding-houses and summer hotels within a reasonable radius of the town. All information collected was passed on to the girls in shops and factories. But immediately a second need was discovered. Girls who seized the information eagerly and planned to use it often found themselves when it came to vacation time without enough money to leave town (try saving twenty-five dollars a year on an incom

Cutting Down the High Cost of Automobiling

THE Apperson Roadaplane has done more than merely prove itself an efficient performer under all conditions of service. That was to be expected, of course.

But the remarkable tire mileage and the equally remarkable saving in fuel consumption, due to proper balance, and light weight—3000 pounds—have added as great a measure of fame to this car as its beauty of lines, luxurious appointments and mechanical excellence.

The low operating costs experienced by owners are astonishing for cars of the size and power of the Roadaplane Sixes and Eights.

Again the supremacy of Apperson designing has been made manifest in this car.

The question of operating cost is one that vitally interests every car owner. It is one of the factors that has had much to do with the steadily increasing popularity of the car which rivals the Aeroplane in its smooth-riding properties.

Let us submit some tire and fuel records. You will find them an interesting and helpful guide in your selection of a car.

under ten dollars a week in New York City and see for yourself if it is easy), and so a second undertaking grew up: that was a Vacation Savings Bank, an arrangement by which the girls in the shops and factories might deposit any sum from five cents up that they could spare from their weekly pay envelopes. This fund, which was started in November, 1911, with forty-three girls, enrolled in four years some 21,000 and had deposits of about $200,000. Fully half of these depositors have used their savings for vacations.

The cooperation of employers has been essential in carrying out the work. Scores of firms in New York City allow girls in their employ to act as agents for the Vacation Committee in their shops or factories on company time, and there is a general consent that the enterprise has worked for health and stability.

The preeminent service of the factory medical department is the education it gives in the care of the health. I have never known of a factory where the work has been undertaken intelligently, that the people were not its stanch defenders. They come, sooner or later, to look upon it as one of their rights and to demand its full service. In one factory where the employees have had the examination for some four years, the only complaint has come to be that some examiners are not as thorough as others! In this particular case, the examination is voluntary. Perhaps 15 per cent. refused to take it the first year. Everybody takes it now, and, as I said, insists upon its being thorough.

As for appreciation and cooperation when confidence in the service is established, it is hearty and fine. One company tells of a skilled workman who had left their plant for higher wages, returning in a few weeks. "My wife and I think," so he explained, "that the care and attention I get here is worth more than the difference in wages, so I am back to the old job." Another workman in this factory who had been badly injured and carefully nursed was given his compensation check. "What kind of a fellow do you think I am, anyway?" he said indignantly. "Haven't you been looking after me for over a year when anything was the matter with me? Not me!"

The real difficulty is that common to all health work. Men and women are indifferent to hygiene, to personal habits, until too late. "It never bothers me," "I feel all right," is the opposition in the factory medical department, as it is everywhere, to attempts to persuade a man that he is in a dangerous condition. The Kodak Company tells of examining an employee with blood pressure of 250, but when warned he declared he had never felt better in his life. In three months he was dead.

As for arousing employees to the need of fresh air, of regular meals, of correct posture, it can only be done by patient, line-upon-line training. As fine a campaign of education as I ever saw waged was that of the physician of a Cincinnati shop of some 6,000 men, almost none of whom drank water freely and most of whom suffered the usual results. By exhortation, explanation and entreaty given in public and private he was gradually persuading them to use abundance of water, and with excellent results. Six thousand men converted to the flushing system is a real contribution to national health.

The health bulletins and pamphlets are a practical feature of education in many plants. The Worcester (Mass.) Corset Company has for years issued booklets of information and advice suited particularly to the class and the habits of the hundreds of girls it employs. The care of the body, the importance of a healthy digestion—a score of topics are treated in so clear and personal a fashion that in the end they arrest the attention of the most careless. Health has become one of the ambitions of the girls in this factory through the continued efforts of the management.

Often the pay envelope is made the carrier for health pamphlets. Each week there is printed on its face some bit of advice so put as to interest and stick. The Beech Nut factory at Canajoharie, N. Y., has been particularly happy in the maxims it devises for its pay envelope. Invariably such lively phrases are repeated and quoted and more or less heeded.

GOOD as many of the health bulletins are, none of them that I have seen equal the series prepared by the Life Extension Institute. This organization fights degenerative diseases, and although it is but three years old it has already increased our knowledge of the serious inroads that they are making on the country's health and has aroused thousands of patients to the need of better habits. The Life Extension Institute gives one of the most thorough physical examinations that I personally have experienced. A full report is then made and followed by a personal interview with a diagnostician. If a difficulty calling for a physician's care or for special treatment or operation is discovered, the patient is so informed. For diseases which are the result of improper living, a proper regimen is prescribed. This preliminary work is followed by a series of monthly Keep-Well leaflets, of the most practical and scientific character. They aim not only to advise but to inform of whatever is new in the care of the health.

The true aim of the industrial medical department of a factory or shop is to put employees into condition and keep them there—Restoration and Prevention. The most serious abuse, indeed, the only serious abuse, of the system which I have ever known was using the department merely for temporary relief. This happens oftenest where large groups of girls are employed. The usefulness of the nurse and the first-aid room are measured not by the prevention of headaches, nausea and fainting spells, but by the promptness with which an indisposed girl is restored to her task. The means employed is more often than not a stimulant or opiate—something that acts quickly. This is a grave abuse of the system. It not only defeats the object of scientific management, which is to bring about a condition of sustained wellbeing among the workers, but it encourages one of the most pernicious habits of working women—dependence on drugs. Thousands of them take these so-called medicines as regularly as men take drinks. One has only to examine the columns of the newspapers, particularly those in foreign tongues, to see the extent of the appeal. In many of these journals I have found fully half of the advertising space devoted to cure-alls. The mere look of the pills and nostrums they send is enough to condemn them. If their use is continued they are as certain as liquor to injure the stomach and nerves.

One of the real services of the medical department of a factory should be fighting these remedies, just as it should be fighting alcohol. When instead of rendering this service it actually encourages, even teaches, their use, as it certainly does when its aim is returning the employee at once to his task, it is a menace instead of a help to health. It is, of course, proof that the employer has not caught the idea behind the factory health movement, that he is still concerned only with the day—not at all with the future.

The returns of all this work to the employer are not speculative. They can be measured in days saved, in product increased, and many factories have made such estimates. Take the work of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company.

The Tennessee company employs some 18,000 men, who with their families represent a population of about 50,000. About 53 per cent. of the employees are negroes. Although the mines and plants of the company are distributed over a wide territory, by far the greater portion are comprehended within an area having a fifteen-mile radius from Birmingham. At the outset it was believed that general sanitation and preventive medical care not only constituted a moral responsibility but gave results that paid; that is, it was cheaper to prevent disease than to cure it. The soundness of this viewpoint has already been demonstrated. The average earnings of the employees have increased in a higher percentage than their rates of wages. The average number of working days per month has increased from 16 to 22.

Jesus the Bread of Life

International Sunday School Lesson for March 11
John 6 : 22-40

Christ's Spiritual Ministry Supreme

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE second part of the sixth chapter of John is a discussion of the true Bread of Life, and grows naturally out of the feeding of the five thousand. John sees the miracle as a "sign" or guarantee of the infinite spiritual resources in Christ, a kind of acted parable of his power to feed the souls of a needy people. Such also was the Lord's own feeling. He had not come to provide food for the hungry; his primary mission was to the human spirit. From a redeemed, spirit-filled humanity the necessary good works would flow.

Low Views of Religion

BUT the people did not grasp the significance of Christ's work. He sadly says, "Ye seek me, not because ye saw signs, but because ye ate of the loaves and were filled." At a meeting for laboring men the call of God to lofty ideals of sacrifice was being presented when a voice interrupted, "We don't want that—what we want is more bread and more beer." Even when religion is the theme, men are often tempted to measure it by temporal standards. "What do I get out of it?" was the response of a steady attendant whom I asked to join our church. Not much if that is the spirit of approach! For it clearly implies a worldly plane of thought, to receive loaves and fishes, rather than to fellowship with the Christ of God.

Self-seeking in religion leads to formalism, and superstition, and even to hypocrisy. The higher self is indeed ministered unto by all true faith, but the hope of advantage, of exemption from misfortune, of direct physical reward, has been the bane of Christianity. One can't be genuinely religious from motives of policy. It pays —yes, indeed!—but not when the pay is the thing sought. Alas that even in our day some regard Christianity as a sort of insurance against ill-luck, or a life-preserver in time of wreck, instead of a new power within the heart of the believer, by which all the vicissitudes and disasters of life can be met victoriously.

The Supreme Values

"WORK not for the food which perisheth, but for the food which abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of man shall give unto you." What effort, what toil and struggle, what compromises and evil deeds to secure this world's goods, its delicate foods, its luxuries of wealth, its indulgences of bodily desire! "All which things are to perish with the using," as Paul told the Colossians. Are there the same strivings, the same labor and planning, to develop the faith, the love and Christ-like character that shall endure forever?

It is not that the lower needs are to be ignored—"your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." But the danger is that these shall be all-important, shall bulk first and largest in our eyes. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." We must put first things first. Even in seeking Christ, are we going to wait until we are driven to him by hunger, by bereavement, by poverty? Or do we now, in health and strength, calmly and serenely go to him morning by morning, because our hearts are fixed to do the will of God? Happiness may be found in daily work, in the home, in friendship, in study—when happiness for oneself is not the goal but the by-product, something that takes care of itself. There is no life, no circumstance that cannot have the higher happinesss, called by Jesus "blessedness"; but trust in God and denial of self are fundamental.

What Must We Do?

THE people were franker than we: they confessed their perplexity as to how to go about the higher life that he indicated, how to cultivate loftier ideals of human satisfaction. "What must we do?" is the appeal of sincere inquirers to prophets and priests and teachers in all ages. So the publicans and the soldiers asked of John the Baptist (Luke 3). So Paul asked of the Vision on the Damascus road. So the Philippian jailer implored of Paul (Acts 16 : 30). How shall we begin the Christian life? What is the prerequisite to working the works of God acceptably to him? The Bible says, confidence in the value of goodness, belief in such works as worth while.

The answer of Jesus was, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." Faith is the foundation of service. The thing nearest at hand for the Galileans was to accept Jesus as divinely commissioned to teach them God's way. Unless they had confidence in him further parley was useless. Spiritual truth can only be received by minds imbued with confidence in God and in the means God uses to impart his will.

"What sign showest thou then?" They had forgotten the miracle of the preceding day! But no physical miracle guarantees to any one the ability to perceive truth. He might work countless miracles and yet not minister to blinded souls, not open selfish hearts. The miracle indeed came from God. The manna came from God. The barley loaves came from God. But from God also comes the revelation of his will, the manifestation of his love, the unveiling of his truth in Jesus, and therein is spiritual food, the veritable Bread of Life, the Manna of the soul. It is on a higher plan than any provision made for the body, even by miracle.

Is Jesus Our Living Bread?

HAVE we been doing this first "work of God"? Have we really been believing on Jesus? Have we pondered thoughtfully his teachings and agreed with them? Let us see. Jesus said, "Blessed are the peacemakers." Have we helped to howl them down in our day? He taught, "Blessed are the meek." Do we think it wiser to be self-assertive and grasping? He taught love of enemies, prayer for them that despitefully use you. Yet the great British Weekly, in the person of Dr. Smith, excuses English Christians from praying for the Germans, correcting some lofty-souled minister of Christ who had advocated it.

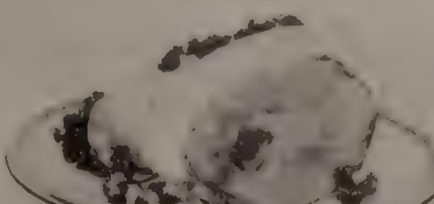
Jesus said it would be better to be drowned in the sea than to offend against the welfare of a little child. Which would we prefer? Has this any application to child labor in American factories and tenements?

Jesus said that a man who heaps up riches and forgets God is a fool. Do we ever envy such men? Jesus told us to be like the Good Samaritan. If he is our Bread of Life we have not passed by the distress of our fellow men like the priest and the Levite.

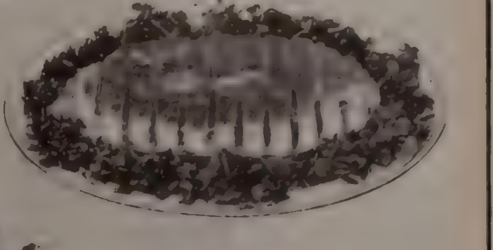
The Supremacy of Jesus

TODAY we are realizing as never before the supremacy of Jesus above all others whom God hath sent. Art, philosophy, social science and history unite with religion "that in all things he might have the preeminence." Surely then we Sunday school teachers must never leave Jesus out of a lesson. We preachers must never leave his spirit out of a sermon. Yea, more: we busy men and women must strive so to live that we never leave him out of a day or a task or a pleasure.

Sometimes the church has forgotten that Jesus is able to seek and to save the lost; but evangelistic revival has come. Again, some have forgotten that he is able to keep and to build up our children so that they never need be lost at all; but now Christian nurture, Christian



Your family [illegible] boiled. It is [illegible]



They will enjoy it when you serve the savory center slices broiled or fried without parboiling.

All the rich, yet mild flavor is brought out in baking the butt.

Buy it whole – so delicious your family will want it often

So popular are they for their flavor, that thousands of women buy "Swift's Premium" Hams whole.

They find that with a whole Premium ham they can give their families a greater variety of dishes than with any other meat—each dish so good that the family asks for it over and over again.

You would understand why the flavor of "Swift's Premium" Ham is so delicious if you could see the care and skill which is lavished on every detail of preparation. Experts select the very choicest hams. They are given a special cure which takes longer, is more expensive and troublesome than that ordinarily used, but which produces a far more delicious flavor. In the spicy, fragrant smoke of hickory wood, all the mellowness, all the savor is brought out. Even with all this care, only one ham out of five is considered so perfect as to be branded "Swift's Premium."

Get one of these hams today and see how much your family enjoys its flavor—how quickly it disappears once they taste it.

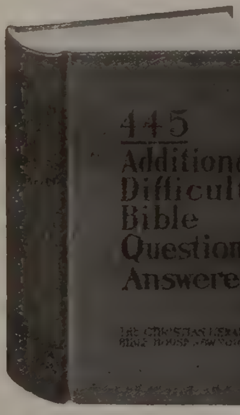
CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOKS

445 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED



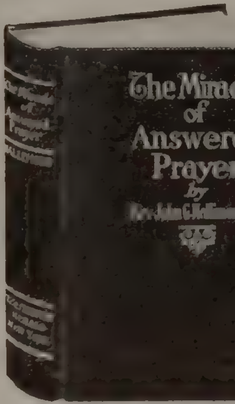
WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00

THE MIRACLE OF, ANSWERED PRAYER



By Rev. John G. Hallimond, D.D.

THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

This book contains authenticated instances, not ancient, but happening in our own time—now—of answered prayers. There is hardly a conceivable situation in human experience which is not included in this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York, N. Y.

training are here. Let us never fail to recognize the Christian life as the normal, proper, natural life for those whom God has made in his image. It is sin that is abnormal and unnatural. Bread is for the healthy. The Bread of Life will nourish us and keep us well. If we feed our boys and girls with the Living Bread which cometh down out of heaven they will never grow spiritually weak or sick and need bitter medicine. If any man eat of this Bread he shall live forever.

Yet feeding upon Christ is no light and easy matter. It cost him much to give himself for the world. It costs us much to take him into our souls. We have to become so imbued with his passion and his purpose that it is not an exaggerated simile that he used—as bread becomes part of our bodies, so he himself must be assimilated into our very selves. It is a pretty strong symbol—to eat his flesh and drink his blood. It means something a great deal deeper and harder and more effectual than taking communion in a church. We must make his life a part of our life, we must make his cross our cross, his spirit ours. Admiring a fine loaf of bread, praising it, chemically analyzing it, comparing it with other foods—are not eating it. Just so admiring and praising Christ, comparing him with other teachers, dissecting Bible books—all well enough in their place—these are no substitute for making him your personal Saviour and the Master of your life. "For me to live is Christ," and "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me": these are the vital experiences of the men who eat the living bread.

The Open Arms of the Christ

"HIM that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." This is the charter of a universal welcome to Jesus. Let us not seek to limit or abridge it. Whosoever will may come. Not necessarily in our way—there are diversities of ministration and the same Lord." Not necessarily in our denomination, "but the same God who worketh all things in all." Not even the same sort of results—for "there are diversities of gifts—but the same spirit." It is the spirit of life in Christ Jesus that all the world needs. If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. And all the world can have his spirit if it will only come and learn of him. For though the needs of the multitude be many—and they be more than five thousand times five thousand—in our Father's house is bread enough and to spare. Christ is not exhausted. Whosoever cometh to him in faith shall not hunger, and he that believeth in him shall never thirst.

Lord, evermore give us this bread.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Illustrate the Lesson

ILLUSTRATIONS are the windows of the lesson. They fasten truth. The Great Teacher knew their value. "Behold the fowls of the air." "A sower went forth to sow." "Behold the lilies of the field." Without a parable spake he not unto them.

The best illustrations are not always those you obtain from books. They are frequently those that come out of your own experience and observation, or are clipped from the daily or religious press.

The plan I would suggest to the teacher is to make up your own scrap-book of illustrations for clippings, or in which you can write the best things you observe or read or hear. The habit which such a scrap-book would impose would be of real value, and the careful use of a few good illustrations every Sunday will make a vast difference in the effect and interest of the lesson teaching. Scholars will be watching for these windows, and you can secure their cooperation by requesting them to bring to the class the best illustrations of the lesson they can find.

The president of a large company in the West, superintendent of a successful Sunday school, makes it a point to gather illustrations for his school from his travels. Frequently they are object-lessons, and the school is always glad of his return, for they know he will have something of interest for them. Let every teacher be an illustration-scout. It goes without saying that the illustration should be told not for its own sake, but to illuminate and grip the truth it illustrates.

A New York State teacher of young ladies says: "I always try to use illustrations common to their life. I found a very useful one some time ago on the condemnation of the Pharisee by Jesus, by saying that the Pharisees were like a snowball of pure white snow with a bit of rotten meat at the center. They have not forgotten it yet."

A number of teachers emphasize the importance of drawing illustrations from the common life of the scholar or from real life as a point of contact, building from what they know to what they should know. One teacher says: "By story, by personal application to present-day conditions compared with the time studied about."

A teacher of a Pennsylvania class of adults: "I usually look over illustrations and other lesson helps, and also find many in my experience. When I find it advantageous to illustrate a point, I usually can recall an illustration to use."

A teacher of a Kansas young ladies' class: "Whenever I have anything in my own experience—a good story or other interesting illustration that really illustrates—I give it."

A teacher of New Jersey big boys writes: "I try to modernize everything as much as possible."

One teacher feels strongly the value of this plan for her sixteen-year-old boys: "The story. Of all the things a teacher should know how to do, the most important, without exception, is to be able to tell a story."

From a teacher of girls about thirteen years old: "Stories, historical facts, blackboard illustrations, drawing the object by a few quick strokes of the chalk, sometimes by some object taken to the class."

Mr. Hudson, of the Baraca class, says: "I use the Illustrator and other helps for illustrations, and adapt them to the topic to touch the men's life."

For Junior boys, a teacher uses this plan: "I use essential illustrations to youngsters to make points clear before coming to the lesson proper. Then I supplement with additional stories."

Another wise teacher of Juniors says: "One rule of architecture is, 'Never construct ornament, but ornament construction.' The same thing holds true in regard to an illustration and the climactic point of the lesson story."

Trained for Teaching at Eighty-three

MRS. HARRIET SMITH of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, last fall completed her teacher's training course and received her advanced diploma from the International Sunday School Association of North America. She is almost eighty-three years of age, was born a slave, and could neither read nor write when she was freed at the age of thirty-three. Through the Sunday school she then obtained a copy of the New Testament, and with that and a primer she learned to read. For almost thirty years she has been superintendent of the African Baptist Sunday school in Mount Pleasant.

Some years ago in a county Sunday school convention she saw a class of graduates receive their diplomas, and she set to work immediately to win one for herself. After several years of the most faithful study, and with the assistance of the County Sunday School Association secretary, she passed all her examinations successfully, receiving her diploma with an average of ninety per cent. Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

UNDER the Jewish law, each father was charged with the spiritual instruction of his children. As they sat together in their house he was commanded to tell the story of Jehovah and his dealings with his people. Thus was woven into the fabric of the national life the thread of faith which kept the Jewish people a nation through captivities, dispersions, persecutions and migrations. It is true that the father's duty was not always performed, that Israel as a nation frequently forgot God, and that the captivities were due to this forgetfulness and the resulting sin; but it is also true that there were always homes in which the true faith of Jehovah was kept inviolate, homes that produced such youths as Daniel and his three friends, such women as Esther.

The coming of Christ and the instituting of his church did not remove from the father his duty as the spiritual leader of his family. The Christian home is, and always will be, the strongest bulwark of the faith, and the family altar has been to Christendom what the telling of the writings was to Israel. The times of strength in the church have also usually been times of renewed lighting of family altar fires. Of late there has appeared in many quarters a new trend toward the rebuilding of these places of prayer. It is a hopeful sign.

Mrs. C. H. writes thus to the Prayer League: "Our family has always enjoyed the family altar. We have the Lord's Prayer in concert at our breakfast table and Bible-reading and prayer in the evening. One morning our daily worship was interfered with and our little boy came in at noon and said, 'Mamma, everything has gone wrong today, and I think it is because we did not have prayers this morning.'"

Prayer is asked for the healing of a minister's child, two years old, who has never walked, and whom a specialist has declared paralyzed, declaring also that its healing would be a miracle. Now these friends come to God, who in the past has done greater miracles, in whom they fully believe, and they ask him to heal their child.

A member of the League rejoices that her father accepted Christ as his Saviour before his death. She asks prayer for a certain family once separated but now reunited, that the bonds of mutual love and trust may securely hold, and that the father may be given strength through Christ to overcome his weakness, the cause of all their trouble.

F. H. B. requests prayer that God will put it in the heart of a man who owes him and his wife money to return that which rightfully belongs to them; that their daughter may be restored to health and strength and become a Christian; that God will guide them in locating a home; and that wife's sister and brother-in-law may accept Christ.

W. H. F. asks prayer for the passage of all bills in Congress which will hasten or strengthen prohibition. He exclaims: "The Lord is hearing the prayer of his people. May he hasten the time when our whole land shall be delivered from the terrible curse of the legalized liquor traffic and kindred evils."

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

("pray for world-wide peace, temperance and purity"); Newark, Ohio ("pray for prohibition throughout the earth"); Goshen, Ind. ("pray that the prohibition bill for Indiana may safely pass the Senate.")

Recipes showing how Royal Baking Powder saves eggs

In many recipes requiring several eggs, excellent results may be obtained and considerable saving in cost realized by reducing the number of eggs and using an additional quantity of Royal Baking Powder, about a teaspoon, for each egg omitted. The following recipes are given as practical illustrations:

WHITE LAYER CAKE
½ cup shortening
1 cup granulated sugar
⅔ cup water
2 cups flour
3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
Whites of 2 eggs
1 teaspoon extract
The old method called for 3 eggs
DIRECTIONS:—Cream shortening and sugar together until very light; add water slowly almost drop by drop and beat constantly; add flavoring and stir in the flour and baking powder which have been sifted together twice; fold in the whites of eggs which have been beaten until stiff and dry, pour into two greased layer tins and bake in moderate oven 20 to 25 minutes. Put together with any filling or icing.

EVERYDAY CAKE
1 cup sugar
¼ cup shortening
1 egg
¾ cup milk or water
1¾ cups flour
½ teaspoon salt
3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
1 teaspoon extract
The old method called for 3 eggs
DIRECTIONS:—Cream shortening; add sugar, flavoring and egg well beaten. Sift dry ingredients, add alternately with the milk to the first mixture. Bake in loaf, layers or patty pans. May also be used for cottage pudding.

EGGLESS MUFFINS
2 cups flour
1 cup milk
4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
2 tablespoons sugar
1 teaspoon salt
2 tablespoons shortening
Makes 18 Muffins
The old method called for 2 eggs
DIRECTIONS:—Mix and sift dry ingredients. Add milk, stirring until all lumps are out, add melted shortening. Beat well and bake in greased muffin tins in hot oven from 20 to 25 minutes.

Concrete Road between Bismarck and Alvin. Part of a system of 144 miles of concrete being built in Vermilion County, Ill. The Eclipse Construction Company of Winnetka, Ill., had the contract. P. C. McArdle was the Superintending Engineer.

How to Plan, Build and Pay for Permanent Highways

Vermilion County, Illinois, an Excellent Example

From the standpoint of effective planning of routes, of wise construction and of sound financing of the cost, Vermilion County, Illinois, is well worth the careful study of any county or state in the country.

What is Being Done: A system of permanent highways is being built in one immediate undertaking, to connect all towns and villages with each other and with Danville, the county seat. Of the total mileage, 144 miles are concrete. This is the largest mileage of permanent highway ever undertaken at one time in a single county.

How Little It Costs: The total cost of building these roads is about $1,500,000. The county is not raising this money all at once by direct tax, nor is it attempting to build a few miles each year out of current road funds; it is issuing serial bonds for the full amount, which are retired by twenty annual payments of about $100,000, including the interest.

THESE PAYMENTS IMPOSE AN AVERAGE TAX OF ONLY 8¾ CENTS PER ACRE OF FARM LAND AND LESS THAN 90 CENTS UPON THE AVERAGE TOWN LOT. AFTER TWENTY YEARS THE DEBT IS WIPED OUT BUT THE ROAD SYSTEM REMAINS, TO RENDER MANY MORE YEARS OF SERVICE.

The wisdom of such a plan of construction and finance is apparent when you consider that Vermilion County during the past ten years had spent upwards of $1,600,000 for road and bridge work, and of this expenditure little of real value remains.

An Incalculable Benefit: The benefits of good roads are too obvious to need comment. But everybody does not realize how much these benefits are dependent upon a continuous system of highways, instead of small, scattered stretches which leave long gaps between them of mud, holes and ruts. To all such the example of Vermilion County is a splendid object lesson.

Concrete is the recognized material for building permanent highways just as it has long been the recognized material for important engineering works and structures demanding solidity and strength.

Get posted on concrete roads; write for Bulletin No. 136 and then see your road authorities; that's the first step in securing durable roads in your community.

Relief Goes On

As we write this, America is still at peace with all the world, and we pray that she may so continue; but widows and orphans, babies and old people are now suffering—yes, dying—from cold and hunger in that war-swept, cannon-devastated land where combat has not ceased. At the first threat of war it was thought that the relief work might have to stop; but when calmer counsels ruled, it was found to be still possible, even as it was still imperative, to continue the work. It was officially announced that the workers of the American Commission for Relief in Belgium would be permitted to continue their merciful enterprise. Since Turkey and the United States were still friends, the work of relief in Armenia and Syria was not affected, except as the movement of ships was restricted by belligerent danger zones. The work of the Christian Herald Relief Fund in Poland and Galicia, conducted as it is by local committees, will go on. It may be difficult to forward money, but ways will be found by which the sacrificial offerings of members of the Christian Herald Family shall minister to the relief of suffering and to the saving of precious lives.

Again we ask you to face the vision of starving motherhood and childhood, and to pray earnestly—and give liberally. We believe that serious thought and earnest prayer will impel hundreds more of our good friends to set aside a definite amount regularly for the relief of these widows and orphans, whose care the Father of all seems to have placed definitely in our hands. Join one of the monthly offering clubs. It is a reasonable, business-like, Christlike thing to do if you can see your way or pray your way to a definite monthly gift.

Please address your gifts to the Christian Herald, Room 93, Bible House, New York City. In due course acknowledgment will appear in the paper. State any preference you may have as to the use you wish made of your gifts.

To Make the Study Lucrative as Well, $5,628.00 in Cash Rewards Will Be Paid.

If You Win the First Reward, you will receive $1,000.00 in gold. Think of all the things $1,000.00 can buy! The second reward will be $800.00, the third $600.00, the fourth $400.00, et cetera. Remember, there will be one thousand rewards—ample opportunity for you to earn one.

At The Close of the Day, you and "the folks at home" can make the spare hours golden opportunities for ennobling your life.

The tendency is to seek enjoyment that is usually of little or no profit. Too many persons pursue common pleasures so incessantly that they waste many hours of valuable time.

The Bible Picture Study affords a perfect entertainment for one—or for several—and every moment of the time occupied in it has a distinct value in the participant's life. This is why it is encouraged by religious and general educators, as well as by others.

Can You Solve This Problem?

Here are three Bible verses.

Look at them carefully and select the one which interprets the meaning of this picture.

> And he said, Hear thou therefore the word of the Lord: I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left. I Kings 22 : 19.
> And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. Gen. 28 : 12.
> How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days. Matt. 12 : 12.

Example Picture

How simple is this problem! You can see at once that the second fits the picture best. At the same time, you are bringing to mind again these wonderful words of God.

The Study presents sixty pictures for you to solve. Three of them are here on this page.

To Procure the Outfit

Why not bring the Bible Picture Study to the attention of some friend? A pastime of this sort, which ennobles as well as entertains, is surely a blessing to every home into which it enters.

If you induce a friend to take a six months' subscription to the Christian Herald at $1.00, we will present you with a Bible Picture Study Outfit, consisting of "Pearls from the Bible" (containing the eligible answers), the Answer Book, and also, when requested, all the pictures previously published.

Remember, this six months' subscription can be sent only to those who are not regular Christian Herald subscribers.

You may obtain the Outfit by renewing your subscription for one year at a total cost of $2.35. If you should desire to subscribe to other magazines as well, we will gladly let you know the cost of doing so.

Any person not now a Christian Herald subscriber may also obtain the Outfit and a year's subscription at a cost of $2.35.

SAXON "SIX"

There is a Strong Public Belief

In the Superiority of Saxon "Six"

At last it has dawned upon motor-car buyers in general that, strictly speaking, there is no rivalry between a car of less than six cylinders and Saxon "Six."

With less than six cylinders propelling the car, there are bound to be slight intervals between explosions.

With six cylinders, as in Saxon "Six," these intervals between impulses are eliminated and the power-stream produced is of practically perfect continuity.

Necessarily, then, in the "less than six," with fewer impulses at any given time, the force of each impulse must be more severe upon all moving parts.

In Saxon "Six," for instance, as compared with one of the best known "less than six cylinder" cars of like price, there is nearly 98% more impulses per minute at 20 miles per hour.

And this super-smoothness of Saxon "Six" power-flow is clearly reflected in its abler performance.

In high-gear work, in pulling power, in flexibility, in acceleration, Saxon "Six" is matchless among cars of like price.

Saxon "Six" is $865; "Six" Sedan, $1250; "Four" Roadster, $495; f. o. b. Detroit. Canadian prices: "Six" Touring Car, $1175; "Six" Sedan, $1675; "Four" Roadster, $665. Price of special export models, "Six," $915; "Four," $495; f. o. b. Detroit. (925)

Young People's Topics for March 11

Spreading the Good News (Personal Evangelism)

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics. Acts 8 : 14–17; John 1 : 35–42

THE first act of two of the earlier disciples was to bring another. The three thousand converted at Pentecost went into every corner of the world telling the good news of Christ the Saviour of men. In the early apostolic church every member was eager to carry the message to some one else, and the work of the evangelists was in many cases rather the instruction and perfection of converts than the conversion of sinners. Every Christian of the first century knew that he had been saved from sin by the atonement of Jesus, knew that he had received power through the Holy Spirit to overcome sin and temptation and to endure suffering for his sake. It was comparatively easy for such to spread the Gospel message and to lead others to Christ. At every time since Pentecost that there has been a great awakening, the leaven of it has been personal work of individuals with individuals. Every great evangelistic effort of today is based on personal effort. Before Billy Sunday opens a campaign in any city, the Christians of that city will have spent six weeks or more in prayer for consecration and for souls and in preparation for personal work. Billy Sunday assails wickedness as the general of an army that is trained and ready. Any Christian can lead another person to Christ if he knows the way. The man who can say only "I hope I am saved," whose faith has never compassed full assurance, will find it hard to lead other men to such a faith, for mankind wants a salvation that is absolute and definite. If, then, you would do personal work, stay on your knees until your consecration is complete and your heart is filled with the spirit of assurance. Then go forth trusting in his promise to be "with you always."

Epworth League Topic. Rom. 12 : 15; II Cor. 11 : 29; John 20 : 15

SYMPATHY is one of the elements which make human nature akin to the divine. Sympathy means sharing. We use it, all too frequently, to imply regret at the suffering of another, and, when used in this sense, our expressions of sympathy are often less a sharing of the other's suffering than a form of thanksgiving that it did not happen to us. Regret is not sympathy. But when the sorrow of another so fills our own heart that we can only grip his hand in a firm grasp of understanding that needs no expression, then we and he are in sympathy. We can and should also be in sympathy with another's joy, but it should be a real heartfelt happiness at his good fortune. People who do things, who are making good, whose worth is being recognized, are always blessed with friends whose fulsome praise and vocal adulation bears the imprint of self-seeking. That is not sympathy.

Charity is not always sympathy; in fact, the greatest weakness of modern charity is its tendency to such complete standardization that each opportunity becomes only "case number —," and the whole element of sympathy is lost. Neither is sympathy evidenced in charity that is given to soothe an uneasy conscience. "The gift without the giver is bare," and always will be.

If two harps are in perfect tune, the sounding of any string of one will set to vibrating the similar string of the other. That is sympathy, but it is not human sympathy, for human sympathy finds its genesis in unselfish love.

HERE, where the Rome of the Cæsars satiated itself with sports, sports often lighted by flaming Christians dipped in pitch, while other Christians fought as gladiators or fell before the rush of hungering beasts; here, where the emperor's thumb down-turned cost the life of many a saint—and many a sinner, too, no doubt—and where mercy was so rare as to excite immediate disapproval; here, where was focused all the brutality of militant Rome, the tourist of today sits awed by the majesty of the ruins which still attest the genius of the builders. The Coliseum is the greatest relic of the faded grandeur of Rome, as it was one of the latest monuments of the imperial era. It was begun by the emperor Vespasian in 72 A.D., on the site of Nero's palace, and was finished by Domitian in 82 A.D. A fourth story was added later, in 235 to 238 A.D. The building was circular, 157 feet in height, and capable of seating 50,000 people, while 20,000 more could find standing-room. Cæsar's seat was just above the second pillar shown in the picture. The three lower stories were supported by arches, the ruins of which are plainly seen in this photograph, rising in tiers above the central arena. The first story was of Etruscan architecture, the second Ionic, and the third and fourth Corinthian. The seats were of marble, the exterior and the facing of the main corridors of stone, and the inner walls of brick and natural cement concrete. Underneath the arena were dens for wild animals and cells for the victims in the sports.

The Coliseum stood practically unharmed until the fifteenth century, when it began to be used as a source of building material. Pope Benedict in the eighteenth century is reported to have stopped this vandalism and to have secured the preservation of the ruins.

THE Japanese Christian Alliance of New York City, an organization of Japanese Christian ministers and laymen, has joined with the Japanese New York Mission, now operating under directions of the Reformed Church in America. The mission was founded in the nineties by a Christian Japanese, Mr. Shirose, and his American wife, who through it were enabled to reach many hundreds of Japanese students. The house at 330 East Fifty-seventh Street, an old four-story brownstone residence, became an American home for Japanese young men, many of whom found Christ while living under its roof, and after their college course returned to help in the building of the new Japan. It has been estimated that there are 3,000 Japanese in New York City.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. S. B., Mount Zion, Ind. Please explain Luke 3: 16. "John answered, saying unto them all, I indeed baptize you with water; but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

Some commentators refer the "fire" here mentioned to the fire of judgment, but this is probably erroneous. What the apostle here means to convey is the distinction between his somewhat external baptism, which was to many nothing more nor less than a mere symbol, and the more penetrating "inner" baptism of Christ with the Holy Ghost and its accompanying fire of purification. The figure of "fire" as a purifying agency is found in other places in the Scriptures, I Peter 1 : 7; Ps. 66 : 10; I Cor. 3 : 15. It is as if the apostle had said, "I baptize you with water to repentance, but that is not enough. What you still need is the baptism with the Holy Ghost, whose influence in your hearts will burn out all impurities and dross, as fire does when it burns out the slack and earth, and leaves the fine silver behind. So it must be with you. All impurities and alloys must be burned away, and the Holy Ghost and his fiery zeal will do it.

H. K., New Matamoras, Ohio. There is nothing in the Scripture to show that John ever was baptized. In fact, you remember when Jesus came to be baptized by him, John desired to have Jesus baptize him, which would seem to indicate clearly that until then, at least, he himself had not been baptized. Matt. 3 : 14.

W. J. McF., Vermilion, Ill., a student of Hebrew and Greek, sends the following interpretation of the "two witnesses" mentioned in Rev.11, which will interest many readers who are students of Revelation. He writes, "The 'two witnesses' signify not persons, but the 'grace and truth' which came through Jesus Christ (John 1 : 17). Throughout Christ's ministry of three and a half years (a thousand two hundred sixty days) these two witnesses, Grace and the Spirit of Truth, 'prophesied' or testified in 'sackcloth' (sorrow, because rejected officially by the Jews), and at the close of their testimony the wicked criminality ('beast') of the Jews fought against, conquered, and slew Grace and Truth, in the arrest, conviction and crucifixion of their Prince and Champion, Jesus Christ. During the 'three days and a half' while Jesus was on the cross, and while dead, until his resurrection, these two witnesses, Grace and Truth, remained not only 'slain,' but even their 'remains' exposed to ridicule and ignominy. However, in the resurrection of Jesus Christ, their Prince and Champion, Grace and Truth revive, stand on their feet, and rise upward in overwhelming power (cloud), while the authority of their enemies is broken down in the overthrow (quake) of their city: for 'the prince of this world' has been 'cast out' (routed, John 12 : 31). In I John 5 : 8, these 'two witnesses' are subdivided into 'three witnesses,' the 'water' and the 'blood' being Grace in its double work of cleansing and of restoring, while the 'Spirit' is the 'Truth.'"

E. B., Canwood, Saskatchewan, Canada. Ira D. Sankey passed away several years ago. He was converted while a very young man, and for twenty-nine years was the beloved associate of Dwight L. Moody, the evangelist. After Moody's death, Sankey devoted himself to evangelistic lectures. Many of his songs will live for generations. He died as he had lived, a true Christian, rejoicing in salvation through a risen Saviour.

Reader, Sanborn, Ind. 1. Address Rev. A. B. Simpson, 692 Eighth Avenue, New York City. 2. Regarding aural appliances, write to the New York Medical Journal, New York City.

Mrs. A. A., Lewiston, Me. Faith in God's love and care does not justify us in expecting that he should do for us those things which he had made us capable of doing for ourselves. He has endowed us with minds that can reflect and discriminate, and we should employ those faculties in doing the work for which they were designed. The lower animals are guided by instinct; we are guided by reason and intelligence. When our best efforts fail to accomplish any legitimate purpose, then we have a right to ask God to bring it to pass. So, in the case of healing of bodily troubles, human effort should be supplemented by faith; and where our efforts fail, faith steps in and God does the rest. Luke was called the "beloved physician" by the disciples (Col. 4 : 14). God is the Great Physician, and we do right to take him into every case of sickness, and to pray that he may bless our efforts and guide the skill of those who are ministering to us, to his glory and for our restoration. Nowhere in the Bible are we justified in following any other course.

Mrs. E. S. T., Siloam Springs, Ark. 1. It would certainly be a cruel thing on the part of a father to put his daughter to work in the fields, if she were at all delicate or physically unfit; yet there are many women working in the harvest fields throughout the world today. While it may be heavy and unaccustomed labor, they undertake it courageously because of the lack of workers and the need of raising food. 2. We are not to judge others. What you state may be only hearsay. If true, then let God be his judge.

Rev. David Lander, Avon Park, Fla., would be grateful to any reader of this journal who could send him the address of Gertrude Officer, onetime school teacher at Pittsburg, Kan.

W. L., Keota, Iowa. The national religion of Belgium and Portugal is the Roman Catholic; Montenegro is Greek Orthodox; Servia, Greek Orthodox; and the larger part of Rumania is also of the same religious faith.

Business, Detroit, Mich. Are any fairly reliable figures available showing the cost of the great world-war up to date? I have seen estimates, but they varied so much that they are not useful for quotation.

According to the latest figures from a reasonably reliable source, the European War has cost over $61,000,000 000, or nearly three times as much as the twenty greatest wars, before the present one, in the last hundred years. The cost to the different belligerent countries is divided as follows:

Great Britain	$15,374,000,000
France	12,200,000,000
Russia	8,500,000,000
Italy	4,000,000,000
Belgium	490,000,000
Serbia	330,000,000
Rumania	250,000,000
Entente Allies	$41,144,000,000
Germany	$14,600,000,000
Austria	5,000,000,000
Turkey	650,000,000
Bulgaria	375,000,000
Central Allies	$20,625,000,000
Grand Total	$61,769,000,000

Mrs. R. B., Hardin, Mont. With so vast an area of tillable land in Europe overrun by the contending armies and with the great majority of the able-bodied men in the ranks, the crop expectations of the fighting countries this year are necessarily very small. We have no statistics on the subject, but all the reports from relief committees indicate increasing scarcity of food products, higher prices and increased suffering.

X. Y. Z., Lancaster, Ohio. Your doubts and fears as to your acceptance or rejection are not an uncommon experience. In the Christian life, many have had a period of timidity and uncertainty before they have attained to the faith that brings assurance and absolute trust in God's promise. Even good Christians who have served God many years may be troubled at times by the unwelcome visits of those doubts that assail the mind; but they find a remedy by asking for divine help to put away all doubts, and to enable them to fix their hearts upon God and his promises, and upon Christ who died for the sins of the whole world, and who is the Saviour of all. You may remember that even Paul, in the midst of his wonderful ministry, had his periods of doubt, as when he said in I Cor. 9 : 27 that he strove with redoubled energy to serve Christ and save men, lest by "any means, after that I have preached to others, I myself should be rejected." Doubt is the enemy of faith. Thank God for all the graces he has given you and ask him for greater faith. Read the promises and believe that they are meant for you. Keep on believing and holding God to his word. Job was one of the great instances of faith in a time of darkest doubt, when he said, "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Remember that all these doubts and fears and other imaginings and self-accusations come from the tempter, and not from the Holy Spirit. We know that there are many good Christian people who are more than ordinarily sensitive, and are sometimes tormented by such doubts. But you may be assured they are not accusations from God, for he would not deny himself. Take courage, and when evil thoughts and doubts come, reach out boldly to God in prayer for strength to believe, believe, believe, in spite of all the assaults of the tempter. God is not only abundantly able to save, but he will save "to the uttermost," and he will save you if you trust in him. A good aid to dispelling all doubts is to get into active Christian work of some kind which will take you out of yourself and put you in service for others. It is a wonderful tonic for any man or woman who tries it, and we believe you will find it so. Spend your own strength for His sake in helping others, and he will endow you with greater strength. One thing more: we gathered from your letter that you have been somewhat timid about confessing Christ either in the home, among acquaintances, or possibly in church. You should take all reasonable opportunities to do this, and you will find it a precious and powerful aid. See the promise in Luke 12 : 8, and if you are striving with all your heart and soul to live the Christ-life, and have accepted Christ as your Saviour, and acknowledged him before the world, you have a right to claim this, one of the grandest of all the promises.

Mrs. J. F. F., Commerce, Ga. Samson lived, fought, ruled and died in a strenuous age, which was at least semi-barbaric. His superhuman strength and courage and his warlike deeds against the enemies of Israel are all matters of historical record and not an allegorical narrative. He was a rough hero of an ancient age, and should not be judged by modern standards. The reference to him by Paul in Heb. 11 : 32 serves to show that, among the Jews at least, he was regarded as one who had served God and his country. We have no right to apply our own standards of judgment in such cases.

A. C., Smithfield, Ont. We must not confound soul with spirit, which is quite another thing. The distinction between soul and spirit was emphasized by Jesus who helped men to realize the divine life in themselves and the gracious appeal of the Spirit of God. Paul also in his Epistles emphasized the supremacy of the spirit.

Subscriber. In your letter you say: "Jesus came to seek and save the lost, and I have laid everything down at his feet, but the pain and sorrow are so great" (of having strayed away). Now, what more can you say? You are just in the condition that Christ came to take care of. The whole do not need a physician, but the sick do. The saved do not need a Saviour, but the lost do; the ninety and nine do not need the Shepherd, but the lost one does. Did not Christ come to save those that are sinful? The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, "A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise" (Ps. 51 : 17).

A. L., De Soto, Wis. What is the meaning of "the Lord's Day" (Rev. 1 : 10)?

The day here referred to is not the last day (the great day of judgment, known in the New Testament by a different expression—the "day of the Lord"—and before which the events of the Apocalypse take place), but the first day of the week. Still the words are not to be regarded as a simple designation of the first day of the week in its distinction from others.

Paint Without Oil

Remarkable Discovery That Cuts Down the Cost of Paint Seventy-Five Per Cent.

A Free Trial Package is Mailed to Everyone Who Writes.

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of Adams, N. Y., has discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He calls it Powdrpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is required is cold water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof, sanitary and durable for outside or inside painting. It is the cement principle applied to paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and looks like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

Write to Mr. A. L. Rice, Manufacturer, 107 North Street, Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a free trial package, also color card and full information showing you how you can save a good many dollars. Write today.

Contrary to general public opinion "Comin' Thro' the Rye" refers to the river Rye in Ayrshire, Scotland, not to a rye field. The lucky lad who caught a lassie crossing the stream on the stepping stones was entitled to exact a toll of kisses.

"Comin' Thro' the Rye" is one of the few ballads of long ago whose simple beauty has endowed it with perpetual life.

Intimately associated with this charming Scotch air are the names of Melba, Farrar, Gluck, and Sembrich.

These gifted artists through their exquisite interpretations, in concert and on the Victrola, have sung "Comin' Thro' the Rye" in all its beauty to music lovers of every land and clime.

But "Comin' Thro' the Rye" is only one of the delightful songs of heart and home which the Victrola brings to you. And Melba, Farrar, Gluck, and Sembrich are only a few of the many noted artists who present them to you. With this wonderful instrument in your home, you have ready access to the best music of all the world.

ONE need not hesitate to set off everyday garments with a bit of crochet for fear that they will require extra attention in the washing. Simply launder them as usual, but use Ivory Soap.

The difference between safety and risk in laundry work is not so much a matter of handling as of soap. Use ordinary soap, and the most painstaking care cannot save the garment from the ravages of free alkali and other harsh materials. Use Ivory Soap and there is nothing in the suds that can injure the most delicate fabric in the slightest degree.

Ivory Soap being made of the choicest materials combined with the utmost skill, is as harmless as clear pure water. Because of its copious lather and extreme purity it is a better cleanser even than strong laundry soap. And its very low price makes it as available to all as soaps having none of its desirable qualities.

Mothers from New York's East Side, with babies in their arms and children clinging to their skirts, crowded the square before the City Hall and demanded action by the Mayor

New York's Food Riots

By ARTHUR HOAG HOWLAND

SATURDAY, February 25th, was a strange and ominous day in New York. A riot of hungry women with hotel attendants and police took plaçe at the Waldorf-Astoria in which women were beaten, children lost and policemen hurt. The women, accompanied by some of their men, had attempted to storm the hotel in the mistaken belief that Governor Whitman was there, to whom they wished to appeal for relief from the pinch of hunger.

As a matter of fact, Governor Whitman was at the Ritz-Carlton, so the demonstration was in vain, except to impress upon the authorities and the public the desperate seriousness of the situation. While the mob was storming the Waldorf, Governor Whitman was receiving a committee representing them at the other hotel, and telling them he believed the reports of suffering to have been greatly exaggerated, yet promising to try to devise means for relieving the existing distress.

Both the committee at the Ritz-Carlton and the mob at the Waldorf were echoes of a gigantic demonstration that had occurred early the same afternoon at Madison Square. This monster protest had been arranged as the climax of earlier demonstrations occurring during the week. The first of these took place at City Hall on Tuesday, February 20th, and came as a complete surprise, not only to the city authorities and the city population in general, but to leaders of the radical movements in city and state, many of whom took prominent parts in the later demonstrations that followed. It was the very suddenness and spontaneity of the Tuesday demonstration that compelled not only the public in general but government authorities in New York, Albany and Washington to take the matter most seriously.

Five or six women, among them Mrs. Bessie Adler, Mrs. Ida Harris and Mrs. Sarah Erdmann, had met on Monday evening in the offices of the Forward, a radical Jewish daily widely read throughout the East Side of New York, and discussed the project of calling a mass meeting of mothers at Rutgers Square and suggesting an appeal to the Mayor for relief from the hunger that was slowly sapping the lives of themselves and their families. Notice of this meeting appeared only in the Forward, none of the other radical dailies of the city being informed of the plans. Hundreds of excited, determined, poverty-pinched women met in the square in response to this call, many of them bringing their children, even their babies. They listened to earnest speeches from a number of their leaders who called upon them to join in the march to the mayor's office.

Before the police, stationed to guard City Hall and the park surrounding it, realized what was happening, an army of from three to four hundred women bore down upon them and attempted to storm an entrance to the building. Hurry calls for police reserves were sent in and a strong guard of police was suddenly thrown about the City Hall. In the center of this rigidly held multitude stood the little army of gesticulating women, demanding to see the head of the government of the city where they could not secure food for their households.

Word came at length that a committee of five would be received in the mayor's office,

While their representatives were within the gates, the women stood their ground at the steps, listening to speeches in the peculiar tongue used by the Jewish people of today, but speeches in whose tone and fervor, and in the passionate eagerness with which they were heard, was told the story of desperate need, desperate fear for the future, desperate determination to gain relief.

The committee came out with their report and, after a few more speeches, the police order went forth that the women were to be driven from the park. The dispersal of the packed crowd was accomplished by sending lines of policemen through it, cutting the little circle of humanity up like a cake, and forcing it, slice by slice, away from the building and the park—forcing it back to poverty and suffering, but not to silence. For the women announced that they would return the day following.

And this they did, though on Wednesday they acted on the plan of sending committees instead of attempting again to enter the mayor's sanctum en masse, all but one group, a group of about a hundred women who followed little Marie Ganz, the anarchist.

The mayor sent out word early in the day that he would recognize Mrs. Harris as the official leader of the demonstrations and would receive her and a small committee in his office at half past twelve. Meantime Marie Ganz had captured Rutgers Square and become the head of another committee representing it. She had been arrested the day before for excessive aggressiveness, had been released from custody under suspended sentence and she now was a heroine in the eyes of the other women, Other committees came in the course of the morning.

One after another the women told of the sharp privation of their own and their neighbors' families. One woman said that a bottle of milk was all her family had had for breakfast that day. This she had weakened with the same amount of water to make it go farther.

Abraham Plotkin, urged the mayor to heed the plea of the Mothers' League to appropriate a million dollars to relieve the immediate need.

To all these pleas Mayor Mitchel replied that so far as he knew, the city did not have the legal right to grant the relief begged for. He declared that the necessary legislation must be enacted at Albany, and urged his petitioners to exert their pressure there, rather than at City Hall. Some of the laws required must also come from Washington. He said a bill providing for municipal markets in the city had been delayed at Albany for two years. He did not state, however, that when such a bill actually passed the legislature some three years ago, he himself had vetoed it, explaining that the bill was incorrectly drawn and required rewording. It is also true that at the time the measure came up for his decision, the people's representatives were caught napping, and not a single advocate was on hand to plead for the bill, while forty odd persons were present to point out its flaws.

This brings up the most appalling feature of the whole situation, which is that certain interests are said to be deliberately and vigorously at work to prevent the people from getting food at reasonable prices. This is too long a story to tell in this article, but I have been told on good authority that four sets of lawyers are at the present moment working to prevent the passage of the Wicks Bill at Albany which provides again for the creation of public markets in New York, markets which would assure the people of the city food at reasonable prices, independent of the manipulation of food speculators.

The upshot of Wednesday's conference was that the mayor promised to present the request for a million dollars to the Board of Estimate at its regular meeting on Friday if he found, on having the laws examined, that the board would have the legal right to make such an appropriation; and that he would in the meantime have expert investigators from the Department of Health and the Department of Charity learn if the distress were as keen as alleged.

When the Board met on Friday, a report was read from Commissioner of Charities Kingsbury, stating that conditions were not so bad as represented. The report stated that two hundred investigators had personally inspected 1,472 families. Less than a hundred of these were found to be in actual want. These were turned over to the Department for attention and the commissioner stated that there was "no immediate danger of suffering." The report confessed, that at present prices, the pinch would soon be felt and that there was danger that the people might soon begin to suffer from "malnutrition."

The demonstration and outbreak the next day seems to prove either that the families visited by the investigators were not typical or else that they had refused to confess their needs to representatives of charity. At any rate the Board did pass a resolution requesting the legislature to enact a measure empowering the city to buy foodstuffs and to sell them at cost to relieve the present crisis.

Then came Saturday's pitiful demonstration at Madison Square—pitiful in the distress evidenced, yet not pitiful in its earnestness, its solidarity, its vigor, its bigness. Score by score, women and children and men marched past the waiting crowds on the street at the edge of the park—pale, worn, sad, discouraged, defeated, HUNGRY. From the lower East Side, from Harlem, from the Bronx, from Williamsburg, from Brownsville they marched, two by two, with banners telling their grief and calling for justice. Crowd after crowd of boys and girls who ought to be red-cheeked, smiling, hearty—pale and weak and heavy-eyed and listless. There is not a doctor in the land who, on looking at them closely as they filed by, would not state that they were undernourished. A bystander said: "They look as if they had not had a square meal in weeks." He might have said "in months."

They crowded near the wagons drawn up to serve as speakers' stands, hoping for some word that was capable of being translated into that one word that filled their thought—FOOD!

It was a sight never to forget: the packed mass of bodies—probably near a hundred thousand in the crowds before the afternoon had passed (many of these were passersby who stopped to see and hear); but there were thousands packed together, pale, suffering, wistful—yet hardly daring to hope for better things.

The crowds broke up in some confusion. There was to have been a more formal march on Fifth Avenue, but this idea was abandoned. A committee set out to find the Governor who happened to be in town. The crowd itself went to another hotel, and there became frantic at the sights of luxury and plenty all about them.

Meanwhile the committee was seeing Governor Whitman. The Governor promised to sign the bill empowering the city to purchase food.

In the meantime, Mayor Mitchel's semi-official Food Committee, of which George W. Perkins is chairman, has taken steps to buy produce on an extensive scale, using private funds for the purpose, and selling to the people at a low figure. Railroads, prodded by the I. C. C., are promising to rush more food into New York—though one of the exasperating complexities of the situation has been that mountains of food were on cars or in storage at New York or on the Jersey shore waiting shipment to Europe. Belief is widespread that this food ought to be commandeered for the use of starving Americans, and that exports should be suspended till our own people are cared for.

President Proposes "Armed Neutrality"

AT one o'clock Monday, February 26, President Wilson appeared before a joint session of Congress and asked that body, before its term expires by constitutional limitation, to bestow upon him "the means and the authority to safeguard in practice the right of a great people who are at peace and who are desirous of exercising none but the rights of peace, to follow the pursuits of peace in quietness and good will." The President recited the facts concerning the German government's announcement of a barred naval zone which led to the President's appearance before Congress February 3, and to the severance of diplomatic relations between the United States and Germany. He reviewed the operations thus far of the submarine warfare in which he found no overt act against the sovereignty of the United States; "But while this is happily true," the President stated, "it must be admitted that there have been certain additional indications and expressions of purpose on the part of the German press and the German authorities which have increased rather than lessened the impression that, if our ships and our people are spared, it will be because of fortunate circumstances . . . rather than because of the instructions under which those (submarine) commanders are acting. It would be foolish to deny that the situation is fraught with the gravest possibilities and dangers. . . . I feel that I ought, in view of the fact (expiration of Congress) to obtain from you full and immediate assurances of the authority which I may need at any moment to exercise. No doubt I already possess that authority without special warrant of law, by the plain implication of my constitutional duties and powers; but I prefer, in the present circumstances, not to act upon general implication. I wish to feel that the authority and the power of the Congress are behind me in whatever it may become necessary for me to do. We are jointly the servants of the people and must act together and in their spirit, so far as we can divine and interpret it.

"No one doubts what it is our duty to do. We must defend our commerce and the lives of our people in the midst of the present trying circumstances, with discretion but with clear and steadfast purpose. Only the method and the extent remain to be chosen, upon the occasion, if occasion should indeed arise. Since it has unhappily proved impossible to safeguard our neutral rights by diplomatic means against the unwarranted infringements they are suffering at the hands of Germany, there may be no recourse but to armed neutrality, which we shall know how to maintain and for which there is abundant American precedent.

"It is devoutly to be hoped that it will not be necessary to put armed force anywhere into action. The American people do not desire it and our desire is not different from theirs. I am sure that they will understand the spirit in which I am now acting, the purpose I hold nearest my heart and would wish to exhibit in every thing I do. I am anxious that the people of the nations at war also should understand and not mistrust us. I hope that I need give no further proofs and assurances that I have already given throughout nearly three years of anxious patience that I am the friend of peace and mean to preserve it for America so long as I am able.

"I am not now proposing or contemplating war or any steps that need lead to it. I merely request that you will accord me your own vote and definite bestowal the means and the authority to safeguard in practice the right of a great people who are at peace and who are desirous of exercising none but the rights of peace to follow the pursuits of peace in quietness and good will—rights recognized time out of mind by all the civilized nations of the world. No course of my choosing or of theirs will lead to war. War can come only by the wilful acts and aggressions of others."

The President omitted to name any specific act which he contemplated taking in any specific situation, leaving his hearers and the country to understand what they will from the expression "armed neutrality."

The Hill of Good-by

Laughs and Thrills of Real Missionary Life in Central Africa

By JESSIE M. CURRIE

THE Doctor called our home the Crow's Nest. We three—the Doctor, my husband and I—were its only white occupants. The name applied in more senses than one. It stood on a height, and had you peeped in on us in those days you might have seen quite a number of little black figures flitting about, perhaps keeping time to a song, a little twittering song like the birds'.

How well I remember the day I arrived on Mount Mlanjé! As I gazed on its grandeur, the great rocky peak towering above the vast plain we had just crossed, the gleams of waterfall, the huge boulders scattered around, I could not help thinking: "What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him?" Mlanjé means the "hill of good-by." Alas! we were fated to bid it good-by all too soon.

My husband had met me at Katunga's village on the Shiré River, and after a weary journey of three days, carried in a machilla, I was glad to see the unpretentious mud house with its veranda paved with badly fired bricks. The Doctor, kind man, had hoisted a flag, and caused a tablecloth to be made out of long strips of unbleached cotton, to do me honor.

Our house consisted of three rooms: the Doctor occupied one end, we the other; the center one we shared together. In view of my coming the walls had been lined with split branches of the iwalli palm, which gave it a very picturesque appearance. At first they had been so rough that it was quite a common thing to see a rat sitting in a cranny munching a stolen piece of sugar. There were no ceilings to the rooms, only the thatched roof and its brown rafters, and no fireplaces; but it was the hot season when I arrived, and my trouble was to keep cool. It was very different when the rains came.

Our mission station was barely two years old. We had one Christian native, Robert Ta-usé, a convert of my husband's predecessor, the Rev. Robert Clelland, who died of malaria a year or two after his arrival. Among our own boys one or two showed signs of earnestly seeking after the Truth, but my husband was unwilling to baptize any until he had more assurance of their sincerity.

All around us was the jungle. We could hear the baboons chuckling in the bush, just like human beings. The leopards and jackals prowled round at night. A few mud huts framed a courtyard at the back of our house, comprising the boys' dormitory, the kitchen and the store. Several paths for our convenience had been cut along the face of the mountain. Behind our station, beyond a quarter of a mile of bush and primeval forest, stretched a great rocky cliff, like a gigantic wall, over which the Linjé stream fell in a sheer drop of 3,000 feet. From it all our water had to be carried in pails on the heads of the women.

IN those early days I was beset with visitors, dark-skinned women in scanty garments, with heavy lip-rings, all anxious to get their first sight of a white woman. Each brought me a present of eggs "Moni, Donna," (good morning, lady), they said, and shook hands with me; then squatted on the veranda and chatted volubly. As a present was expected in return, I gave each of them a few red beads, which pleased them greatly.

Among my visitors was Namondé, the chief, accompanied by all his wives. He was a small, cunning-looking man, but had the air of a king. He condescendingly shook hands with me, though his only garments were an old white jacket and a bit of dirty blue muslin wrapped round his bare limbs. Nay, I am forgetting; he carried his ancient brown parasol, which he used only on great occasions. Report said that he was a wizard, and had eaten a child of one of his slave wives. If there were any truth in the story he suffered for it afterward, as he died by the poison ordeal.

But we did him honor. A chair was brought out to him, while his chief wife seated herself on a bench on the veranda. The other wives, some quite young girls, squatted on the ground. Wishing to be agreeable, I gave the chief wife a peppermint. She sucked it gravely with evident relish, then handed it to her nearest neighbor, and it went round till they all had a taste.

My greatest difficulty was the language. My husband wrote me out some words and phrases, but sometimes I used the wrong one. One morning I had brought to the kitchen a tin of sausages to fry for breakfast, with several other necessary accompaniments. The boy had placed the pan on the fire, which was simply a few burning logs lying between two low walls of brick, when I discovered that I had forgotten the lard. Here I was faced by a problem. If I went back to my pantry and left the sausages and other foods, the chances were that I should not find them all on my return. If I carried them back with me the boys' feelings might be hurt, for I was surrounded by quite a number of interested onlookers.

In vain I racked my brain for the Yao word for fat. At last I tried signs, and every boy beamed with intelligence. One and all ran to get it. I waited confidently for their return, thinking how easy it was to make them understand. And they were not long. But what was this each one was carrying? One carried a plate, another a tray and another a brush, but not a boy brought the fat.

TO A GARDEN

Verse and Decoration by Harold Speakman

Gethsemane—Gethsemane—
How like a soft breeze o'er the sea
Your name comes gently back to me.

Back from the hills of Galilee,
Back through the red years' panoply,
Through faith you sing of peace to be,

Gethsemane—

Disheartened, I gathered all my tins in my arms and marched back to my pantry, from whence I returned with a tin of fat added to my armful. "Lina liakwe?" (What name do you call this?) I asked, holding out the lard.

"Mauta," was the answer; and I had learned another word, which I never forgot.

One morning my husband brought me three native girls. "See what you can make of them," he said smiling. "The first thing I would advise is a good wash. Give them a bit of soap and let them go to the Linjé stream."

I must say my heart fell, but remembering St. Paul's words: "By the grace of God I am what I am," I took courage.

The eldest girl, Soyaga, or Melé as she called herself now, was pretty and petite. She seemed about sixteen and was well grown. The second girl, Ajoula, was plain and squarely built. She looked about twelve. Her neck was perfectly hidden by many plies of a beaded rope necklace, which gave her a deformed appearance; but we had it at once removed, as it was far from sanitary. Achilandana, the youngest girl, was darker than the others. Strange we never thought the natives black, but fancied ourselves peculiarly white.

After their wash they looked quite different. Their skin was smooth and polished and of a lovely chocolate color. We gave them each a long piece of cotton, which they wore twisted round them, the top reaching their armpits. For Sabbath wear I made them blouses, a short print skirt and a red sash. I taught them household work in the morning, and in the afternoon gave them a reading lesson. They liked the lesson, but with housework they were lazy, preferring to bask in the hot sun. The very first morning they came to me, before any work was done, and asked if they might go "quenda jenda" (a walk). Every Sunday we allowed them home, and when they returned they always brought me a tiny nosegay of wild flowers.

OUR church was simply a large mud hut. It had no windows. The open door admitted sufficient light. Each Sunday forenoon the natives came to the service and squatted on the mud floor. Some had babies on their backs. Little toddling naked children were there also, and when the hymns were sung they got up and danced.

Across the lapse of time the sweet strains come back to me, and I hear their soft voices in the hymn that appeals to black and white—"Jesus loves me." But it is the Yao words I hear:—

Yesu akunonyela
Chindu achi ngumanya
Wanono wa m'mangwakwe
Akulimba kwangune.

The sermon was most simple. They seemed to listen attentively. Namondé's chief wife in particular, a sad-eyed woman, never took her eyes from the preacher. Was her heart yearning for the Saviour as yet unknown to her?

A missionary has to make up his mind for many discouragements. As yet none of our boys and girls had come forward for baptism. But one night, when returning from a distant mission station, I was asked to alight from my machilla to give the men a rest as they ascended the mountain. My husband was far behind. I felt terribly alone, for it was dark save for the starlight. The path was narrow; high giant grasses grew at either side. Around me were the raw natives, great powerful men, and Bwanali, one of our mission boys, a lad about fourteen, who himself had been quite untaught a year ago. To my surprise he came and stood in the middle of the group, and pointing up to the stars told these poor ignorant men about the great Mlunga (God). That was the beginning of his ministerial work, for he is now a teacher and preacher at Mount Mlanjé.

But now and again warnings would come that it was not for us to enjoy the fruits of our sowing. One night the Doctor, my husband and I were seated at dinner, enjoying our coffee, laughing, and talking. The front door stood open for coolness. The lamp was lit on the table, sending a feeble light across the threshold. Beyond, the night loomed dark and formless. Suddenly there was a patter of feet, then several tall figures darkened the doorway. They entered without ceremony, and the leader of the group delivered a message in Yao, talking excitedly while gesticulating with his hands.

I did not understand what he said, but I saw my husband's face turn white, and the Doctor, though only partly comprehending, as he had not studied Yao but the Manganja language, looked disturbed. Then my husband told us. The message was from Namondé, the chief, to warn us that two powerful chiefs along the mountain were coming before dawn to kill all the white people on the hill. All the white people. There were we three, an Irish planter some five miles distant, and another farther on. That was all.

Major General Frederick Funston

GENERAL FUNSTON DIES. Major General Frederick Funston, commanding the Southern Department of the United States Army, with headquarters at San Antonio, Texas, died suddenly on February 19. General Funston had been suffering from acute indigestion, and the cause of his death was given as angina sclerosis. General Funston had been known as the "bantam of the army," and he had been the despair of officers depending upon routine promotions, for he was constantly doing something which set him farther ahead. General Funston was born in New Carlisle, Ohio, in 1865, and moved with his parents to Kansas in 1881, attending the University of Kansas, where he was a classmate of William Allen White. Leaving college, he became a railroad conductor. From railroading he jumped to journalism, becoming a reporter on a Kansas City paper. He then became a special agent of the United States Department of Agriculture, in which capacity he rendered some adventurous service in studying the flora of Alaska. Then he went to Mexico; then, after trying his hand at coffee-planting in South America, he landed in Cuba in 1896, during the insurrection against Spanish rule. Here he organized and commanded the artillery forces of the Cuban rebels, being wounded three times and returning to the United States just before the beginning of the Spanish-American war. He was commissioned colonel of the 20th Kansas Volunteers, the regiment being sent to the Philippines, where Colonel Funston, by a clever ruse, accomplished the capture of Aguinaldo without firing a shot. Competent officers were reported to have declared the capture of Aguinaldo impossible, but Funston followed it with another spectacular achievement in which he crossed the Rio Grande River on a small bamboo raft in the face of a heavy fire, establishing a rope ferry by which his troops were enabled to cross and defeat a large band of Filipinos. For this act he was promoted to be a Brigadier-General. He returned to this country in 1901, commanding various departments, having the happy good fortune of being in command at San Francisco when the earthquake overwhelmed that city. There he promptly took control of the situation, the work of the United States troops being magnificently performed under his direction. When the expedition to Vera Cruz was decided upon in 1914, he was chosen to command it, and there won promotion to the grade of Major-General. In February, 1915, he was given his last command in the Department of the South, with headquarters at Fort Sam Houston, which brought him the full responsibility for the entire American military force, assembled a year later to guard the border and to engage in the pursuit of Villa. General Funston's meteoric rise did not make him any too popular with his brother officers, but he was the idol of the enlisted men. Mrs. Funston was in California at the time of his death. The body of the dead commander, after lying in state in the historic Alamo, was sent to San Francisco accompanied by Captain Fitzhugh Lee, former aide of General Funston, and under guard of six men, where a military funeral was held on February 24. Burial was in the National Cemetery at the Presidio.

Presbyterian Budget. The Executive Commission of the General Presbyterian Assembly, at Atlantic City on February 22, fixed the budget for the coming year at $6,250,000, of which $2,500,000 is appropriated for foreign missions, about $2,000,000 for home missions, and about $1,800,000 for other boards. On the preceding day a movement was initiated for closer relations with Union Theological Seminary and with the seminaries at Auburn and Omaha, also on an independent basis.

Seeks Safety for Christmas Ship. The State Department on February 20 cabled Ambassador Elkus at Constantinople, asking him to secure assurances from Austria-Hungary and Germany of safety for the cruiser Des Moines and the collier Cæsar, now held at Alexandria, in order that they may proceed from that port to Beirut and Jaffa with the medical supplies and foodstuffs sent for the relief of Armenian and Syrian sufferers. There are also a thousand American refugees at Beirut waiting for these vessels to take them away.

Trying to Play Fair. It was announced on February 19 that the Administration would make another fight before the close of the session of Congress to obtain ratification of the treaty with Colombia by which the United States is to pay that nation $15,000,000 as reimbursement for the loss of Panama and the cession of the Canal Zone. It is felt that the holding up of this treaty has done a great deal to create suspicion of the purposes of the United States among Latin-American countries.

Pacifying Cuba. On February 20 it was reported that General Gomez, who has been heading the Cuban rebels in Santa Clara province, had probably escaped. His forces were being rapidly driven into the mountain fastnesses. On the same day the parliamentary committee of the Liberal party, meeting in Havana, declared its loyalty to the government and to the constitutional régime. The rebels were then still in command of Santiago and the adjoining sections of Oriente province; but the loyal Cuban forces were gathering for the recapture of the city.

Senate Pushes Legislation. The United States Senate on February 20 passed measures creating a comprehensive body of statutes to punish espionage and spying of every description and to protect the neutrality of the country. The Senate also on the same day passed a bill providing a form of government for Porto Rico which makes Porto Ricans American citizens, and a bill providing for the payment to Denmark of the purchase price of the Danish Islands. This bill also provided a comprehensive form of government for the islands. The Senate Naval Committee on the same day completed the naval appropriation bill incorporating an additional appropriation of $71,000,000 for fifty submarines, fifteen to be built on the Pacific Coast. The Senate on February 16 passed the post office appropriation bill, defeating a last attempt to increase the rates on second-class matter. The bill carried an appropriation of $330,000,000. The Reed amendment prohibiting the taking or sending of intoxicating liquors into dry states and excluding liquor advertising and newspapers carrying such advertising from the mails was retained in the bill, and will, it is said, make fourteen states absolutely bone-dry. The House on February 21 concurred in this amendment to the bill.

Church Loses Two Pastors. Because of dissensions within the church which seemed impossible of being harmonized otherwise, Rev. Dr. Joseph Kemp and his assistant, Rev. David Ross, resigned from the pastorate of the Calvary Baptist Church of New York on February 18. Perfect harmony has not existed within the church for several years, and the present discord centered about an action of the trustees which dispensed with the services of the church quartet.

Ambassador Fletcher on Duty. American Ambassador Henry G. Fletcher arrived at Mexico City February 18 and was received with military honors. Constitutionalist troops lined the streets from the station to the American embassy, saluting as the ambassador passed through under the escort of high officials of the foreign office.

Militia Ordered Home. All of the state troops remaining on the border were ordered home on February 17. Secretary Baker said that the action bore no relation to the present international situation, but that it was taken because the guard had completed its work. The withdrawal of the National Guard left about 50,000 seasoned regulars on duty.

Trustful Texas. The legislature of Texas on February 21 passed a bill removing the restrictions imposed by the law and the courts upon all corporations which had been convicted of Anti-Trust Law violations.

Railways Under the Hammer. The Missouri Pacific Railway and the St. Louis Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad were sold under foreclosure in St. Louis on February 21. The Missouri Pacific brought $16,150,000 and the Iron Mountain $23,500,000, which were the minimum amounts fixed by the Federal court.

Trust Suits Appealed. The Federal government on February 17 filed briefs in the Supreme Court appealing from the judgments of the lower courts in the Steel and Harvester Anti-Trust suits, the government's contention being that there could be no good trust within the purview of the Sherman Law.

Formal Protectorate in Santo Domingo. Washington dispatches of February 17 stated that the State Department had undertaken the negotiation of a treaty between the United States and Santo Domingo which would establish a virtual American protectorate over Dominican territory similar to the protectorate of Haiti. It is planned that the President of the United States shall nominate a general receiver in charge of customs duties, and also a financial adviser, who will be appointed by the president of the Dominican Republic. It is also provided that the republic of Santo Domingo shall not increase its public debt nor modify its customs duties except by previous agreement with the President of the United States. A constabulary composed of natives under American officers is also a part of the plan. The American military government is reported to have reduced the annual budget of Santo Domingo by $250,000 by eliminating political offices which paid salaries for which no work was performed.

CHINA AND JAPAN AGREE. China and Japan are reported from Washington to have settled the Chengchiatung dispute by an agreement which provides that Japan shall have the right to lease land and other preferential rights in Manchuria and inner Mongolia; with permission to establish police stations in certain fixed localities and in certain other localities in case of necessity. Lieutenant General Aoki is to become military adviser to China; the military officials involved in the trouble are to be punished; China is formally to express regret to Japan and is to pay compensation for the Japanese soldiers killed or wounded.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The New York State Assembly on February 20 passed by a vote of 124 to 10 a resolution later concurred in by the Senate, proposing the submission to a vote of the people of a woman suffrage amendment to the constitution of the state. . . . Japanese interests are reported to have cornered the pearl shell supply of the Fiji Islands. . . . The United States Navy Year Book for 1916 shows that the personnel of the navy is composed of nearly 60,000 men, of whom 91 per cent. are native-born Americans, and of the other nine per cent. all but 130 are naturalized. The table shows that the navy has 338 vessels in commission fit for service, with a total displacement of 1,444,746 tons, and vessels under construction or authorized sufficient to bring the total tonnage to 2,096,556 and the total of vessels to 456. . . . Rev. Worth M. Tippey, pastor of the Madison Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church in New York City, said to be the highest-salaried pastor in his denomination, resigned his pastorate on February 18 to become secretary in charge of Social Service of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. . . . Rear Admiral Alexander B. Bates, U. S. N., retired, who was chief engineer of the battleship Texas in the Battle of Santiago, died February 19 at Binghamton, New York. . . . The Federal Trade Commission on February 19 began hearings to determine the maximum prices for newsprint paper. It was expected that an announcement as to the prices to be charged would be made by March 2. . . . The Anti-Alien Land Bill, withdrawn from the state Senate of Idaho on February 3 after protests by the Japanese embassy to the State Department, was reintroduced on February 19. . . . Governor Lister of Washington on February 19 signed the "bone-dry" prohibition bill . . . Arrangements having been made with both the British and German Governments for a safety lane for the Belgian relief ships through the war zones, the fleet of Relief vessels resumed sailings on February 24.

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE wasting effects of a long war on even the non-combatant population of a country, is strikingly shown by statistics which came to us during the week from France. In seventy-seven of the eighty-six departments of France, the other nine being in the hands of the invaders, there were 588,809 deaths and 604,454 births in 1913. In 1915, in these same departments, there were 644,301 deaths and only 382,466 births. This is in truth, for a nation, burning the candle at both ends. The falling off in births will have its effect on the population of France till the end of this century. A like diminution may have taken place in the other belligerent countries, but we have statistics only from France.

The German casualties of all kinds since the war began are, according to the German casualty lists up to February 1 of this year, 4,087,692. Of this vast number 988,329 were killed outright, died of wounds or of sickness; a loss that amounts to 1.4 per cent. of the total population of Germany at the outbreak of the war. Prisoners and missing run to perhaps 600,000 more.

The food situation in Germany has now been taken in hand by General von Ludendorff, the commissary general of the empire, and his orders will be enforced by stringent military measures. It is said to be an open secret that the farming classes of Germany are withholding food supplies in very considerable quantities from the nation's stock, and this, it is expected, will now be remedied.

Transportation is rapidly becoming one of Germany's greatest difficulties. Owing to the use of car and other factories for the making of ammunition, production of equipment has been very limited during the past two and a half years, and the equipment already existing in 1914 has been subjected to far more than ordinary usage since that year. This is, perhaps, the most serious phase in the German situation today, as it is absolutely essential that the railroads operate freely in order to move troops and supplies quickly and easily.

About a Number of Things

THE other day a man brought an egg into the Christian Herald office. It was four years old and hadn't been near cold storage. He broke it open! What do you suppose happened? Then he had the presumption to ask us to sample a roll of butter over a year old at least. Did we sample it? We did. The egg, too. But when he asked us to try a little dried devilfish, we declined. These are only some of the delicacies he spread before us. In the Christian Herald next week we spread them before you—a full page of illustrations and descriptions. They are the Foods of the Fighters. It is just as well to know about these things, if we are going to have military training.

And in the same number will be a short story about a man by the name of Bill. Bill stood in the shadow of Death in a prison in New York. Death started to enter the dreary room where Bill waited, about the same instant that "up from Seattle to Vancouver flashed a flicker of tiny dynamo-driven current." Can that electric message find its way "to the roof of the world, over the Canadian Rockies, on from Alberta, clear through to Winnipeg, to Ontario, to Montreal,"—to Bill, before Death starts another electric current from behind that grim partition? What started the first message, anyway?

Well, those are only two of next week's features. Which Protestant denomination last year lost a good many thousand members? Which one has twice as many as any other? And how are the churches thriving, anyway, in the face of the appalling world conditions? Are you interested in knowing just how the forces of Christianity stand today? This is all set down in the Christian Herald of March 14.

We wonder if you are aware of the war that is going on in Latin America? And the big ammunition factory in New York, with its partner factory in London, constantly supplying one of the armies there? We said "ammunition": we should have said "weapon"; sword, to be exact; the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God. In a way, this is a greater warfare than is being waged in Europe; and we shall tell you something about it next week.

You remember that rather famous little piece of writing called "A Message to Garcia"? A much longer story and much more interesting is told in next week's Christian Herald about "A Message to Cæsar." It is the story of a Roman youth who saves the life of a Christian boy in the period of the dawn of Christianity, and who afterward is most remarkably saved himself, both from death and paganism. Here is a story with a real thrill in it. One of those old-fashioned sort of stories that is refreshing and stimulating to come upon. A fine story for our young people to read—though as a matter of fact all of our editors liked it, which may be a hint to the older folks as well. By the way, "A Persistent People," promised this week, is held over till next week.

(There is a constant race between the editors and the printing rooms of every paper. You can see for yourself how impossible it is to say anything more. Here is this iron frame which won't stretch a particle; and though much more might well be said about next week's issue of the Christian Herald, the printer cuts us off!)

THE Speaker of the House of Commons, the Right Honorable James William Lowther, made an important statement in a public meeting in London, in which he said that it was impossible for British statesmen to make any agreement with the German government as now constituted. It would be necessary before signing any peace agreement, he said, "to insist that it must be with a government different in essence and in constitution from the present one."

Saturday, February 17, there was some severe fighting between the Turks and the British on the Tigris, near Kut-el-Amara, the news of which reached us several days later. For some time the British have been making a considerable effort to drive the Turks on the north and south banks of the Tigris to the southeast of this town, out of their positions, and to capture Kut.

On Saturday the British launched an offensive on the Turkish lines at Sannai Yat, that old stumbling-block to their progress, on the left bank of the river. Their right wing at first successfully penetrated the Turkish trenches on two fronts, one 350 and the other 540 yards long. But the Turks returned to the charge and made two violent counter-attacks, the second of which drove the whole British wing back to the line which it originally occupied.

The Turkish prime minister, in his first speech to the Turkish Parliament on February 18, declared that Turkey would not surrender Constantinople as long as there was a single Ottoman left, and that she would prosecute the war until she had compelled her enemies to recognize her right to existence. After which the parliament unanimously passed a vote of confidence in the government.

The Greek legation at Washington reports that, as a result of the now double "blockade" of Greece by the Allies and the Teutons, no supplies at all are reaching that kingdom, famine prevails throughout Greece, and numerous deaths from actual starvation have already occurred.

The relations between Germany and the United States, although somewhat improved as regards minor questions, such as the exit of American consuls and citizens from German territory, remain in much the same condition on the major question of U-boat warfare. No break of diplomatic relations has yet taken place with Austria, but it does not at present appear that it can be long avoided.

ON the western front there has been almost continual fighting between the British and Germans on that portion of the front between Ypres and the Somme River. One trench raid just southeast of Ypres yielded the British nearly two hundred prisoners and some artillery. Smaller raids occurred every day, and while in each case prisoners were captured and damage done, no real change in the lines resulted.

Severe fighting took place south of the Ancre on the Picardy front. On Saturday, February 17, the British made a lunge at the German trenches near Miraumont and were entirely successful, capturing positions of some considerable importance and some twelve officers and 761 men, besides considerable artillery of various kinds.

A careful study of this portion of line leads one to think that while the British attacks in the Picardy sector may continue for some time, and while the Ypres sector may also be active, the objective of the offensive in force which the British intend to launch this spring will be the city of Lille. Strategically and morally the recapture of this important place would be far more valuable than the taking of Bapaume and Péronne, and the British are today within five miles of the town.

The German submarine campaign against vessels going to the British Isles continues. Perhaps as fair a summary of the situation as is available is contained in the speech made by Sir Edward Carson, first Lord of the Admiralty, in the House of Commons the evening of February 21.

Sir Edward, among other things, said: "The submarine menace recently has grown until its extent has become grave and serious. The menace has not yet been solved, but measures which have been adopted will mitigate it by degrees."

Sir Edward also gave the number and tonnage of Allied and neutral ships which fell victims to the submarines in the first eighteen days of December last year and February this year as follows:

	Ships	Tonnage
December	118	223,000
January	91	198,000
February	134	304,000

These figures are considerably higher than any which have heretofore been given for these periods. Assuming the figure of 304,000 as correct, and adding thereto the tonnage of the ships sunk since then and reported to us, the total through February 21 for the month was 344,000, which would indicate 492,000 tons in a month of thirty days. In all probability, however, this estimate will be considerably exceeded, since undoubtedly there are ships of certain belligerents and certain neutrals which Sir Edward did not include.

It is still far too early indeed to have any opinion one way or the other as to whether or not the submarine attack will accomplish its object. Two or three months will be needed before we can foresee either success or failure, but at the same time it is the height of folly to dismiss it now as negligible.

Following Sir Edward, Colonel Churchill made a statement worthy of careful consideration when he said: "The chief object of the grand fleet was an offensive, but the submarine warfare has largely thrown the British fleet on a defensive attitude." Such an achievement is by no means to be despised, even if the submarines did nothing else but hold the fleet in this attitude.

ADDRESSING a special session of the House of Commons on February 23, Premier Lloyd George outlined the measures which were contemplated by the British government to meet the admittedly serious menace of Germany's submarine campaign. The premier stated that British mercantile tonnage had been only adequate at the opening of the war; that 1,000,000 tons had been alotted to France, and a very considerable amount to Russia and Italy, while a considerable amount had been sunk, and that for some time there had been a shortage of tonnage for general purposes, and even a slight shortage for military uses. He stated also that stocks of food were lower in Great Britain than ever before, due in large part to a bad harvest. He is reported to have said: "If we take drastic measures we can cope with the submarine menace, but if the nation is not prepared to accept drastic measures for dealing with the menace, disaster is before us."

The drastic measures, which of course are headed by war by every means upon the submarine in an effort to sweep it from the seas, include the building of as many merchant ships as possible, the dispensing with unnecessary commodities from abroad, and the production of as much food as possible at home.

To encourage home production the government will guarantee prices of agricultural products for three years, and will establish a minimum wage for agricultural laborers. The breaking up and planting of unnecessary pasture land will also be forced.

Imports of certain fruits are to be prohibited, and others are to be restricted to 25 per cent. of the 1915 imports. Tea, coffee and cocoa, except India tea in reduced quantities, are prohibited, and other beverages are greatly restricted. Meats and feeding-stuffs are to be restricted, and by all these reductions in unnecessary foods and beverages it is hoped to release 900,000 tons of cargo space for other uses. Paper imports are to be cut in half, to 640,000 tons annually, and the French are to be asked to assign additional forests to the use of British troops for timber for trenches and military uses.

HIGHER EDUCATING the WOMANHOOD of JAPAN

By

MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

ONCE upon a time, in a far-away land, a poor fisher drew from the water a great fish which surprised its captor by saying that it was an enchanted prince and asking to be put back into the water. Although the poor man had caught nothing else, he gave the prince his freedom and started to return to his little hut. On the way he met his wife, who, when she heard what he had done, bewailed the fact that he had not asked to have a wish come true, adding that he might at least have asked that his thatched hut should be changed into a cottage.

So the tired fisherman retraced his steps and, telling the prince of his discontented wife, asked for the cottage which his wife desired. His daughters then asked for a palace, and that he should be made king. The simple fisherman did not want to be king; but his wife and daughters finally made him ask this favor, which, like the rest, was granted. Then the beautiful queen and the two charming princesses, his daughters, asked that the sun and the moon should obey them; and the prince, incensed at this discontent, turned them all back to fisherwomen, which pleased the old fisherman very much; and, benefiting by their lesson, they all lived happily ever after.

That is just a fairy story that I saw acted out by first-year students at an English exhibition at Miss Tsuda's school in Tokyo. It was one of several numbers in which the Japanese girls, in excellent English and with real initiative and sense of fun, acted several dramatic scenes from Japanese folk lore, and ended with a really creditable presentation of a scene from the "Taming of the Shrew." In no other school in Japan have I heard such distinct enunciation of English and such apparent understanding of the sense of what was being said. "Paul Revere's Ride" and "The Fairies of Caldon Low" suffered, as rhyme always suffers at the hands and tongues of young elocutionists, although there was perfect clearness of enunciation and an utter absence of sing-song. But the dramatic dialogues were excellent, the singing good. A "kyogen," or Japanese action piece, was for me the most entertaining feature of the program.

I BEGAN my letter with a fairy story only to give point to a true story that had its beginning long ago. Nearly fifty years ago, Japan, realizing for the first time its own Rip Van Winkle characteristics, came under a new ruler and the age of Enlightenment began. Young as we are as a nation, modern Japan is almost a century younger, for it was not until five years before our Centennial that real intercourse with outside nations included the Japanese women in its outlook.

In 1871 five little girls, clad in kimonos of silk crêpe and wearing the bright ornaments of girlhood in their hair, left the land of their birth to study in America. They were tiny tots, and only three of them stayed in America for any length of time. Those three became great friends, being the only little maids of their race in America, and, thanks to the way everything in Japan centers in Tokyo, they still see much of one another in the capital of their native land.

Once, when these small girls were lonely for their homes in Chrysanthemum Land, they fell to making wishes. One said, "I want to marry for love, according to the American fashion." She met a young Annapolis naval officer from her country, and her wish came true. She is Baroness Uriu, whose husband has retired from an honored career which led up to his being Admiral. She lost a son in the Russian War.

Another said, "I want to be a fine lady of power." She returned home and is today the wife of one of the much-maligned Genro, a man who won fame as commander-in-chief of the Manchurian army in the Russian War, in which she also lost a son. Princess Oyama had her wish.

The third had been the daughter of a farmer and had left her native land when only six years old. She had a wish which I think was the nicest of all. She said, "I don't want to get married. I want to help the girls of Japan to become noble women through careful education." When I heard her voice over the telephone, I fell in love with it. It is too pure English to be really American, yet to clear enunciation and careful modulation were added colloquialisms dear to the American heart, and there was a sweetness of tone that made me picture a "queen" at the other end of the line.

Miss Ume Tsuda is a queen, and she is seeing her wish come true with the passing of each day; but she has too much sense to want to interfere with the sun and the moon, and her wish will probably never suffer reversal. When I spoke to her about her wish to benefit the women of Japan, she said, "That was really the wish of all of us. But it has been my work. Princess Oyama and Baroness Uriu are both trustees of the school and cooperate in every way in the work we all want to see accomplished. But it so happens that I am the one whose privilege it is actually to direct the work."

I made two visits to her school and both were interesting. After the program which I first attended, Miss Tsuda asked, "How did you like it?" I expressed my sincere delight at the excellence of the work. My years of teaching English in the Orient made it possible for me to appreciate the quality of the recitations and dialogues. But it was the originality and the initiative shown that delighted Miss Tsuda. The program had been arranged by the girls themselves, and some of the features were a surprise even to their director.

"Do tell your American readers," she said, "that the Japanese women are not mere dolls and playthings, but that they really have something in them. That program shows how their personalities can find means of expression if they are only given a chance."

I promised to do this, the more so since I have a very high opinion of the Japanese woman. Moral conditions in Japan are very bad, due as much to indifference to moral questions as to wilful vice; but the geishas and their class must not be allowed to dominate our thought about Japan's admirable womanhood. In spite of large classes belonging to the half-world of the tea-house or the still lower world of the licensed district, the impression I have gained of Japanese women is one of extreme modesty, faithfulness and integrity, if not real strength of character.

Advertising in Japan has not yet commercialized and idealized the figures of Japanese womanhood. Our attitude, harmless as it may be, is not understood in Japan. At the annual art exhibit the other day I saw three modest women withdraw with blushes from sculptures in the nude, which Japanese artists, under foreign influence, are now for the first time in history exhibiting in their art shows. I have not seen a geisha, so far as I know, during two visits to Japan. As a matter of fact, I may have seen thousands of them. But with one or two exceptions, I have never seen what, judged by Japanese standards, could be considered immodesty.

THE women of Japan may wear bright kimonos of silk crêpe and expensive cloths, but the prevailing tone of the outer garment is gray, black or blue. Only at the hem or in the slit of the sleeve, or in the delicately tinted layers at the throat, can one see gay colors. If the dress of Japanese women is modest, their actions are even more so; but they are more than modest and refined.

Miss Tsuda's knowledge of the best type of Japanese young women, gained not only in sixteen years in her own school but in fourteen years in the Peeresses' school, is second to none. She said: "The Japanese girls are capable, have good minds, and some of them are very talented. But, as a result of the old training, they lack self-confidence and initiative, and, above all, strength of will. Yet to encourage these as some would do, without the basis of religion, and especially Christianity, and without the development of the mind and the reasoning powers, brings in the greatest elements of danger.

"Some of our girls, knowing of foreign ways, have even thought it lady-like to visit men in hotels and other public places. The desire for freedom has outrun the knowledge of the value of restraint. The influence of foreign women in this respect has not always been good. What is needed is the growth of the spiritual life—a real training of the understanding, moral teachings that fit the new conditions of life in modern Japan, and which would develop a realization of the responsibilities that come with freedom—in a word, Christian education on higher lines."

Miss Tsuda's school is strictly a post-graduate school, whose only course so far is English. No girl can enter until she has completed the highest course the government provides. As we sat in her office, after I had visited several classes, I noticed a map of Japan, almost covered with little flags. It looked like a war area, and it is. Each of those flags represents a graduate who is teaching English primarily, and culture, morality and Christianity ultimately, in the girls' schools of the empire.

A graduate of Teachers' College at Columbia University spoke to me recently of the temptations that surround a Japanese girl in an American college—not temptations of the body, but of the spirit. I am firmly convinced that, for a time at least, America is not a field in which the education of Japanese girls is advisable in many cases. If they go to America as post-graduate students, and stay long enough to understand the best in our freedom as well as the worst, or if they are connected closely with Christian influences while there, a few more Miss Tsudas or Princess Oyamas or Baroness Urius may be developed. But it is not long since a Chinese friend spoke almost with horror at the silliness and frivolity of the girls in one of our most prominent Eastern colleges for women.

There is a tremendous need for higher education for women in Japan itself. Miss Tsuda, discussing this point, said: "The greatest need is for a complete, well-equipped Christian college of high grade for women; and there is no doubt that if such an institution were established, many women would enter."

THERE are nearly fifty mission schools for girls in Tokyo alone, ranging from kindergartens up, but Christian mission schools have so failed to co-operate that, although each is doing a good work, the very agency through which education for women is most strongly urged is utterly failing to cover any one field well. Miss Tsuda's school, with less than two hundred pupils, dominates its own little field of English work, but this is a drop in the bucket of women's education in Japan.

One girls' school which I visited not only does not conform to government standards, but gives little promise of doing so, and thus has half the number of pupils it could care for. While millions in money are needed, the thousands already given are not being wisely used.

It is very evident, to me at least, that we as Americans have got to quit calling the Japanese "heathen," and in some cases treating them as such, until we can bring our schools up to the standard for female education set by this "heathen" government. A Christian university for women in Japan would advance the spiritual strength of the nation by decades; but at present the Christian plans are so unorganized, or even disorganized, that small results are being had from large outlay.

I do not wish to be understood as condemning the work already being done. The Christian schools for women and girls in Japan are doing a service which is reflected in thousands of cities and villages throughout the empire. They are making Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians and Episcopalians by the hundred, and each of these is at heart a Christian. But before the world they are Baptists or Episcopalians. Forty-five Christian mission schools for girls in one city are too many. Greater results could be gained with ten, all leading up to the Christian university for women, which will be the best institution of its kind in Japan, but which will never come until the various Christian denominations sink their differences in the common interest of the mission work.

Japanese missionaries bewail the attention that is being given to China at present. That is a large question and cannot be discussed here; but one of the chief reasons why I would give my life to China rather than to Japan is because Christian union has progressed farther in heterogeneous China, divided by dialects and political divisions, lacking in communications, and economically and industrially just awakening, than it has in homogeneous Japan, using a common language, united by excellent railways, posts, telegraphs and steamer service, and already well developed in commerce and industry.

A Christian university should be the major plank in the educational platform of every mission board. Partisanship goes before national policy, to the detriment of both. The Christian university is still in the air, and is even now sinking from a confident hope to a half-forgotten dream.

Miss Tsuda had a dream, way back in the old days. She has held to it and made it come true. Her school is still small, but it does one thing supremely well and has no competitors in its own narrow field. Like all other Christian schools, it is doing a worthy work, but it is doing more. It is doing its own small task better than any other agency in Japan is doing it. Miss Tsuda is a delightful woman and a strong Christian personality. She has justified the judgment of those who sent her to America. By sticking to one thing and doing it well, she has made her childhood dream come true.

The most prominent male champion of higher education for women in Japan is Dr. Ninzo Naruse. In the year in which Smith and Wellesley colleges were opened in America, this man, then a youth of seventeen, conceived the idea of higher education for women as a step toward a cleaner society and a greater Japan. It was the boisterous gayety of some geisha in a neighboring hotel room that gave him this high purpose. The next year he established a school in Osaka, and some years later he became principal of a second girls' school in Niigata. In 1890 he visited America, where he studied women's education for three years. On his return he wrote a book, "Women's Education," which attracted much attention, and gradually he enlisted the sympathy and financial assistance of such influential persons as Prince Ito, Count Okuma, Baron Shibusawa and Madame Hirooka.

Today there are more than a thousand pupils enrolled in the four courses of the university, the

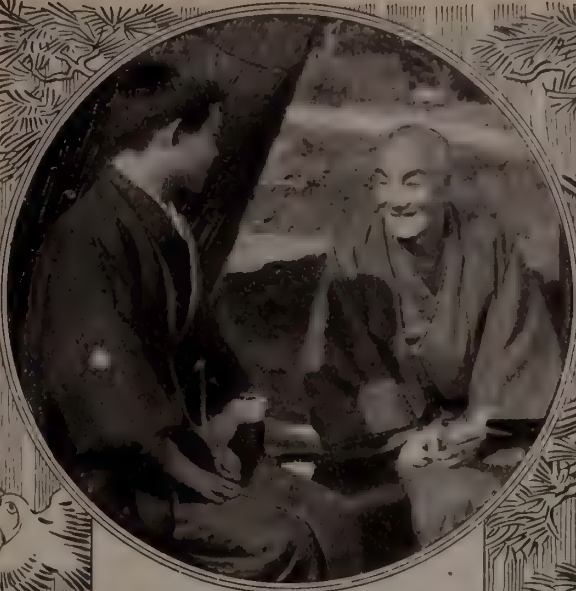
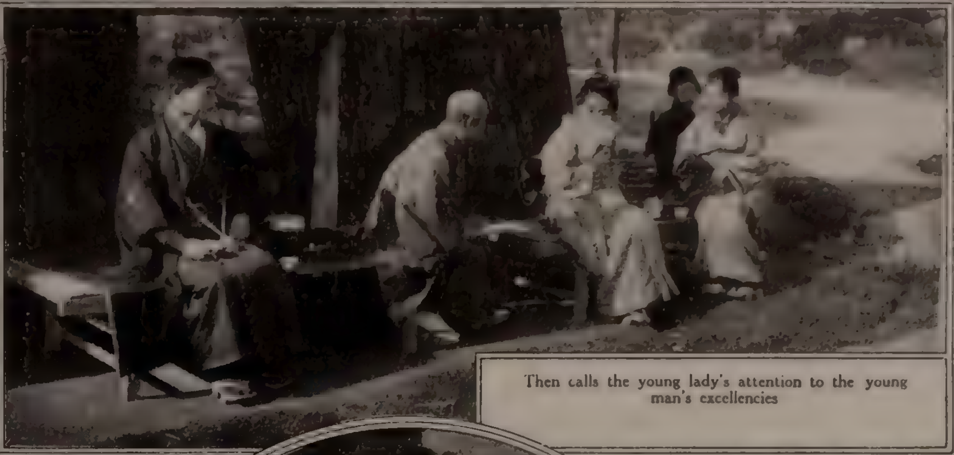
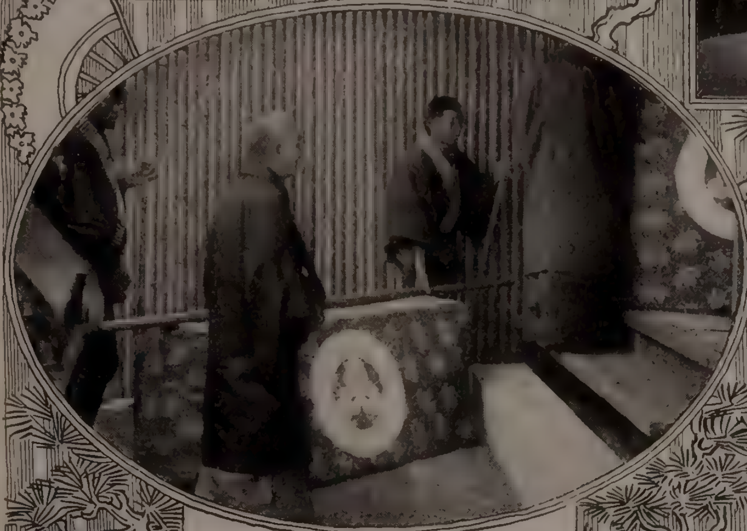
WHEN A JAPANESE GIRL GETS MARRIED



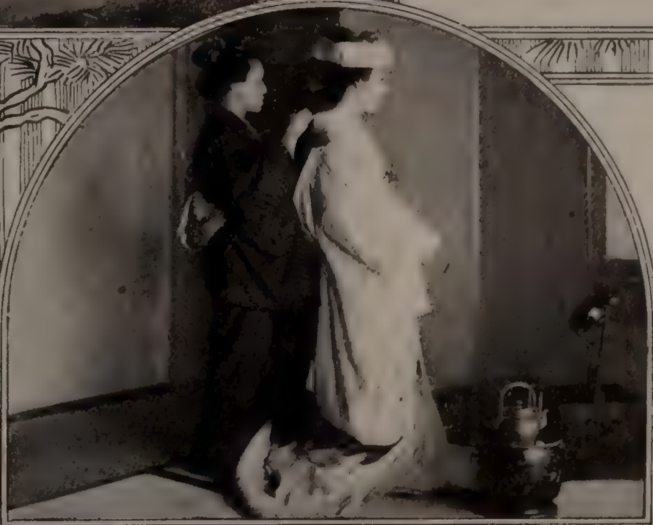
A wily marriage broker talks with the prospective groom



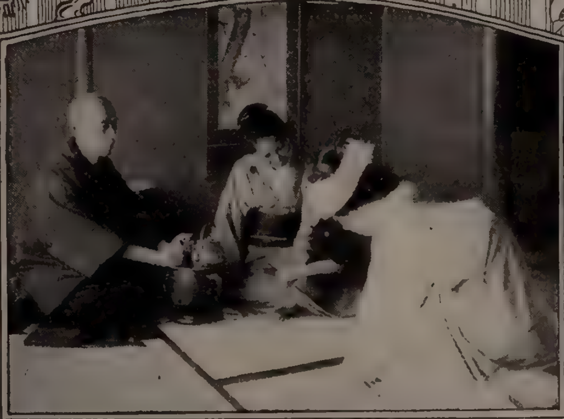
Then calls the young lady's attention to the young man's excellencies



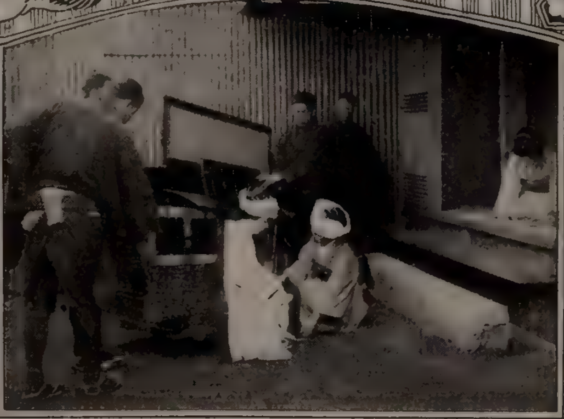
Satisfied, her furniture is carried to the groom's house the day before the wedding



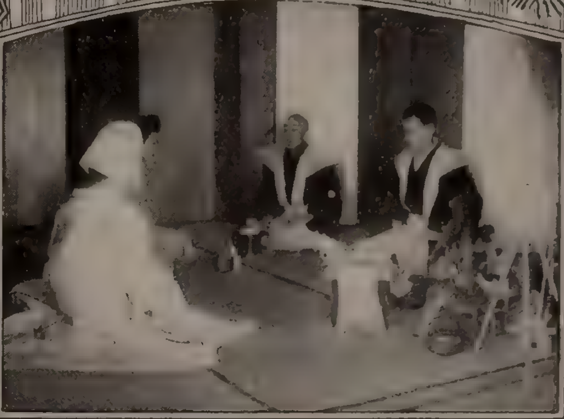
And after a most careful toilet, the bride-to-be is arrayed in her wedding kimono



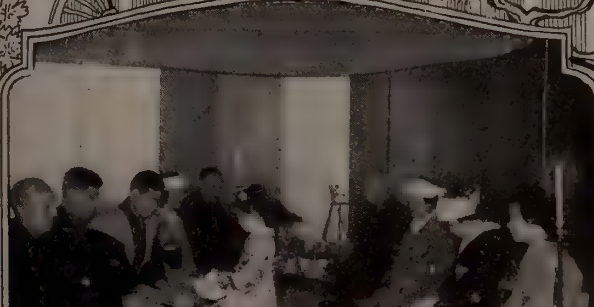
Her parents give her farewell instructions and a paper charm "Omamori" for her protection



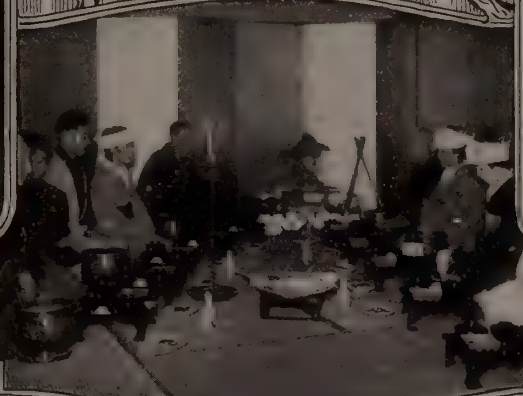
Presently the bride steps out of her "kago" (chair) at the groom's residence



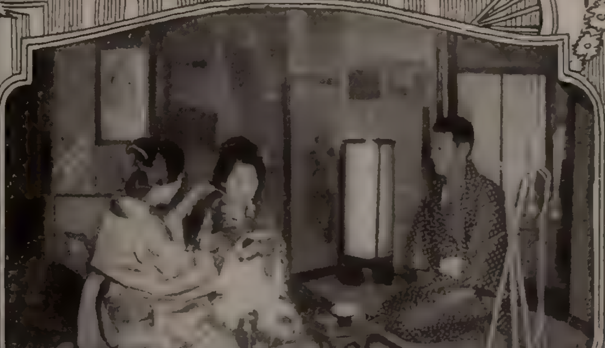
The contract is made binding by sake-drinking between bride and groom and the matchmaker and his wife



The union is recognized by all the relations in a second sake-drinking ceremony



After which all concerned enjoy a most excellent dinner



And the ceremony ends in a blessing from the bride's mother-in-law sealed with a final cup of sake

Courage in the Pulpit

"GREAT is my boldness of speech toward you," said Paul to the church in Corinth. He was not afraid to preach a whole Gospel, and he knew that, with courage in his heart and God on his side, he could meet and overcome every opposition. Consecrated courage is needed in many of our churches today, and greater boldness in dealing frankly with the evils of the time; not for the sake of stirring up strife, or of captious criticism and faultfinding, but in order that the people may know the truth and that sinners may feel the sting of rebuke and denunciation as they listen to the preacher's words. The minister who is truly called of God to his high vocation has nothing to fear from the adverse criticism he must encounter. He will be equal to any emergency. God will give to him "words and a mouth," that he may be capable of speaking the right message.

We occasionally hear the question raised whether the average city pastor is not more or less hesitant about preaching the Gospel boldly, lest he should offend influential members of his congregation. It has even been charged that, in order to retain his place, he must be willing to sacrifice much of his influence and practically all of his ideals. We can readily understand that there are cases in which young and inexperienced preachers, at the outset of their ministry, may have received an unfavorable impression as to the Gospel freedom which every pastor should strive to maintain; but we see no reason to believe that anything short of a lack of that faith in God which inspires courage should hinder a minister who has come safely through the first few trying years of his novitiate. It is true, there are exceptions to this, and it occasionally happens that the tragedy of a wrecked ministry is the result of combined efforts within the membership of the church to limit the truth and bind God's Word with bonds. There have been cases where a wealthy membership was a positive spiritual hindrance to the church, and a constant barrier which prevented the Gospel having free course. Such instances are peculiarly difficult for the conscientious preacher. Instead of his church being a place where rich and poor meet together for worship and where all unite cordially in the bonds of Christian brotherhood and service, he may find a line of demarcation drawn between the two classes which make such a union of forces impossible. If he be a preacher of courage and take up the challenge in the right spirit, he may succeed in breaking down the barriers, but it is a hard task.

Fortunately, few ministers are confronted by such conditions. In these days the Gospel is having freer course than ever before. In almost every congregation there is a genuine and sincere desire on the part of the officers and people to strengthen and uphold the pastor, and to afford him every opportunity and encouragement to spread the message of divine truth, and to lead them in the way of righteousness. For one preacher who encounters secret and malign influences undermining his ministry, there are scores, aye, hundreds, who can testify to the reverse. Let them speak the truth and fear not, and God will take care of the rest.

Higher and Still Higher Prices

THE rioting of thousands of New York women demanding food is more than ominous. It is not a threat, but the actual realization of a most dreadful condition. The shocking fact which stands out clearly is that in a land overflowing with plenty, thousands of mothers are unable to buy food enough for their children. It is a most shameful and intolerable condition in an enlightened, peaceful, prosperous country, and there is no good reason for its existence.

The Department of Agriculture reports that the stocks of frozen beef, cured beef, frozen pork, dry salt pork, sweet pickled pork, lard and frozen lamb and mutton were larger by 85,000,000 pounds on February 1, 1917, than on January 1, 1917, and considerably larger than a year ago; yet the price to the consumer has been advanced amazingly.

In the New York retail market, a year ago, apples were selling for $1.25 a box, which was very high; but today they are $2.50. Potatoes have jumped in the year from $4 per 180 pounds to $11; sweet potatoes from 60 cents a basket to $2; string beans from $2.50 a basket to $12; beets from 50 cents a crate to $2.50; lettuce from $1 a basket to $5, and onions from $2.50 a hundred pounds to $14.

Were the producers getting these tremendous increases, or even a reasonable part, the condition would not be so hopeless, because increased income for producers would encourage heavier planting and greater supply. But the road from producer to consumer is lined with highwaymen, who, unhindered by law, are exacting all they can.

There is a promise from Washington that, if money for the purpose can be appropriated, which is now doubtful, there will be a Federal inquiry, which may result in some kind of report in a year or so. Meanwhile, women with starving children are rioting for food.

According to the newspapers, the docks and warehouses of New York and other Atlantic ports are congested with foodstuffs consigned for shipment abroad, but held up by the U-boat campaign. The privilege of heavy shippers to sell their stuff abroad seems to be held sacred, and in support of it we are on the verge of war. But the right of American mothers to buy this food at a fair price gets little official recognition. Life on the sea, we say, must be defended at any cost of blood and treasure. All right. But before going to war to sustain the right to supply a part of the belligerent world with food, would it not be good Americanism to see to it first that the starving mothers and children of our own land are supplied with enough to eat?

Surely this is no time for precious American foodstuffs to be consigned to the extraordinary risks of the seas.

The Force of Purpose

NO man should hold to the idea that the world owes him a living. The idea is false in fact, wrong in principle and dishonest in practice. The world owes no one anything except that which is won by service.

It is a better idea that life owes a man nothing, and that the man owes to life everything. Life wants one's best. It will have nothing else. The best is none too good. The poorest boy in our land may hope to be President; he may be our leading financier, or our greatest minister or lawyer. The possibility is his; all else depends on his purpose and persistency and efforts. Nearly all our greatest men have achieved what seemed to be impossible. Their set purpose surmounted all obstacles.

Money will buy many things. But there are many other things money can never purchase. Wealth will cover only a small portion of life's needs. Purpose covers them all. Money to some extent controls material things. But purpose controls spiritual things and attunes us with the purposes eternal.

The young man who has a purpose and sticks to it will surmount all difficulties. The obstacles that to the purposeless ones are stumbling-blocks are turned by the purposeful into firm stepping-stones.

For Peace or War—With Both Hands

IN these tense, grave times our beloved nation is passing through a crucial test. Not the mere test of armed might—for that determines nothing that is righteous and enduring—but the test of our own spiritual faith in our own high-set ideals, and of our moral stamina to stand for them whatever may befall.

This great Republic of the West holds out to the world both hands in plea for peace. It is the plea not of the weakling but of the strong. It is the plea of the great-hearted, seeing the havoc that war impartially has wrought in human life and treasure. It is the plea of the pitying, hearing the moaning of the wounded, the weeping of widows and the wailing of orphans, on all sides alike. It is the plea of the well-fed, seeing the skinny hands of starving millions stretching forth for food and falling back empty. It is the plea of the just, seeing the slavery of unrequited toil and taxation riveted upon generations unborn. It is the plea of the peaceful, seeing the hellish madness, horror and futility of it all.

This nation wants peace, not for itself alone, but for all the world; and not with dishonor or injustice to any, but with right for all. There is a time to pray and a time to fight. It still is time to pray.

But if we must fight, let us not fight with one hand alone. If fight for our rights we must, then let us fight for them wherever they are assailed. Let us fight with both hands alike, that the freedom of the seas may be as secure and sacred on the coast of Germany as on the coast of Britain. Let us fight that our foods may go as free and unvexed to the starving peoples of one land as to those of another. If we are to fight for free seas, let us have the seas free, not half free.

Right is right, and this nation cannot afford to go to war on any compromise with wrong. It is well said that "we are too proud to fight without just cause"; but we are not afraid to fight, if fight we must, for honor and defense of rights. And just so sure as our purpose is pure and undivided, and impartially for our rights, we shall emerge triumphant, not over any people, but over every wrong that has assailed us.

The nation that holds out both hands for peace as long as peace is possible, and then fights with both hands for right, can never be vanquished, while the Lord God reigns!

A $75-a-Day Baby

A THOUSAND dollars' worth of clothes before he was born, followed by a $30 toy camel, a $15 toy lion, a $1 soap-bubble blower and an $18 party pie, are only a hint of the unlimited luxuries with which Baby John Jacob Astor in the three and a half years of his life has been made almost as happy, maybe, as the penniless urchins a few blocks away, who blew their soap-bubbles from a clay pipe and had a contractor's sawhorse for a seesaw. This baby inherits $3,000,000; and his indulgent mother shows in an accounting in court that she has already spent $86,034 on his cost of living.

When this is contrasted with the fate of thousands of babies that are suffering for the bare necessities of life, the heart hardens to cold inquiry into the wrong conditions which render such extremes possible. But this problem is too big to center about a baby's toys or a mother's indulgence. We must seek far beyond these for the solution of this.

A babe is but a babe, and a mother is but a mother, throughout the world. This baby with its $1,000 outfit bought in advance came as naked as the rest of us came. Its hands were as empty as were our own. It yearned first for the mother, as did we. What can millions mean to this or any other babe? Are its eyes any brighter, is its smile any sweeter, or the touch of its lips upon its mother's breast any more tender because of the fortune that awaits it? To it the clink of coins is but a sound, the tints of bills and bonds are but a flare of color, and all the money in the world means less to it than the kiss and clasp of love. The pure soul fresh from the hand of God is far too wise to be dazzled by the glittering bauble of wealth which later we sink to worship. The babe's heart and mind and soul, like the soft, strong tendrils of the vine, cling only to the stanch passions and emotions and impulses that are pure and enduring.

Can any sane mind suppose that this baby of the rich is any happier with its $30 toy camel than the baby of the poor is with its homemade rag doll? And is the grown-up infant with his surplus millions and the rich woman in her precious silks and jewels any happier at heart than the poor man who makes the final payment on his home, or Mary Ann in the new dress and gay hat she has bought with her first wages? Look into the faces of them, listen to the laughs of them, for answer.

That some are rich and others poor is all wrong, to be sure; but is it as serious as we are apt to think? That others are richer than we is not the worst wrong we permit ourselves to suffer. Why do we envy the rich, and not the pure of heart, who are truly the happier of all? The costliest toys of babyhood and youth soon pall; yes, and the costlier toys of prime and age pall almost as soon; and for the passions that endure, the emotions that sustain and the impulses that uplift and last we must all alike, rich or poor, high or low, turn to the same free fountain.

A fresh-born mite of humanity possesses possibilities that cannot be calculated. The now tender, tractable heart will some day beat strong with love or hate, with helpfulness or greed. The tiny hands that clasp and cling to everything within their reach have the beginnings of immeasurable power for good or evil. The infant mind is virgin soil for whatever seed modern civilization may sow in it, and according to the sowing the fruit will be sweet or bitter, yielding sustenance to the common human impulse or being poisonous to it.

The thought of a baby only in connection with its wealth is a stab in the mother heart wherever it beats, an insult to the highest, strongest, sweetest passion known to humanity. For there are things dearer than money, dearer than life itself; and a baby, rich or poor, is one of them.

TWO striking illustrations of the effect of war on national finances are found in Russia and Mexico. In the former, the kopek—ordinarily a small copper coin, the hundredth part of a ruble—has disappeared, and the government has printed an issue of paper kopeks, each representing about one-quarter of a cent, as an emergency currency. In Mexico, the silver peso in Diaz's time equaled about fifty cents of our money. Now, Villa pesos, brilliantly printed on paper, are circulating, value one cent each! Mexicans explain that it is "good currency," as any one refusing it will be shot.

Land and Happiness

THE Duke of Athol has just died, leaving an estate of 202,000 acres in the Scottish Highlands of Perthshire. At 640 acres to the square mile, this is over 315 square miles. It is not all fertile land, however, but is mountain and valley, with intervening sections of farm land, towns and villages, all maintaining the old-time feudal loyalty to the lord of the manor. Lord Masham, whose death was announced recently, was the owner of an estate of 35,000 acres, or about 55 square miles. The still more recent death of the Duke of Norfolk calls attention to his ownership of Arundel Castle, which dates from the time of King Alfred, who mentioned it in his will, and to the annual income from his large estates of $1,500,000 a year. Although the United Kingdom is comparatively small in extent of territory, it has more of these vast properties than any country in Europe or the world. There are 180,000 comparatively large holdings, running into the hundreds of acres and averaging 400 acres, whereas the average of the larger holdings in France is 32 acres, Germany 37 acres, Belgium 18 acres, Italy 36 acres, and in continental Europe at large 48 acres. The average in the United Kingdom is about eight or ten times that of other parts of Europe and about three times as great as the American average. The mammoth landed estates of England have grown out of the law of primogeniture, by which the real estate of the father goes to the oldest son to the exclusion of the younger sons and all the daughters. Other things being equal, those states are the most thrifty and happy where the largest number of people own their own farms in the country and homes in the cities and villages. The number of those in this land, both in the country and the city, will be greatly increased now that the saloon, the criminal waster of substance, is being removed so rapidly. The wealth of the Hebrews consisted not so much in large landed estates as in herds of cattle and flocks of sheep and goats. There is this promise to the faithful Jewish farmer: "Then will I give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit." (Lev. 26 : 4.)

Worthy of Emulation

THE West End Presbyterian Church of New York City, Rev. A. E. Keigwin, pastor, had taken its regular collection the other Sunday, when at the very close of the service, stopping the singing of the choir to do so, the pastor announced that Hope Baptist Church, two blocks away, Rev. E. S. Halloway, pastor, sought to pay off its bonded debt. He then and there proposed a second collection. It is said the collection ran up into the hundreds of dollars. The Hope Baptist people were grateful and happy, not more so than the Presbyterian Church who aided them in raising their $24,000 of debt. This beautiful act helps to answer this prayer of our blessed Lord: "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." (John 17 : 21.)

Republic Near Starvation

OFFICIAL dispatches from Liberia indicate that the people of the negro republic are nearing starvation, as the trade of the republic, which was conducted by German residents, has been cut off. In 1821 the American Colonization Society bought land in West Africa and settled on it a small body of freed African slaves. In 1847 the settlement was organized into the independent republic of Liberia. The republic now has a population of 2,500,000, of whom 18,000 are liberated American slaves or their descendants, 30,000 semi-civilized natives, and over 2,000,000 savages. The products of the country are coffee, sugar, rice, the date palm, the cocoanut, spices, rubber, et cetera. Their exports were never very large, but enough to support them; now that they are cut off, they fear starvation. Agents of the Liberian government are now in this country asking for officers to command an army against the invasion of neighboring savage tribes, and a competent man to superintend the construction of highways. May God bring peace and plenty to the bleeding, hungry nations of the earth. There were famines in olden times. There is this record of one: "Then there was a famine in the days of David three years, year after year." (II Sam. 21 : 1.)

Ancient Peru's Model Tapestries

THE great textile industry of America has been deprived of its usual sources of decorative designs abroad, but a new source has been found, it is said, in the collection of ancient Peruvian fabrics at the Museum of Natural History, New York. These, recovered by explorers from prehistoric burials, are now classed as among the most wonderful textiles in the world, and constitute an interesting technical and artistic record of textile history. In some of their techniques and color combinations they are said to surpass the best work of modern times. These beautiful fabrics, exquisite in color combinations, with their wealth of designs, represent the wonderful mastery of the loom possessed by the Inca and pre-Inca civilizations of Peru. They seem destined to have a pronounced influence on American textile art. Already a number of silk concerns, makers of wearing apparel, and ribbon houses have in course of manufacture numerous patterns which have been copied and adapted from the Peruvian textiles. One of the handsome tapestry ponchos is here pictured. This, like thousands of others, is resplendent in coloring, and ornamented with a medley of unique designs. It was woven from the silk-like wool of the vicuña, a member of the camel family. Silver tinsel yarn in considerable quantity is woven in. This yarn was spun in Peru by twisting a thin band or ribbon of silver about a finished yarn of cotton. Most of such fabrics were made centuries before the conquest. Tapestries have been used from the earliest times. The kings had them as decorations for the walls and furniture of their palaces. From the middle of the sixteenth century France tried in vain to weave tapestries, till two Flemish workers, Comans and de la Planche, were engaged by the wool-dyers Gobelin to found the greatest factory of the kind in Europe. It was as patterns for tapestry that Raphael produced his immortal cartoons. In 1893 M. Foussadier set up a loom in New York and wove the first tapestry in America. The Hebrews understood the art of weaving tapestries, and were thus divinely instructed to use them in the building of the tabernacle: "Thou shalt make the tabernacle with ten curtains of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet; with cherubim of cunning work thou shalt make them." (Ex. 26 : 1.)

Asbestos in Arizona

ARIZONA, which has become conspicuous by protecting itself against liquid fire in its "bone dry" prohibitory law, has just attracted national notice by the discovery of a substance that will protect people from material fire. Asbestos has been discovered in Arizona in the Sierra Ancha. It is the long-fibered kind, which can be woven into form for various uses. Heretofore, 85 per cent. of that kind of abestos used in this country has come from Canada, which supply has been cut off by the war. The find of the substance in Arizona is a good fortune to the nation, espepecially at this time. The mineral deposits of that state are very vaulable. In 1908 it produced 129,251 tons of copper. The value of the output of gold that year was $2,500,000, and of silver $1,500,000. Rock salt, lead and coal are in abundance. The same God who put the metal ores in the mountains of Arizona for the industrial development of this nation put them into the mountains of Palestine for his people Israel. There is this record of it: "A land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass. When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the Lord thy God." (Deut. 8 : 9, 10.)

Locks Banker in Vault

A MASKED man took the night of Lincoln's Birthday for a very unpatriotic act. He entered the Franklin State Bank at Winnsboro, La., and forced S. Hetherwick, its vice-president, and District Judge S. R. Holstein into the vault at the point of a revolver and compelled them to fill a sack with currency and pass it out to him. And then before the men could get out the robber slammed the door of the vault upon them, and made his escape. The two men remained in the vault about an hour and were near suffocation, when they managed to remove the lock and release themselves. It is thought the bag the thief took away had in it $30,000 in cash. Banks, supposed to be about the most certain things, have in them the element of uncertainty. A revolver held up the officer of this bank. Sometimes the bank is robbed by the cunning defaulter or the reckless plunger. The uncertainty of earthly riches is here given by Christ as the reason for setting the affection on spiritual treasures: "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." (Matt. 6 : 20, 21.)

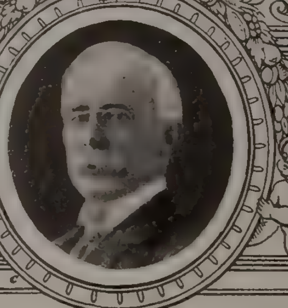
Was Not Office Boy

"HOW is it that you employ bald-headed, white-whiskered old men for office boys?" inquired a friend who was calling on the head of a large industrial concern in one of the great cities the other day. The answer was that the man who was so active was not an office boy, but was in charge of the office boys. "We find," said the proprietor, "that such a man is preferable to a mere head office boy promoted from the ranks of his fellows, who so often becomes a petty tyrant or merciless grafter, and sometimes both. This old man is sympathetic, and yet the boys cannot bluff him. He inspires in the boys a deep interest in their work, and has not an ambition to be the President of the United States or head of the house." In many of the great cities of the country old men are taking this place of head office boy. These overseers, with their kindness and fairness and encouragement, are in marked contrast to those thus mentioned: "Therefore they did set over them taskmasters to afflict them with their burdens." (Ex. 1 : 11.)

From Carpenter to Professor

TWENTY-FIVE years ago a young Minnesota farmer by the name of Goode, who did odd jobs of carpentering to piece out his income, shingled the house of Harry P. Judson, professor of history in the University of Minnesota. The professor took a fancy to the carpenter and persuaded him to go to college, where he worked his way through with hammer and saw. Professor Judson is now the president of Chicago University, and the carpenter is Dr. J. Paul Goode, professor of geography in the same university. Most of those who succeed in the various kinds of business and in the learned professions are those who began at the bottom and worked their way up. The promotion of the young carpenter is one of the many successes achieved in the secular and spiritual realms. There is this reference to a Carpenter who became the greatest Teacher of the world: "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest, except God be with him." (John 3 : 2.)

“PERFECT PEACE”



A SERMON

By

*REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

TEXT—Isa. 26:3. “Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee.”

WHAT is the boon? “Perfect peace.” What is the condition of the boon? A “mind stayed on God.” What is meant by staying the mind on God? First of all, what is the significance of the term “mind,” as used in the setting of our text?

A little analysis may help to sharpen our thought. There are at least three distinct elements in its composition. There is imagination, the element of vision and dream. There is purpose, the element of plan and design. And there is desire, the emotional element of yearning and hope. But amid all the distinction there is one dominant characteristic. Imagination looks forward! Purpose looks forward! Desire looks forward! It is that forward element which we must seize and emphasize. It may be only the things of the coming noontide, or the things of the coming night, or the things of tomorrow, or the things of a day more remote. It matters not whether they be the things of a quarter of an hour hence, or the things of a century hence; they both lie forward in the mist.

NOW, the word “mind” in my text denotes the thought which deals with the forward, misty things—the things which have not yet taken definite shape. It is thought which concerns itself with “What next?” and “next?” and “next?”—with the successions which lie beyond the immediate day. It is this thought of “What next?” which works such dire destruction with the peace of men. The things which hide there in the misty morrow—those are the things which trouble us, and fill the life with unrest. “Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.” Yet still the timid, wondering heart will ask, “What next, and next?” And back to the anxious tremblings there comes the soft, gentle counsel of my text: “Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind”—whose thought about “What next?”—“is stayed on thee.”

The “mind,” then, is the forward-looking thought; and I am counseled to let it be stayed on God. Now, all forward-looking must rely upon something. It must stay itself somewhere, and there lean and depend. Every thought which enshrines a place and a purpose has some basis of dependence, implied or fully expressed. Here is my life today. This life will have a next day. Upon what am I depending as to what the nature of the next day shall be? Upon what is my mind stayed?

HERE is one man who frankly confesses that his mind is stayed upon self, and he is the type of a countless host. He trusts his own right arm. He is, as we graphically describe him, self-confident. He confides in his own strength. His God is self, and on self he stays his mind. This character may not commonly evince itself in this frank and candid confession, but in innumerable instances the basis is assumed, even when it is not conspicuously and openly declared. There are millions of people who rely absolutely upon themselves to make their morrow as they please. I know the position is assumed in thoughtlessness, but the unwillingness of men to think is just the very burden of God. The great and pitiful tragedy is that self-confident men only begin to think when the house of their life is falling about them, and their boasted independence is a crumbling ruin.

Here is a man today, strong and healthily-blooded. His resources appear manifold. He is sure-footed. His brain is clear; his arm is strong. Work is a luxury. He copes with all the demands of the busy day with jubilant ease. He depends on self, and the support does not appear to betray him. What about tomorrow? But “be not anxious about tomorrow!” No, no; I cannot allow the quotation. That is counsel for the use of Christian men, and not for men of the world. When Christ said, “Be not anxious for the morrow,” he was speaking to his disciples, and not to an indiscriminate crowd. Men of the world ought to be anxious for the morrow, and it is one of the functions of the Christian ministry to allow them no peace. What about tomorrow? I ask the full-blooded and self-reliant man. In his thought about the morrow, the self-reliant man just sees himself repeated. Himself repeated, I say, unchanged and unimpaired!

HAVE you ever seen men to whom illness has come almost as an insult, who have regarded a gray hair as an offense to their pride? Have you not known a man to whom the revelation of decreasing strength occasioned a great surprise? He had pictured himself as repeated and repeated; he had not seen himself as enfeebled and infirm. But now those that look out of the windows are darkening; the grasshoppers, which once he brushed aside as flies, are becoming a burden; his brain is becoming sluggish, and the energies which ever served him are now failing at the fountain. He was self-confident. He stayed his mind upon self, and now self is dwindling and shrinking; his support is gone and his days are darkened with a bitter and desponding surprise. Men who stay their minds upon self will have a rude awakening.

THE white ants in some parts of Central Africa eat out the insides of the beams of wood of which the houses are made; and sometimes, so effectually has the scooping been done, the house becomes a mere shell, and the first rude storm reduces it to dust. There are white ants at work in human life, eating away its material supports, reducing it at length to a shadow. Happy the man whose reliance is placed elsewhere, who can watch the fall of the structure with untroubled and careless peace, who can quietly sing, while the house is crumbling: “When the earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens!” Unhappy the man whose hope for the morrow rests on the ant-eaten house—the man whose mind is stayed on self! Of his support this shall be written: “It fell, and great was the fall of it.”

UPON what else do men stay their thoughts for the morrow? Upon luck? Upon what are you depending for your life's successes? Upon luck; upon some happy chance, upon some favorable turn of fortune. Luck is playing a large and influential part in the life-concerns of many in our modern times. I am not sure that even the professed believers in Christ altogether exile that pernicious influence from their thought and speech. The very words “luck” and “lucky” occupy much too sovereign a place in the speech of common life, and from any man's favorite words you may infer the substance and trend of his thought.

What do you mean by luck? We mean something casual, something happening without a design. Events do not happen as the consequence of honesty or dishonesty, of falsehood or rectitude. They come and they go, independent of moral qualities, a whirl of morally lawless occasions, blessing and cursing by sheerest chance. We are lucky when the whirl drops into our laps a boon; we are unlucky when disappointment is hurled into our lot. And some men stay their mind upon luck. Life to them is a lottery; it is also a fever! There is a fearful watchfulness in the life that is stayed on luck. There is a bloodshot eagerness in the eyes that wait the arrival of chance. Yes, luck turns into feverishness and fills the days with tossing unrest. He shall be kept in perfect unrest whose mind is stayed on luck.

BUT now let us turn to the man of my text, “whose mind is stayed on God.” His support, upon which he depends, is not found in his own uncertain self, or in the caprice of chance, or in any cold tendency, but in a living and abiding Personality. It is our privilege to give to the Old Testament word the New Testament context. “God” to us means “Jesus,” and the counsel of the Almighty is expressed in the evangel of grace. We can stay our minds upon God, for “he calleth his sheep by name.” No one is lost in the indiscriminate crowd.

It is one of the inspiring characteristics of the life of the Saviour that he was always making individual calls, and speaking to people by name. “Zaccheus, come down!” “Simon, Satan hath desired to have thee!” “Thomas, reach hither thy finger!” “Mary!” Our Lord is familiar with the individual lot. He does not generalize providences; they are suited to the personal needs. God's attention can be concentrated everywhere. Therefore we can anticipate the morrow confidently. When the soul looks out, with its forward-reaching thought, and asks “What next?” faith answers, “The Father of Jesus.” And what next? And again comes the reply, “The Father of Jesus.” Always and everywhere, the next and the certain thing to come is the presence and goodness of God.

AND this is the stay that brings “peace.” It brings peace of mind, freedom from panic, the absence of fear. “Whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil.” And it brings peace of heart. The life is no longer disturbed by disquieting ambition. Violent ambition is like a vulture in a dovecote. Violent ambitions destroy the sweet and dove-like dispositions of life—sympathy, gentleness and goodwill. But when a life is quietly committed unto the Lord, and the mind stays on him for the next and the next, destructive ambitions entirely cease. And, thirdly, it will bring peace of conscience. The conscience will no longer be a threatening bell, full of alarm. It will be to us like the vesper bell, that sweetly calls to evening prayer.

“He shall be kept in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee.”

Sixpennyworth of Miracle

SUNDAY, March 11. Matt. 10 : 42. "A cup of cold water." The headline of this meditation is not mine. It belongs to George Gissing. And this is how it occurs: Gissing was going along the road one day, and he saw a poor little lad, perhaps ten years old, crying bitterly. He had lost sixpence, with which he had been sent to pay a debt. "Sixpence dropped by the wayside, and a whole family made wretched! I put my hand in my pocket and wrought sixpennyworth of miracle!"

I think Gissing's phrase is very significant. It suggests how easily some miracles can be wrought. How many troubled, crooked, miserable conditions there are which are just waiting the arrival of some simple human ministry, and they will be immediately transformed! It is surely this kind of miracle-working ministry which our Lord commends when he tells us of the service rendered by the gift of a cup of cold water only, in the name of a disciple. It is something which everybody can do, and yet it works a miracle, for it transforms the world of a weary traveler, changing his thirst into satisfaction, his faintness into strength, and his weariness into liberty and song. That miracle costs less than sixpence. A cup of cold water, and behold! all things become new.

John Morel, mayor of Darlington, was passing through the town and met a fellow citizen who had just been released from jail, where he had served three years for embezzlement. "Hello!" said the mayor, in his own cheery tone, "I'm glad to see you! How are you?" Little else was said, for the man seemed ill at ease. Years afterward, as John Morel told me, the man met him in another town, and immediately said, "I want to thank you for what you did for me when I came out of prison." "What did I do?" "You spoke a kind word to me, and it changed my life!" Sixpennyworth of miracle! A cup of cold water! A new world!

Ian Maclaren used to carry in his pocket a very well-worn letter, which had been sent to him by one of his poorest parishioners, and which he read again and again, and in many a changing season, and always with renewed cheer and inspiration. It was just a miracle-working letter written by an obscure parishioner who scarcely realized that she was doing anything at all. Just a cup of cold water, but it proved to be a fountain of life.

But away and beyond all such services as these, what ministries are in our hands for working miracles in the wonder-realm of prayer! We can take sunshine into cold and sullen places. We can light the lamp of hope in the prison-house of despondency. We can loose the chains from the prisoner's limbs. We can take gleams and thoughts of home into the far country. We can carry heavenly cordials to the spiritually faint, even though they are laboring beyond the seas. Miracles in response to prayer! And yet we will not pray! We will not pray! And the great miracles tarry because we will not fall in supplication upon our knees. J. H. J.

Praying Always

MONDAY, March 12. Luke 18 : 1. "And he spake a parable unto them to this end, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint." I have a friend. One who doubts the reality of friendship says to me: "Does your friend ever give you anything? Does he lend you money? Would he help you establish a business?" What do you think of a test like that? It is not fair. It is no true standard of friendship. We all well know that when thoughts of money come in at the door, friendship goes out through the window. Friendship is not a matter of getting gifts. The real question is, "Does your friend inspire you, warm you, console you, spur you to do your best?" And this is the real test of prayer—not what we get from God, not what God gives us, but rather what the thought of God does for us, what his love inspires us to do. Shall we not put away from us forever the childish notion that the value of prayer may be measured by what it enables us to acquire? Achievement is ever more than acquisition.

Columbus, looking for a western route to India, discovered America. Marshall, digging a shallow ditch for irrigation, discovered gold. Alexander Graham Bell, experimenting with a device to help the deaf, invented the telephone. And we, praying for comfortable homes, for smooth seas, for prosperous voyages, for deliverance from danger, for recovery from illness, find God. That is our reward, and is it not enough? What if our home be unroofed? What if the sea be rough? What if the voyage be adverse? What if recovery be delayed or denied? If we find God, and find him near, have not our prayers been justified? More than anything else, we need fellowship with God. Prayer is a means to that fellowship. Our minor needs are motives to prayer, but they do not exhaust the meaning of prayer. If cold, poverty, sickness, old age and death impel us to pray, these are the couriers that open doors for us, and bid us bow low when we come into the presence of the King of kings. C. C. A.

The Gospel Seed

TUESDAY, March 13. Luke 8 : 5. "A sower went out to sow his seed." Scripture loves to draw upon agriculture, the most ancient industry of men, when illustrating spiritual truths and pointing spiritual lessons. Out of this text, we imagine, the word "disseminate" has come, in the sense of scattering broadcast valuable information, instruction, advice, warning, comfort. Christ made his followers sowers of the incorruptible seed of the Word. All who believe Christ to be the Saviour of the world must spread this news, especially those who labor in the Word and doctrine, the called ministers of the Gospel.

A sower is careful to scatter only good seed. If he wants to raise wheat, he cannot sow cheat. There is no substitute for the saving truth of the Gospel, and this truth must not be presented to men mixed with error. Disseminating perversions of Bible truth also yields a harvest, but not a harvest of righteousness.

Good sowing is done in hope. The Great Fashioner of the universe has laid down the order that seedtime and harvest shall not cease. That is the farmer's guarantee that his work is not in vain. There may be partial and temporary failures, but the general law remains in force that the earth shall yield to the tiller a reward for his labor. So has the word that goes forth out of Jehovah's mouth the promise attached to it that it shall not return void. Let every sower of God's seed do his work with the cheerful confidence that there will be results even though he should not live to see them. W. H. T. D.

Scars for Christ's Sake

WEDNESDAY, March 14. Gal. 6 : 17. "I bear branded on my body the marks of Jesus." The beating at Philippi, the stoning at Lystra, the shipwrecks, chains and perils, branded Paul as the slave of Jesus Christ. These deep gashes were marks of the Lord's ownership of the devoted apostle. Christ's monogram of suffering was upon Paul; his Master could pick him out anywhere. Is it not a great glory to be counted worthy to bear scars for Christ, to take the lictor's rods instead of nails for crucifixion, to be in deaths oft, to die daily instead of once on Calvary, that Christ may live in you? As soldiers are proud of their wounds, which are marks of patriotism and heroism, so the Christian soldier rejoices that he can suffer shame and disfigurement for his Master's name.

Those who suffer in spirit for others bear the labels of Calvary, which open all the gates of life eternal, even to the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Lord, what wilt thou have me to do and to endure for thee, that the power of Christ may rest upon me, and that I may become more and more like thee? All Christians should possess the sacrificial spirit of Jesus, that they may become miniature Christs to men. The image of Jesus engraven upon the heart is the brand which distinguishes Christ's followers. It is deeper than the flesh, interwoven with the spirit; it is character rather than clothes; a brand, not a badge. E. W. C.

As a Good Soldier

THURSDAY, March 15. II Tim. 2 : 3. "Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." If I were a soldier, and if a battle were impending, and if I were to leave my place in the ranks and go to the rear because the captain of his company did not speak to me when he passed yesterday, or because a lieutenant did speak to me and spoke ungraciously, or because a sergeant hurt my feelings by something he said or did or left unsaid or undone, or because a comrade trod on my sensitive toes—if I were to throw down my arms and go to the rear, what sort of a soldier should I be? Yet have we not known "Christian soldiers" to do just such things?

If a soldier were to absent himself from drill, absent himself habitually and without good reason; if he were to neglect to study the book of tactics, the manual of arms; if he were to criticize his officers in the presence of other soldiers, and thus implant the seeds of dislike or distrust in their minds; if he were in a perpetual state of discontent because the captain did not consult him as to the plans of the campaign; if the army needed recruits, and if this soldier never said to any man, "Come, enlist and bear arms for the cause;" if, by his half-heartedness, he repelled possible recruits, and if he were to attempt to excuse himself by saying, "I am only a nominal soldier anyhow, and I do not pretend to be more," we should have a perfect right to say to him, "You are no soldier at all; you are simply playing soldier; mount a broomstick and gallop away!"

A "nominal Christian," indeed! Is there such a thing? Who cares to consult a "nominal doctor," or buy a suit of a "nominal tailor," or eat a dinner prepared by a "nominal cook"? Just how far could one travel on a "nominal train" and how much money would we care to keep in a "nominal bank"? A "nominal Christian" is no Christian at all.

Victories Born of Defeats

FRIDAY, March 16. II Cor. 12 : 9. "He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me." The plan which divine grace adopts for gathering a church on earth and for educating every member of it to his full stature of manhood in Christ is full of paradoxes. God chooses to save the world, not by its own wisdom but by the foolishness of preaching. Christ was not presented to the Athenians as a great philosopher, nor to the synagogue as a martial hero and political deliverer, but as a servant and sufferer. And yet faith in the despised Jesus and his teaching has overcome the world.

The individual Christian discovers in his inner life elements that annoy, perplex and confuse him. He knows that Jesus has made him an heir of everlasting glory. He imagines that this legacy which he holds by faith ought to remove every irritation from his life. His life should be altogether lovely, full of joy and peace. But he finds himself buffeted by Satan in his most holy moments. There is a thorn in his flesh that sometimes goads him to despair. He cries for deliverance from the things that torment him, and this is the answer he receives: You are not strong when you think you are strong and would bravely assert your self-sufficiency for the tasks of your Christian calling. I am making you strong by my method: by suffering you to be afflicted and providing you with strength to bear your affliction. Your victories are to be seeming defeats, lest you begin to glory in your own great qualities and forget the power of Christ which is active in you, rearing an indestructible citadel of faith out of your very infirmities. W. H. T. D.

Godliness and Afflictions

SATURDAY, March 17. Amos. 3 : 2. "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities." "Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth." He loved Israel; therefore great sorrows came upon the nation. Our Father knows that immortal joys will make up for all the momentary light afflictions we endure here. If we were to die as the beast dieth, he would not afflict us. He purgeth us for immortality.

History moves upward with bloody feet. Most of the Bible books were written by the pen of pain. Psalms were sung from the depths of sorrow; the Epistles came out of prison; Revelation out of Patmos. The characters of Job, Joseph, Moses and Abraham were molded, ornamented and burned into permanency by afflictive providences.

A kind father puts the child on the surgeon's table and gives the bitter medicines to save its life. The true child will trust where it cannot trace, and bless the hand of love that administers peace through pain. "God is love" whichever way the wind blows. Earthly parents often ruin their children by bequeathing great wealth, while the heavenly Father saves his children by letting riches take wings and fly away.

The Yard Beautiful

The garden at the top of the page is a transformed back yard in a factory town. Shrubs and flowers mark the line of the next lot, and a flower bordered grass path leads to the vegetable garden.

Rocks, such as those on the driveway shown at the left, are a challenge to imagination and a sure beginning for a beauty spot. Sweet alyssum did most of this.

A low hedge such as is shown above will mark the line without marring the beauty of the spreading lawns. It also furnishes a background for the more or less formal geraniums.

A back yard path is prettier curved and each curve is an opportunity for a clump of flowers. Cutting the corners of the cross walk adds to both beauty and utility.

Vines, hollyhocks and shasta daisies will glorify an ugly fence or relieve the coldness of a plain brick wall and the daisies will bloom from June until September.

A rocky corner like this at the right need not be a barren waste. Chinodoxia will cling to a cleft or riot in a handful of earth, blooming throughout the spring.

In the Sweep of His Garment

By JEAN MAHAN PLANK

ONE morning last week I went out to pick the figs from a big tree midway of the back garden. Peterkind, being full of bubbling desires to "hep muvver," toddled along in his little snow-white rompers, and dragged a papier bucket nearly as tall as himself.

The first rain of the California winter had come in the night and washed fruit and leaves to sweet cleanliness. The air seemed brand-new, and a feeling of light-hearted freshness was in the mellow sunshine. I climbed high on the stepladder, thrust my head up through the branches, pushed aside the broad, stiff leaves, and pulled from their sockets the soft bulbs of dull, downy purple.

As I was bending my head to see Peterkind, who looked, from above, like a broad white turtle waddling about under the tree, my eyes came right on a level with the dining-room windows of the empty house. I forgot my figs and stood on a branch staring straight into the window. There she was—and crying, too, as if her heart would break. She was sitting at the table where she mixes her plaster, and her head was lying on her outstretched arms.

I had been telling Peter, ever since Evelyn Stone brought her little white ghosts and started to work in the back rooms of the empty house, that she looked to me like a person who was ready to burst out crying at any minute. Yet she had never let fall a word that sounded like complaint. When I would say that to Peter, he would raise his kind eyes from his book, glance thoughtfully across at the empty house, and remark quietly:

"Well, I suppose you will be equal, Rosebud, to fixing up her life for her."

Peter knows that people are my stories. When I have time to read books I always take from the end of the shelves nearest the kitchen, because it's generally when I'm waiting for something to boil or bake; and at that end of the living-room is where the Emerson books are, and things of that kind. But I don't seem to miss stories when there are such interesting lives going on all about me. I don't really try to fix them up, though; I'm too interested. I just watch them go on.

Once in a while, though, one of my "lights," as I call them, comes over me, and then I say something that pops out without my meaning to say it; and I'm always just as surprised as the other person.

For instance, just such a thing happened on the morning that I was picking figs. I simply couldn't wait when I saw Evelyn Stone crying there all alone in that big, bare dining-room. I slipped right down from the tree, and caught Peterkind's hand.

"Run in, lovey," I said quickly, "and stay with San. Mother is going over to the empty house to see Missy 'Tone."

WE call it the empty house because it's been empty ever since I was a little girl — the little adopted girl of Peter's folks. They raised me, and when they died Peter and I, after a long story, were married and went right on living in this dear old spreading bungalow. It is really spreading, because Peter built on a new room two and a half years ago, and he says he is going to build one every time a new Peterkind comes.

Well, when I got to the back door I rapped loud, and called Evelyn Stone's name. I heard her say, "Just a minute," and then it was two of them before she let me in.

I didn't wait for ceremony. I just took her right in my arms.

"Look here, Evelyn Stone," said I, "you've been crying, and I want to help you some way. You don't need to tell me what it's about ——"

But she cried right out in a strange voice: "The end has come."

"The end—of what?"

"Of everything—for me."

We were both quiet for an instant, then without a word we sat down on a couple of boxes that she uses for pedestals, in the midst of the ghostly, sheeted statues and busts standing on the table, the sink, and even on the rusty gas-range. I looked about, sort of mystified.

"Everything? Your work—you have been so busy making the little white 'dollies,' as Peterkind calls them, and paddling in the clay. What is ——"

"But I had hope then," she moaned tragically. "Now even hope is gone."

I'd always thought of hope, myself, as a sort of dreary word. I didn't know much about it, for when you've got everything right with you that you can think of, you don't need to fall back on hope. Without speaking, I turned and looked out of the dingy window. Over at the bungalow I saw Peterkind's rosy face at one of the lattices. He was beginning to watch for Peter to come home from the greenhouse to dinner.

Something caught me inside. Here this poor little soul had been living with that dreary makeshift for comfort all this time, and now even that had evaporated. She'd been getting thinner and thinner, too. Why, she's only about thirty—I'm a lot older than that —and she had got all wrinkled up across her forehead, and her neck looked real bony. She's naturally pretty, though; one of the kind that lights up when she smiles, and looks like a merry little girl when she is happy.

AS I sat there thinking what to say to her, she suddenly started in and told me all about it. I knew she had been working at some little statues, trying to get a prize that had been offered by a big art firm in Los Angeles. They wanted to send a statuette with their wares to the Exposition, and it was to be called Patience. Taking the prize would mean a lot to Evelyn on account of the money and the name. She had been living in a little back studio in the city, working day and night, and watching the tiny bit of money her father had left her ooze away.

"That would not have been so bad," she said sadly as she sat telling it all to me in the shabby kitchen-studio, "but there was the awful tax of going to my mother's house every day to do the things that Bettie could not do. Mother is a cripple, and very—my sister, as I think I've told you, is a bit defective in intellect, but she takes care of my mother and the bungalow."

Evelyn had told me from time to time about the mother and sister. I had gathered, almost without her saying so, that the mother was one of those invalids who have kept their minds upon themselves for so long that they come to think that the universe just turns around with them for a center. She had always been taken care of, and like others of us women who live carefree domestic lives she had no idea of what time means to a worker. But, worse than that, she was of the sort that scolds its way through life. That's a very effective way, too, for people will do anything in order to stop the sound of the scolder's voice.

Evelyn, when she first started with her sculpture work, had gone to live in Chicago. But the mother scolded her back to Los Angeles. Evelyn declared, though, that as she had to make a living, her work was a duty, and as she could not work in her mother's vicinity, she would never, never go to live with her. When she undertook trying for the prize statuette, however, she was so worn with the noise of the city that she decided to come over to Pasadena. The agents for the empty house let her have the kitchen and dining-room for a nominal rent, and she brought all her little white ghosts and set up a studio there.

"ON this first statuette," said Evelyn as she threw off the cover of the dearest little dainty figure, "I put much time. I was so sure it was right. I found my model in a trained nurse who was caring for the most disagreeable patient I ever saw in a hospital. I got her to sit for me, and keep her mind on her patient." Evelyn sighed. "She certainly is a pretty figure, isn't she?"

I didn't answer for a minute, for I was sort of puzzled about the look in the face. The work was good, there's no doubt of that; and it was pretty as could be. But the look

"Oh, I know what it is," I suddenly cried out, "it—it's—she's just so exasperated she keeps still and doesn't say a word. She knows it's no use."

Evelyn turned and looked at me. "Well," she said slowly, "they sent it back. I was broken-hearted at first; then I just started in harder than ever and made another.

"This time I found a poor widow who had lost her whole world within six months. She went about making bread and cakes for a living. She never spoke of her losses. I saw her once when she was waiting for a customer to pay her, and I think it was the calmest face I ever saw. Here she is—and, dear Rose, can you believe it? They sent it back!"

"Oh—h!" I said sympathetically, and I stood looking at the little figure, which was, I am sure, the calmest thing I ever saw, too; so calm it looked dead. You could strike that woman in the face and she wouldn't get mad. You could steal her best hat and she would never change her countenance.

Pretty soon I saw why. "Evelyn, dear! That isn't patience. That's an awful, awful, deathly despair. Why don't you change the name and sell it some place?"

She threw up both hands. "It's too late now!" she cried. "The end has come. I can't live here another day. My money is gone—every cent. I kept hoping and hoping—and, Rose, I prayed, too; and I kept thinking that I wanted to be resigned to the will of God——"

Then it was that my light came, and I said right out:

"Perhaps you were in the sweep."

SHE stared at me; and I felt kind of funny too, because Evelyn is highly educated, and I didn't like to seem to be trying to tell anything to her.

"The sweep?" she asked. Then she looked so sweet and kind of childlike that I wasn't afraid to go on.

"Why, one of Peter's books says that it's one thing to march in front with the will of God and another to be 'dragged in the sweep of his garment that makes the storm behind him.'"

I couldn't tell, myself, why I told her this, so I didn't say anything more. Pretty soon she began to talk—not to me, but just like she was thinking.

"But to go and live with my mother and help Bettie take care of her would simply mean giving up my work. And isn't our work divinely given? And if I had won the prize, I was going to hire a good woman to go and help Bettie. Of course it's about impossible to get any one who will stay there over a week; for mother makes life miserable for them. And Bettie is getting so lame——"

She stopped short and gave a little choking laugh. "Well—it's all settled for me. There's nothing else to do. I'm at the end now, and I've got to go there. Of course—I could—end it all completely. But think of those two helpless beings left in this world all alone! And there are things I can do for my mother that she simply will not let any one else do."

Seeming to forget me, she moved about from figure to figure, throwing sheets over them, and looking as if she were saying good-by to them. She went through the dining-room door, and stood a long time over in one corner before something that I couldn't see. After a bit she covered it up carefully—whatever it was—and came toward me with one of her quick changes in face and movement.

"Here I am," she said with a half laugh, "suffering and sacrificing almost my very life for a thing that—well—I could live very well without, if I only had—something else." She looked at me a bit sheepishly. "Rose, you are a happier woman than you know. There are things better than work, better than success. I'd throw it all to the winds quick enough——"

The light faded suddenly from her eyes, and her glance ran over the white-sheeted forms. I could see that the thoughts of failure and disappointment came back and darkened her face again.

"Well, Rose," she said sadly, "this is the end of my ambitious dreams. I shall leave these things until I can move them away. Maybe you will cast an eye over here occasionally."

I could hardly speak. It seemed so dreadful to have your life so empty of sweetness. So I opened the door to go. But before I knew it something else popped out without my seeming to mean it.

"Work's something like love. If we love—not ourselves but the objects of our love—we are led straight through them up to God. And I've learned in my housekeeping and in the care of Peterkind that if I love my work and not my own particular way of doing it, somehow it gets done a lot better than the way I had thought out."

IT was that evening that a man came and looked into the windows of the empty house.

Peter was sitting by the fire, cutting the leaves of a new book of essays that had come in the afternoon. As I was thinking about Evelyn, I went to the lattice and pulled back the curtains. I wanted to see if everything looked all right at her place. I had often done that while she was there, and I used to see her working away at drawings, or pouring water over her little ghosts. But now it was dark, and rain was falling—the welcome winter rain that brings out the roses and calla lilies, and gives new start to the growth of the beautiful yellow oranges. Our trees were heavily laden with lovely golden balls. Indeed, one was weighted quite to the ground, and Peter had had to wire it to the house to keep it from collapsing entirely.

As I was turning away from the lattice, I suddenly discovered the man standing on the porch of the empty house, and peering in at the front window. Now, as we don't ever have burglars in Pasadena, I thought to myself that here was some unfortunate Easterner who had brought an invalid to the coast, and was in such a hurry to get into a house that he was out in this wet night looking around.

I told Peter, and he shut his book quick.

"I'll go over, Rosebud, and see if I can help him."

He went to the hall and got an umbrella while I ran for candles. If the stranger wanted to see the house, we could show him through. I got the candles and Evelyn's kitchen key, and throwing a rubber coat about me, I followed Peter to the front porch of the empty house.

As I reached the steps, I heard the stranger say in a sort of eager, surprised tone:

"Isn't this where Miss Evelyn Stone lives—or lived—for I see the house is empty?"

Peter explained that Miss Stone had gone to stay with her people in the city. The stranger stood still an instant while I struck a match and lighted one of my candles. In the flare of light I saw his face. It was a nice one, and he had one of these pointed Vandyke beards, and very thick—but closely cropped—hair; and his voice was the kind that, if you hear it from behind you, makes you turn your head to see the speaker.

"I am sorry," he said slowly. "I met Miss Stone a couple of times in our shop —my name is Burton—the junior of the Burton Art Company——"

"Oh-h!" said I quickly. Then I began to think very fast. That was the firm that had offered the prize. Maybe they had changed their minds. "Why—did you want to see her work?" I asked, trying not to be too eager. "It's all here, you know. She couldn't—it hasn't been moved yet. I have the back door key."

WE paddled around on the wet gravel to the back door. Peter took the candles from me, and lit them all. He stuck them high in some little cups, and that threw a pleasant, soft light over the sheeted figures.

I began to pull the covers off, so eager was I to show Mr. Burton the pretty statuettes. He was rather quiet, though, and he didn't seem to look as much at the finished things as at the broken bits of plaster scattered about; and he stood a long time before some sketches in pencil which had been left lying on the sink. Pretty soon he glanced toward the dining-room.

"There are more in there," I suggested, and Peter took down one of the candles. The two men went into the dining-room.

I stood in the doorway, feeling a bit vexed and downcast. Why couldn't he have shown some appreciation of the lovely little figures? Art men were such——

Just then I heard a prolonged "Ah-h!" and Peter gave a low whistle. I seized another candle and went in. Mr. Burton was over in the corner where I had seen Evelyn standing so long that morning. He had the candle in his hand, and he had pulled off the sheets from a figure that stood on a high, slender, wooden pedestal. I went closer to see what he was exclaiming about. Then I, too, cried out.

It was the loveliest little white bust of a baby that I ever saw. I recalled right away that Evelyn had "stolen" Peterkind several times, and the boy had had great times playing "make dollies with Missy 'Tone." She had never said one word about making him into a little model.

But this was not Peterkind. Of course there was the shape of the head, and the darling little fat neck, and the dear little ears. But the face—it was the face of no baby that I had ever seen. I felt—somehow—that it was the face of a baby that had never yet been born.

Mr. Burton suddenly covered it up. He turned away with a queer drooping of the head, as if he had walked noisily into a church service or something of that kind. We none of us felt like talking, and we covered up the figures, locked the door, and splashed around again to the front porch.

He did not speak another word, except to ask for Evelyn's Los Angeles address. As he went striding down the path, dodging the wet branches of the magnolias, I slipped my hand in Peter's arm, and we started across the lawn to our house. Then we both noticed that the rain had stopped. A faint light was striking between the roofs of the houses. Peering through, we saw that the clouds had parted, and the moon had come out. Its blue gleam made a giant eucalyptus look like a huge feather against the western sky.

All of a sudden it made me see what Hope was like. I who had never needed to know it for myself, was now knowing it for Evelyn. And it wasn't a bit dreary, it was beautiful; something like the stirring of a new life under the heart.

I kept waking up that night, and wondering about Mr. Burton. Could he be thinking of—no—he didn't look as if he wanted to buy that baby head. Well—what did he want, anyway? I decided to go over to the city the next day, and tell Evelyn all about it. I felt that she ought to know.

I FOUND Evelyn in a shabby little brown bungalow. She was sitting on the floor, and binding her mother's dropsical legs. Mrs. Stone was sociably inclined, and she entertained me in a lively way while her daughter wound yards and yards of muslin strips about her limbs. I wanted a chance to talk to Evelyn, but it did not come.

While I was planning to ask her to take a bit of a walk with me, Bettie, the defective sister, wandered restlessly in and out of the room, fetched and carried for Mrs. Stone, and answered the bells back and front. Her every entrance was the signal for the mother to hurl some bitingly critical remark at her head. Bettie did not answer. She limped about with her stooped figure and long, swinging arms, and picked up things and hunted for other things without any word of comment.

She had started toward the kitchen when the mother suddenly choked. With a wild wail, the invalid caught hold of Evelyn's skirts and whispered for water.

I ran to the kitchen and found Bettie with a glass already filled. "I saw her eating candy," she explained mildly, "so I knew she'd choke in a minute."

After the ailment was allayed, I carried the glass back to Bettie. She was standing by the sink, and she looked at me with a confidential nod.

"Sometime I'm going to have a white one—made of porcelain." She pointed to the iron sink where the paint was worn, and washed to a mass of dark scales. "I've always wanted that. A white sink—made of porcelain." She smiled brightly.

She turned away, smiling brightly, and I went back to the living-room. I talked awhile longer with Mrs. Stone, and during that time Bettie was called to arrange the pillows for the invalid. She seemed to know just how to do it, but exactly so much scolding had to be gone through with before Bettie's first arrangement was finally accepted.

But the girl's face did not change. The smile I had seen in the kitchen lingered on her lips and in her eyes. I knew, as if I'd been told, that she was seeing that "white sink—made of porcelain." Bettie had an ideal, and it lifted her above the ruts and jars of life.

I was aroused from my thoughts about Bettie by a quick grasp on my arm. I turned to find Evelyn with her face all aglow, and her eyes sending out little sparks of fire. She was fairly glaring at her sister. I was startled at what she said.

"My Patience!"

I thought she was exclaiming at something, and I wondered a bit, for she was always such an extremely poised person about her talk. In a second she said it again under cover of Mrs. Stone's loud berating of Bettie.

"My Patience, Rose!" she whispered. "Don't you see? Look at Bettie—look quick, Rose!"

But I saw — easily enough, and it brought me right up out of my chair. I saw, too, that Evelyn was beginning to tremble with excitement. So I shook hands with her mother, and told her I wanted Evelyn to walk with me to the car.

Outside, I put my arm about Evelyn, and we walked slowly between the rows of scarlet geraniums that border the sidewalks out in the "bungalow district."

"Rose — Rose!" she glowed at me, "I did not know—I did not dream—that it was right here with me. Rose, my high light will be reached—my master work will be done!—and Bettie will have her sink." I loved her for that anti-climax.

I WAS as bubblingly incoherent as she, and we had nearly reached my car before I thought to tell her of Mr. Burton's visit. She did not seem greatly impressed, and she only answered absently:

"I know—I remember meeting him. He said then that he would run over some time and see the rest of my work. I suppose he was in Pasadena and thought it was a good time to come. Oh, Rose—my Patience!"—It was no time to talk.

I told her that Peter and I would send over the things that she ought to have right away to work with, and she made a list. As I stepped on the car and was whirled away, I saw her face all lit up with a smile, and she stood, with her hands in the pockets of her sweater coat, looking like a merry, happy little girl.

WE didn't hear a word from her for ten days. I didn't think strange of that, for I knew that when she started to work she forgot everything else. But I didn't wait to hear. I went over again.

She was at work in a back bedroom which had been cleared to give room for her traps. But it was a new Evelyn who flourished at me the queer, knife-like instrument with which she was slapping around in the wet clay. She laughed aloud in gleeful welcome.

"She's here all right, Rose," she cried, "our Patience! Come and look at her!"

She jumped up to draw me over to the window near which she had been working. At that instant a stream of wild calls for Bettie rang out from the front room. I stopped and looked at Evelyn with a troubled feeling.

"Evelyn dear—how do you—are you able to get in your work—here?"

She turned and threw both arms about me.

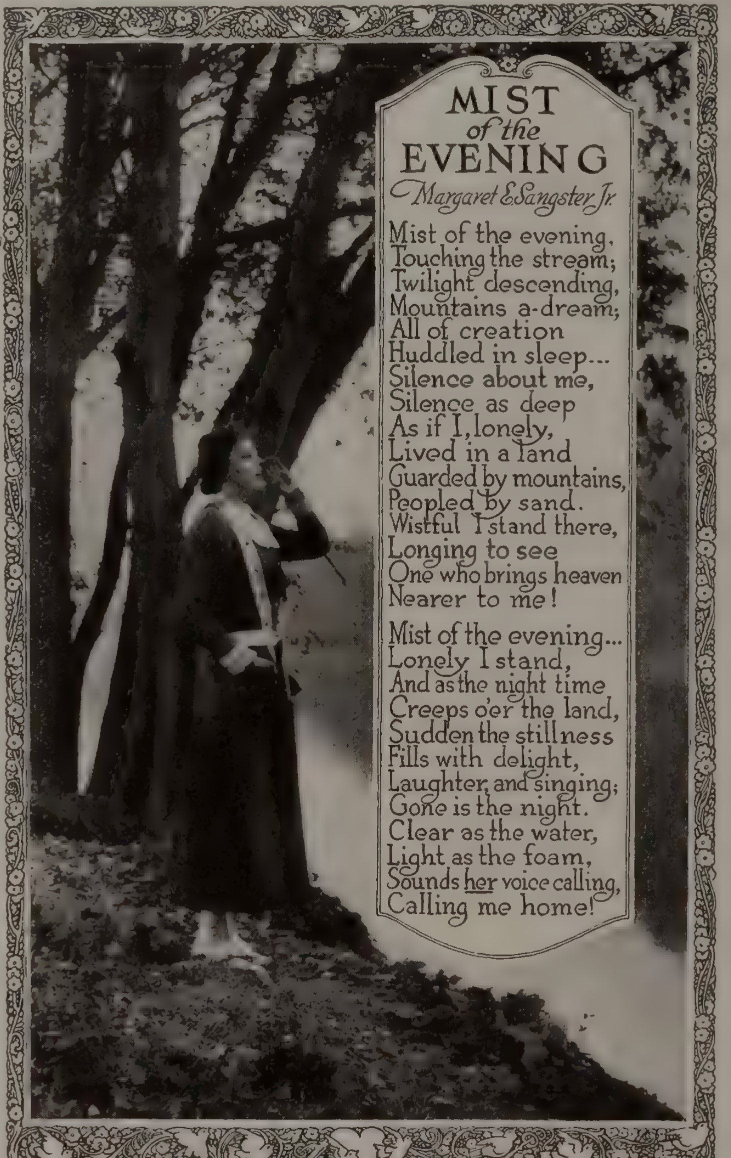
"Rose, do you know—that when I got out of the 'sweep,' and went to marching in the front—with the Will, I found that the Will was going to see to it that I should have a chance to do my work."

Then we both started, for a new voice was sounding from the living-room—one that Mrs. Stone answered with evident delight. It was the kind of voice that when you hear it from behind, you turn your head to look at the speaker. And strong rapid footsteps came along the little passage that led to the studio door.

I didn't stay long. Mr. Burton was like a boy in his impatience to have the statuette quite finished; and he stood with his hands in his pockets, bending eagerly over the work, and marking quickly the progress that had been made since the day before.

Across the passage I glanced back through the door, and again a light struck through the parting clouds. This time it shone from the face and figure of Mr. Burton. As he stood looking down into Evelyn's face, I knew that he knew. But in the eyes that gazed up at him, there was only a dawning wonder.

As I trolleyed back to Peter, Peterkind and home, the sunbeams still lingered golden among the leaves of the apricot and orange trees; faint, soft outlines of the Sierra were veiled in mysteries of rose and lavender; but that beauty paled before the greater and more golden mystery I had seen in that dawning of the Love-light.



MIST of the EVENING

Margaret E. Sangster Jr.

Mist of the evening,
Touching the stream;
Twilight descending,
Mountains a-dream;
All of creation
Huddled in sleep...
Silence about me,
Silence as deep
As if I, lonely,
Lived in a land
Guarded by mountains,
Peopled by sand.
Wistful I stand there,
Longing to see
One who brings heaven
Nearer to me!

Mist of the evening...
Lonely I stand,
And as the night time
Creeps o'er the land,
Sudden the stillness
Fills with delight,
Laughter, and singing;
Gone is the night.
Clear as the water,
Light as the foam,
Sounds her voice calling,
Calling me home!

Persia's Christians Under the Sword

TRUSTWORTHY information has come to the Christian Herald from the ancient city of Urmiah showing that the native Lutheran Christians of Persia are in sore need of help. They are in dire distress, and unless some friendly hand is extended to them quickly, they will be left to perish. News of the sad case of this unfortunate people has come to us from Lutheran missionaries who, by the exigencies of war, have been driven from their posts, and the information is supplemented by statements direct from the native pastors of Lutheran churches. The appeal is one that Christian America cannot afford to overlook, and to which all who have sympathy for the sufferings of their Christian brethren in Persia should be willing to respond.

It is about forty years since Lutheranism first gained a foothold in Persia, and when the war broke out it had a considerable following. Native converts, men of education and ability, were energetically and successfully preaching the Gospel, and had gathered good-sized congregations around them in the villages of western Persia. When the great war broke out, it dealt a terrible blow to the whole Christian population of Persia, the native Lutheran Christians included. Russia induced, and in many cases by threats compelled, the Persian Christians who were members of the Russian Orthodox Church to take up arms and join the Russian army of invasion. The fire of hatred long smoldering in the hearts of the Persian people now burst into open flame.

To intimidate the Persian population the Russian military authorities arrested and sentenced to death ten of the most prominent Mohammedan citizens of Urmiah. Outside of the city a long gallows was erected, on which the ten men were ignominiously hanged. The news of this execution spread like wildfire, and soon reached the Mohammedan Kurds in the mountains of Kurdistan. The son of one of the men executed took a sacred oath, swearing that his sword would not rest until one hundred Christian lives had been taken to expiate the death of his father.

IN the early part of the year 1915, the Russian troops, threatened by an advancing Turkish army, withdrew from the Urmiah district, thus leaving the Christians, who had regarded them as their protectors, to the mercy of their foes. And now began a time of terror for all the Christians of Urmiah and of the many villages surrounding it. The whole Persian population joined with the wild onrushing hordes of Kurds who had come down from their mountain fastnesses, and fell upon the defenseless Christians, spreading death and destruction on every side. They hunted down and massacred the Christians, whom they also considered as their national enemies. The following quotations from Morgan Shuster's book, "The Strangling of Persia," describe the conditions prevailing in Persia when the war began:

> "Two powerful and presumably Christian countries played fast and loose with truth honor, decency and law, one at least hesitating not even at the most barbarous cruelties to accomplish its political designs, and to put Persia beyond hope of self-regeneration." (Foreword, p. 13)
> "In February, 1911, Russian troops massacred some sixty villagers, including women and children, at Varmuni, near the town of Astara, in Persia." (p. 53.)

A Syrian member of the Lutheran church at Gogtapa and her daughter; the husband and four children were massacred

> "She [Persia] was the helpless victim of the wretched game of cards which a few European powers, with the skill of centuries of practice, still play with weaker nations as the stake, and the lives, honor and progress of whole races as the forfeit." (p. 104.)
> "On December 24, 1911, a message was received from the acting governor of Tabriz, stating that the Russian troops stationed there had started to massacre the inhabitants." (p. 219.)
> "On New Year's Day, which was the tenth of Muharram, a day of great mourning and held sacred in the Persian religious calendar, the Russian military governor, who had hoisted the Russian flag over the government buildings at Tabriz, hanged the Sikutu'l-Islam, who was the chief priest of Tabriz, two other priests, and five others, among them several high officials of the provincial government. As one British journalist put it, the effect of this outrage on the Persian mind was that which would be produced on the English people by the hanging of the Archbishop of Canterbury on Good Friday." (p. 219).
> "It is safe to say that the horrors of Tabriz will never become fully known. The Russians saw well to that. Unrestrained shootings, hangings, tortures, blowing of men from cannon, the cynical butchery of women and children in the streets of their town—and even worse things—make a fair record for the officers and troops of the nation whose ruler promotes peace tribunals and poses as the friend of mankind." (p. 220.)
> "The fact that the recent destruction of Persian nationality by Russia and England is no novelty in history takes nothing from the sadness of the story. In some cases where the independence of a people is wiped out, there has been at least a quasi-justification for the act,—such as the advancement of civilization, or the creation of better political institutions. In Persia's case no such excuse existed. No serious claim can be made that Russia will further the cause of civilization and progress in Persia.
> "Throughout the entire controversy between the Persian government and the two powers, there has never been more than weak pretense that what was being done was to benefit the Persian people. Every utterance and claim has been based on a cynical selfishness that shocks all sense of justice. It is in the pursuit of 'Russian interests' or 'British trade' that innocent people have been slaughtered wholesale. Never a word about the millions of beings whose lives have been jeopardized whose rights have been trampled under foot, and whose property has been confiscated." (p. 331.)
> "Morocco, Tripoli and Persia, three Moslem states, have been destroyed in a year by their enlightened Christian neighbors. It is not a pretty spectacle Can one blame the hundreds of millions of Mohammedans in the world for being deeply resentful? Can they help regarding the events of the year 1911 as a part of a concerted plan on the part of the Christian powers of Europe to leave not a single Mohammedan nation" (p 332.)

The resentment of which Mr. Shuster speaks, deepened by the age-long antagonism existing between Christianity and Mohammedanism, had developed into a wild hatred, which only waited for a favorable opportunity to destroy its victims. This opportunity came when the Russians had left Urmiah. Like wild beasts, the Persians, reinforced by the Mohammedan Kurds, fell upon the defenseless Christians wherever they found them. Men, women and children were slaughtered by the thousands, and the sufferings and shame to which the women especially were exposed are indescribable. Hundreds of girls were dragged away into bondage, in which they are still languishing today.

NOT the least among the sufferers were the Lutheran congregations, especially the one in Gogtapa. Here several thousand Christians had gathered. Immediately upon the first attack of their enemies, a large number of Lutherans sought safety in flight, among them the aged pastor. These refugees were captured by their savage enemies; some were killed, while others, and especially the women, were maltreated so terribly that subsequently the most of them died in the American mission at Urmiah. An old pastor, in his flight, was robbed of his clothing, thrown into a ditch, and clubbed in the most brutal manner. His enemies then fell upon other victims and left him alone, and he managed to extricate himself and to continue his flight. Finally he reached the city (Urmiah) and found his family in the house of a Mohammedan lady, where they had sought refuge.

About two thousand souls had been unable to escape from the village of Gogtapa. They all gathered in a church, from the roof of which the young men tried to repel the attacks of the enemy. But fire, which first broke out in the Lutheran church and then in all parts of the village, told them that the enemy was already in possession of the place. They now confined themselves to the attempt to keep the invaders out of the church. While the enemy advanced upon the sacred edifice from all sides, the woeful wailing of the women and children in the interior of the church robbed their defenders of the last remnant of courage. Already the ammunition was giving out, and the darkness of night was upon them. In abject terror they expected every moment that the enemy would force the entrance to the building and begin the slaughter.

Suddenly, at the last moment, like a messenger from heaven, came the rescuer. Dr. Packard, the physician of the American mission, had heard of the plight of the Christians at Gogtapa, and at the risk of his own life had come to help them. He had the courage to make his way to the chiefs of the Kurds and prevailed upon them to desist from continuing the onslaught. Waving the American flag in his hand, he hurried to inform the Christians of his presence. When they recognized the flag they gave up shooting, and Dr. Packard was allowed to enter the church. With unspeakable joy those who had given up hope now welcomed assurance of safety. On Dr. Packard's plea the Christians were given permission to make their way to the city (Urmiah), on the condition, however, that they leave their weapons and all their belongings in the village in the hands of the Kurds. Passing through the rows of Kurds bristling with weapons, they reached the city in safety and found shelter in the American mission station. But within the next few weeks most of them died of hunger and privation, and as a result of the terror they had experienced. Thus a large part of the congregation of the Lutheran native pastor perished.

Your Sort of Tire

Consider the requisites for an ideal automobile tire—the quality of materials needed, the expert construction, the type of labor, and the manufacturing equipment necessary to weld them effectively together.

Beside these, consider the factors that have part in the making of every Goodyear Tire—the care spent in choosing materials, the experience behind their construction, the skill of Goodyear workmen, and the great factories in which they labor.

We believe you will find the two—the ideal and the real—astonishingly in alignment.

We believe you will find Goodyear Tires to come nearer your wish in all things, than you believed possible.

We build them to embody all goodness that we are able to command through our vast organization and improved practice.

We build them to serve in a manner befitting a product on which is staked the present success and future development of a great institution.

Through intensified factory method, and nationally effective distribution, we are able to market them at a price companioning economy with satisfaction.

Now and henceforward Goodyear Tires should be on your car—by every reason of efficiency and value.

Goodyear Tires, Heavy Tourist Tubes and "Tire Saver" Accessories are easy to get from Goodyear Service Station Dealers everywhere.

The "Open Door" Shops — Yo

IF YOU COULD VISIT US at Lansing an spend a day or a week going through thi big 40-acre factory, you'd learn more abou Reo quality than we can ever hope to te you in Reo advertisements.

FIRST, YOU'D GET ACQUAINTED wit us Reo Folk—and we think you'd say afte a visit that this organization is sincere an earnest in its desire to make, not the most but the best automobiles and motor truck

THEN WE'D SHOW YOU through the splen did Reo laboratories where the Reo chem ists and metallurgists analyze and develo and finally test all metals that go into Reo

THESE LABORATORIES are unsurpasse by any in this industry—excelled by few, i any, in the world, in point of equipment an thoroughness of results.

OF COURSE YOU'D MEET the Reo engi neers and body designers; and you'd fin them not poring over new models, but seek ing to bring to a point still nearer perfection those Reo models that are already standard

THEN YOU'D UNDERSTAND what now i so difficult to credit—the wonderful lon gevity and the low up-keep cost of Reos.

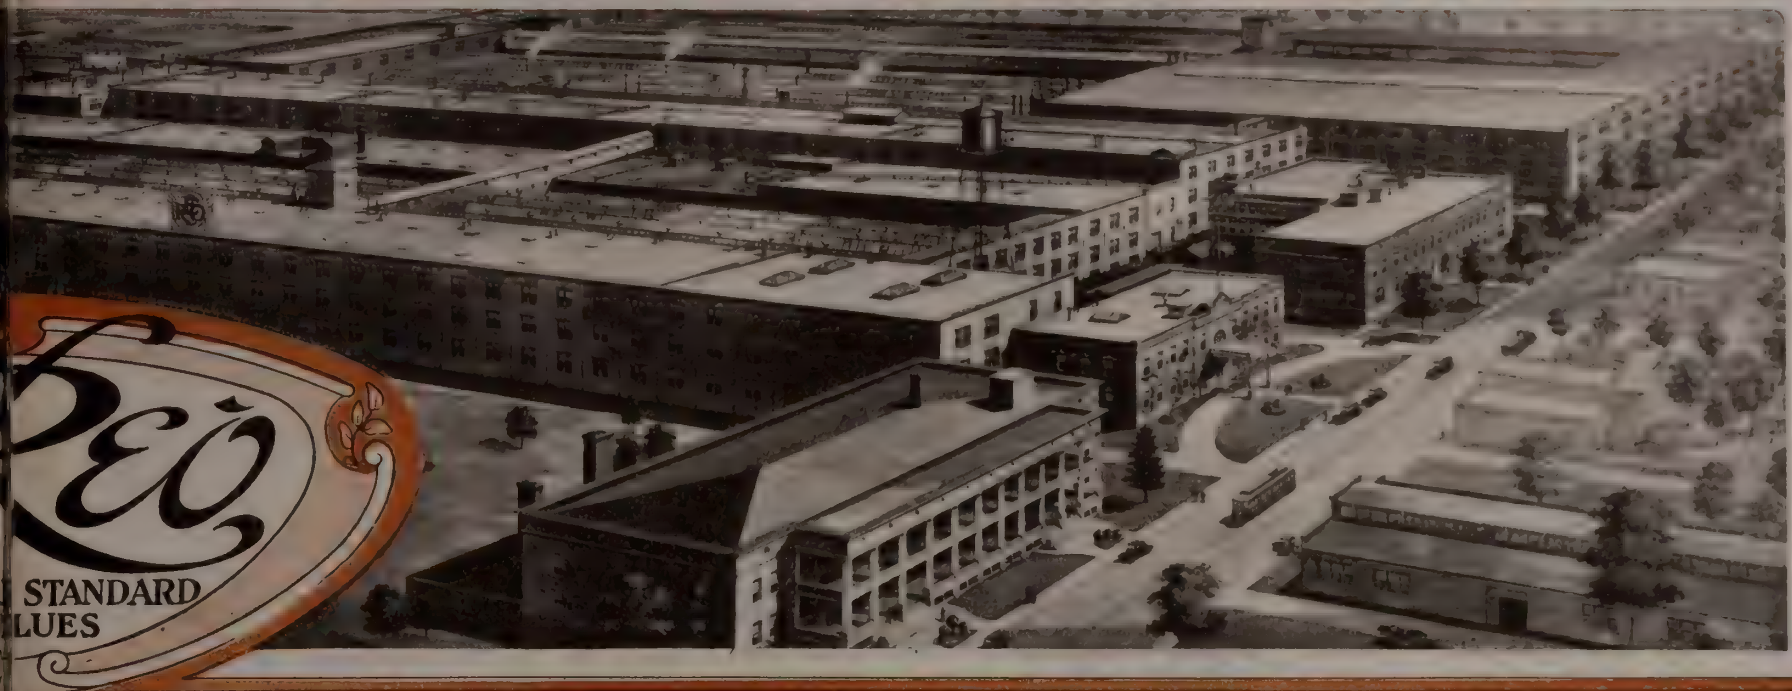
PROPOUND ANY QUESTION you like t these engineers and in the reply you'll fin food for thought—and you'll agree that Re engineering is sound engineering.

THEN IF YOU HAD TIME we'd take yo through the entire plant—all units shown i the picture. It's about a six-mile walk if yo go down every aisle and see every operation

AND EVERY FOOT OF THE WAY you' find something interesting, something t approve—something that would indicate t you the quality that is Reo.

BUT IF YOU HADN'T more than a day t spend we'd show you only the major opera tions—and you'd see some modern miracle of manufacturing.

REO MOTOR CAR COM



FOUNDATION OF REO QUALITY

You Are Always Welcome

WE CANNOT IMAGINE a more profitable day, or a more instructive ten days, than you could spend here in the Reo plants.

FOR YOU'D LEARN, not only how good automobiles and dependable motor trucks are made, but you'd appreciate as never before, what tremendous strides have been made in the past few years in the allied sciences of metallurgy and of manufacturing.

COME ANY TIME—you are cordially invited. Make the visit whenever best suits your own convenience—for we Reo Folk are always here—always the same—and always glad to meet any Reo owner or prospective owner.

FOR, BY THE WAY, the Reo Motor Car Company is owned and manned by home folk—Lansing folk. No absentee directors control this business.

ANY PROBLEM, no matter how vital or how trifling, can be and is, decided right here—and on the moment. The directors can be called into conference in five minutes.

PERHAPS that's another reason for Reo quality, Reo success. We think so.

THE FIRST IS Good Intent. Then comes Experience—oldest in the industry. Next, Intelligence—we may modestly claim this in the light of our success.

THEN FACTORY FACILITIES, second to none which enable us to make every part according to the specifications and up to the standard set by Reo engineers.

AND FINALLY (or shall we reverse the order?) the fact that we can and do decide all questions right here and without red tape or delay.

COME AND SEE US. The latchstring is always out.

Jesus Saves from Sin

The International Sunday School Lesson for March 18
John 8 : 12, 28-37, 56-59 (Temperance Lesson)

By GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

AS friends and teachers of boys and girls we have a great chance to make the setting of the seventh and eighth chapters of John take hold of their imaginations, as it certainly did with the children of long ago. The Feast of Booths combined the joyous appeal of Fourth of July, Thanksgiving time and camping out. It was national, reminiscent of the pioneer days, of the journey through the wilderness, of the nomadic period. It was religious, commemorating not only the leading of God long ago but the divine care in providing another harvest. And how eagerly the children must have entered into the week's festivities, when every family erected its little shack or leanto of brush and branches, and rich and poor alike camped out like the forefathers. Your Boy Scout will enjoy a sympathetic presentation of this feature of ancient Jewish life. He too is trying to imitate the hardy pioneers and the Christian virtues they incarnated so signally.

Symbolic Teaching of the Last Day

ON the last, the great day of the feast, two interesting ceremonies had become the climactic feature of the Feast of Tabernacles. The first was the morning processional of pilgrims from all parts of the nation, who followed the priests from the temple to the pool of Siloam. There a golden vessel from the sanctuary was filled with water and brought back amid scenes of rejoicing, as a memorial of God's provision of springs in the desert for the chosen people whom Moses brought out of Egypt. The second beautiful symbol was the lighting of the four golden candelabra in the Court of Women as twilight deepened, as a memorial of the pillar of fire that led the host to Sinai. Thus the symbols of guidance and of refreshment became the message of the Jewish thanksgiving season.

Christ seems to have felt at once the power of the message and the lack of real appreciation and help from it for the multitude. He saw that for them it was an echo of the long ago. God had been with Moses and the fathers, and therein they rejoiced. That God had raised up a greater man than Moses, and had living water and eternal light for them, was beyond their wildest hopes. Jesus could not refrain from giving the people this glad tidings. As the golden pitcher passed by he cried, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." When the lamps of the outer court were lighted up, he said again to his disciples and to all the Jews, "I am the light of the world· he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."

If Jesus could make these truths real to the woman of Samaria and to the humble Galileans, surely we can bring them with saving power to our youth of today. How dark the path is without the light by which Christians walk! How many the pitfalls in the way! And how great then the need that sin should be shown to be exceeding sinful and the way of escape made plain!

Freedom in the Truth

HERE is the great watchword of Christian liberty: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." But this applies only to those who are truly his disciples, learners in the school of Christ, teachable people whose minds and hearts are open to the truth as it is in Jesus. They must abide in his word, accepting it and seeking to enter into all its manifold application to the problems of our life. Too often, when heeded at all, his word on vital issues is explained away.

The Bondage of Sin. Jesus goes on to say that every sinner is a slave. Yet, alas! every wayward boy and girl imagine themselves cutting loose from restrictions. Satan lures with a will-of-the-wisp of liberty into the brazen chains of bad habits and physical limitations.

The poor prodigal left his father's fair estate for a larger liberty, free from all the restraints of a good home. Yet how soon he found himself a swineherd, not even free to eat the husks he had to strew before the pigs! We have acted out in our school the bondage of habit by binding a boy with cotton thread. He is free to take a turn or two from the spool and then break loose again. But in a surprisingly short time the teacher can bind his arms fast to his side with the little strands. Like Samson (Judges 16 : 20) he thinks, "I will go out as at other times and shake myself free." Instead he finds himself a prisoner. We have had many lads who imagine they can stop smoking cigarettes, but the poisonous little tubes have enfeebled the will already. We have had our full-grown men who are slaves of drink. Again and again, hating themselves and despising their shameful indulgence, they have resolved to be free men once more. But the chains hold.

The Personal Liberty Fiction

JUST now there is being raised a great hue and cry about "personal liberty" in many of our states. It is a device of those who profit by the sale of drink to delude their victims into a false conception of freedom. In reality, they are claiming that it is un-American to suppress the manufacture and sale of this kind of poison on the ground that we must safeguard the freedom of our boys to become drunkards if they so desire. Unfortunately many young fellows think it a sign of manly freedom to be "able to take a drink or two and stop." They do not see the higher character involved in a determination to set an example of total abstinence to the weaker brother.

There is a good story told of Lincoln, that applies here. Several men were endeavoring to prove their strength by lifting a keg of whisky high enough to drink from the bung. The sturdy railsplitter lifted the keg up above his head, brought the spigot near his mouth, and then put the thing down on the floor, remarking, "And I'm strong enough not to drink a drop!" The tale is good enough to be true and fits well with what we know of the great President as a member of one of the early temperance organizations, the Washington Society, and the writer and signer of a temperance pledge. The man who signs and keeps a pledge is a great deal freer than the poor slave who cannot get by the swinging doors of the saloon on his way home from work.

False Reliances

THE Jews replied to Jesus that they were Abraham's descendants and therefore freemen. But he knew full well that birth and social prestige are no guarantees of freedom from the vilest slavery to sin. So many think that their birth, education and standing exempt them from the deceit and mockery of King Alcohol. In that mournful crew of derelicts on the Bowery are many men of finest lineage and culture. But body and mind and good name have passed under a curse.

There is just one safe reliance which we can endorse today. The only man who is safe from alcohol is the man who does not touch it!

The ranks of moderate drinkers are filing into the chain-gang of the drunkards.

Medical science and business administration agree that any indulgence piles up the risks.

But how about the man who is already in bondage, who has already fallen into the power of the demon? How about the man who finds that he cannot stop? Or the poor victim in the gutter?

Jesus saves..

Occasional "cures" are successful, but even these need the supplementary ministry of faith. For the vast majority of drinkers nothing but the power of God in Jesus will suffice. There is no form of bondage of sin from which more remarkable salvation has been wrought. The classic stories of the Rescue Missions are being repeated continually. One hideously degraded woman visited one of our New York missions again and again in filth and drunkenness. Yet at last she has been reclaimed, and I feel that I must go over there just to see how she looks and to hear her speak, because I did not believe such a creature could be born again. Having seen her in the power of Satan I want to see her free in Christ.

How Does Jesus Save?

Well, that is one of the deep questions of the theologians. But does it not seem that he puts a new purpose in the heart, supplies a new and vital interest in the life? Converted drunkards are most successful when they devote themselves aggressively to Christian work, are "filled with the Spirit" instead of drunken with wine. The spirit of life in Christ Jesus sets them free from the law of sin and death.

The Deceitfulness of Sin

JESUS called Satan a liar and the father of lies. His greatest ally, strong drink, is so universally known to be deceitful that it is truer than ever that "whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."

Beer is liquid Bread is the printed lie in a newspaper before me as I write. Dr. Woods Hutchinson says: "The myth of its food value was exploded long ago."

"Good wine and good fellowship can still be used as a slogan for a drinking resort, though more quarrels have come from the wine than from any other source.

Alcohol promises warmth when you are cold and decreases your resistance; result, pneumonia. It offers you coolness in August with equal plausibility; result, sunstroke. It promises comradeship, but is the chief cause of actual murder. It livens up the mind, but does so at the sacrifice of judgment and the higher and finer nature. As Vance Thompson says so strongly, "Alcohol first attacks—first, mark you, and not last—the highest part of man, his moral nature. Do not imagine that this pleasurable bodily glow and well-being of distended bloodvessels which make for a fatuous kind of altruism has anything to do with character. By just so much character is impaired. The moral standards sag and sway. The drinking man has let down the bars."

The Higher Freedom

WHILE this is our temperance lesson, we must not lose the wider application of Christianity as true liberty. Our scholars are in danger of thinking of religion in terms of thou shalt not. They are apt to chafe under a sense of limitation. Let us put forth strongly the positive things, the joyous opportunities. Let us show the Christian life to be the larger life. For the things we may gladly and freely enjoy are so many and so wholesome and so good that we should never miss the little unworthy, nasty things that some waste their time upon.

The "No trespassing" signs in the Bible are to keep us from falling into pits or encountering treacherous wild beasts. The freedom of our Father's House is ours. There are many mansions even here below. Realm upon realm of discovery, of innocent joy, of glad service are before us. A Christian should be the freest and the happiest creature in the world.

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

The Question Box

QUESTION. I am very desirous of inaugurating in my school a series of daily Bible readings on the part of our pupils, with some plan or series of references for them which will be suitable and will be likely to ensure a successful continuation of the work. A. S. D.

ANSWER. The Bible Picture Contest of the Christian Herald is a fine plan for stimulating Bible reading and research on the part of children.

You are familiar, of course, with the daily Bible-reading plan in connection with the International Uniform Lesson. You should also investigate the daily Bible research work graded to the ages of pupils in connection with the International Graded Lessons.

Another good plan for the year is to use the Three Fold Cord, a little pocket booklet published by the American Tract Society, and which contains a precept, a promise and a prayer for each day of the year.

With the scholars it is important to stimulate their daily reading of the Bible by special incentives. This is done in the Graded Lessons by the teachers starring the home work of the pupil in the scholar's book. In my school we issued a quarterly blank to the pupils for the daily Scripture reading. The scholar marked a cross on the blank for each day's readings, and this blank, countersigned by the parent or teacher, was brought in at the end of the quarter and an honor certificate given for perfect work.

One of the very best plans I know of to promote the daily readings at home and also to encourage the parents to introduce family worship in the home has been in operation for many years in the Coatesville Presbyterian Sunday School of Coatesville, Pa., of which Mr. William H. Ridgway, who writes The Busy Men's Corner of the Sunday School Times, was the superintendent. This school provides for each of the scholars and for any one in the community who will follow the plan a set of Family Bible Readings printed on cardboard for each Sunday of the quarter, these readings bearing upon the lessons used in the Sunday school. The readings for the week beginning March 19, 1917, are indicated as follows:

FAMILY BIBLE READING
Beginning March 19, 1917

MONDAY	John 1 : 1–14
TUESDAY	John 1 : 35–49
WEDNESDAY	John 3 : 5–17
THURSDAY	John 4 : 43–54
FRIDAY	John 6 : 1–14
SATURDAY	John 8 : 12, 31–37, 56–58
SUNDAY	John 14 : 1–14

Attached to the above is a coupon which reads,

"I have read, or had read to me, all of above passages."

This coupon is to be signed by the scholar and returned each week or month to the superintendent of Bible readings, and at the end of the year Mr. Ridgway gives for each perfect record a unique souvenir which is prized by all who receive it and becomes a good advertiser for the school.

On the reverse of the Family Bible reading card are the following very important suggestions to parents and others to induce them to take up the Bible readings for themselves or to read them aloud to the children. The suggestions follow:

DO EVERYTHING you can to encourage this daily Bible Reading habit we are trying to instill into your children. Men and women who have a habit of reading God's word every day rarely go very far astray. You cannot do a better thing for your children than to help them into this habit. The passages should be read every day in the family circle. Select a convenient time and stick to it. After supper is done, before leaving the table, is a good time. Sometimes you can do the reading. Always read them aloud.

In the case of the smaller children, some one must read to them and sign the name of the child.

You do not need to be a member of the Sunday School to join the reading. Get the cards brought to you, and sign and send them in.

The object of this Bible Reading is to introduce into the homes of church members something in the way of family worship. Get used to hearing your own voice reading Scripture aloud. To offer prayer is but a short step further. You know you ought to have family prayers. Here is a chance to make a beginning.

We invite you to visit the Sunday School whenever you can. You will find it a good one, and we will be delighted to see you.

The Long-Life Record

HUDSON SUPER-SIX

Will Hold First Place Forever We Believe

One year of the Super-Six seems to mark it the permanent leading type. Many other sensations had their day and departed. But the Super-Six gains prestige every month. And it comes too close to a perfect motor to ever be far excelled.

For your own sake, don't get a wrong conception of the Hudson Super-Six.

It is a Six, but not like other Sixes. This basic invention, controlled by our patents, added 80 per cent to our six-type efficiency.

It does, in a better, simpler way, what we attempted in our Eights and Twelves. For we built those types for testing, as did others, when the seeming trend was that way.

This Problem Solved

The Super-Six gets its wondrous power, speed and endurance by minimizing friction.

That's what every type attempted. That's why men once thought that V-types would supersede the Six. Vibration causes friction, and friction causes wear. And the type which brings vibration lowest will hold first place forever, just as now.

The Super-Six is that type. Every block test proves it. And a hundred road records confirm it. It now holds every worth-while record of endurance and speed for a stock car.

Another Possible Error

Some men still tell Hudson dealers that our records show qualities not wanted. They cannot use such speed, such power. "And other cars are good-enough hill-climbers."

But you must presume we know that.

We have not increased our motor size. We are using a small, light Six—exactly the size we used before this invention. And a size now very common.

The Super-Six principle gets from that size all of this extra efficiency. It does it by saving friction. Would you have less speed, less power in a motor, because of more friction and wear?

To Double Endurance

The Super-Six was invented to double endurance. That it makes the car a record-breaker is simply incidental.

The records we value most are long distance records. Under sanction of the Contest Board of the American Automobile Association the Super-Six broke the 24-hour stock chassis record by 328 miles. And in the famous non-stock Pike's Peak Hill Climb, sanctioned by the Contest Board of the American Automobile Association, a Super-Six Special made the best time through endurance.

A Super-Six Touring Car twice broke the Transcontinental record in one continuous 7,000-mile round trip. All Super-Six speed records have been made because of endurance.

It Offers You This

It offers you a car which, by a hundred records, is the most capable car in the world.

It offers you endurance, far beyond any previous attainment.

It offers you pride of ownership—the feeling that you rule the road. The knowledge that yours is the greatest car in performance that's built.

It offers you beauty and luxury which make the car look its supremacy.

It offers you, in our latest models, a wonderful gasoline saver.

Will you want a car which offers less when you buy a car to keep?

Questions and Answers

MRS. H. J. M., Nicholville, N. Y. Does God answer prayer for those who have gone so far wrong that they themselves do not seem to desire or care anything about leading a better life?

Yes, God does answer prayer for such, however unworthy they may seem, if the prayer be the expression of the sincere desire of a righteous heart. We are distinctly told (see James 5 : 16) that "the prayer of the righteous availeth much." Many who were leading lives of sin have been led into the light through the prayers of God's people in their behalf. There is no one fallen so low that he has got beyond the reach of Divine grace and mercy. For such a one as you describe, we should pray that he might be awakened to realize his true condition and that his conscience might be quickened. You should find some means to take the message of reconciliation and forgiveness to him, if not doing it personally, then enlisting the aid of some good Christian who would be glad to take it up as a part of his service for the Master, who told us to search out the highways and byways for the outcasts. We have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

S. H. L., Pa.: One who is distressed and anxious about sin and forgiveness may be certain that he has not sinned beyond redemption. What you are experiencing are the strivings of the Holy Spirit, who is still drawing you to repentance and ultimate reconciliation and forgiveness. It would be well, however, to take counsel with your own pastor, and to tell him all about your troubles, if you feel led to do so. You will find this most helpful. (See James 5 : 16). We have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

Anxious Mother, Turtle Creek, La. Every attack on the authenticity of the Bible has fallen flat. Old records on lately discovered monuments, tablets excavated in Bible lands after centuries of burial and recently deciphered, corroborate in many remarkable ways its historical records. The masters of secular knowledge regard the Bible as unapproachable in its high standard of expression, its magnificent imagery, the authority with which it appeals to the hearts of men and as bearing within itself the evidence of inspiration. Many of the ablest of men, not professing to be active Christians, have paid tribute to the Bible, crediting it with attributes that are only possible to the Word of One higher than all else. Napoleon gave this tribute: "The Bible contains a complete series of acts and of historical rule to explain time and eternity, such as no other religion has to offer. The more I consider the Gospel, the more I am assured that there is nothing there which is not beyond the march of events and above the human mind." Matthew Arnold says: "To the Bible men will return because they cannot do without it The true God is and must be preeminently the God of the Bible, the Eternal, who makes for righteousness, from whom Jesus came forth, and whose Spirit governs the course of humanity." Gladstone called it "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture."

H. J. S., London. There is no contradiction in the verses you mention. It is true that, from the account of Jacob's vision (Gen. 32 : 30); of Moses' and Aaron's experience (Ex. 24 : 10, 11); of the account of the proceedings on Mount Sinai, and of Isaiah's vision (Isa. 6 : 5), it might be inferred that the holy men of old had seen God face to face. But we must ever consider the peculiarity of Hebrew expression, and its employment of imagery and similitudes by which the writers desired to convey a strong mental perception of the immediate Presence. Several New Testament and Old Testament passages, notably Deut. 4 : 15 and John 1 : 18, clearly claim that no mortal ever saw God face to face, except, of course, his manifestation in Christ.

Reader, Mexico Ky. According to the accepted interpretation of Mark 10 : 9, as compared with Matt. 5 : 32, the so-called statutory grounds for divorce—that is, involving moral turpitude—are the only acceptable ones. But when the laws of a state or of a country allow other grounds, the individual conscience must be the guide as to whether or not the freedom so offered is to be accepted.

A Subscriber. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved" is the Gospel message. This you now do, as you state in your letter. Hold fast to that belief and pray that your faith may be increased. The enemy of souls loves to worry faint-hearted Christians and puts all kinds of doubts and fears into their minds. But do not let these disturb you. You have the Lord's promise to be with you and strengthen you in trials and temptations. We would advise you to connect with some form of practical Christian work. In helping others, you will find your own faith grow very strong day by day.

Old Subscriber. Please explain John 1: 25. Who is the prophet mentioned therein?

The Jews in general had been concerned about the position of John the Baptist in relation to their national hope of deliverance through the Messiah who, according to their belief, was to come to free them and lead them out of bondage. When John came, and, though doing great works, disclaimed any identity with Christ or Elijah, they were perplexed, as they had expected him to proclaim himself the "prophet who was to come," namely, the Messiah.

F. A. J., Cartersville, Ga. Suppose you should have secret enemies who sought to do you harm, what course would you pursue?

Follow Christ's teaching in the Beatitudes, "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you" (Matt. 5 : 44). Being a child of God you should not fear lest they try to do you harm basing your strength and defense on God's own Word (Ps. 91): "I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress; my God, in him will I trust." "He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust." "For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways." Is there an enemy so powerful that he can overcome such a defense as this?

H. P. McGregor, Minn. There is nothing in Christ's teaching to warrant the belief that anything more is required than sincere acceptance of him as Saviour. Did he not promise the thief on the cross immediate entrance into paradise? Did he not say, "Be not afraid, only believe" (Mark 5 : 36)? Do not allow any one to confound you. It is our duty, however, to persevere in the Christian life, and not only to do the works meet for repentance but to make our lives, from day to day, more and more acceptable and Christlike. Our gratitude for salvation is a debt we cannot repay, but the man or woman who makes no progress after conversion and who does not strive by all means to win others would miss the greatest joy in this life. Besides, working for Christ will strengthen your own faith, purify and bless your life, and endow it with a fulness and soul-satisfaction that nothing else can give. Remember also that "faith without works is dead," and a Christian who sits with folded hands and takes no part in the great work of advancing the Kingdom would be an anomaly indeed.

Mrs. I. P., Mexico, N. Y., would like some reader of this paper to send the address of Millard M. Haskell to the Christian Herald for her.

W. E. S., Charles City, Va. Will you please answer in the Mail-Bag why Servia is called Serbia and Roumania Rumania since the war, and if the latter way is correct why were they not called so before the war?

The name Serbia is more correct, as it is derived from the name of the people, who are called Serbs. The new spelling had been coming into favor before the war. The spelling Rumania expresses the sound of the name. The ou is the French mode of expressing the same sound as the u of the new spelling. The Serbians, as also the Russians, Bulgarians and some others, and formerly the Rumanians, do not use our alphabet, and the names of places in those countries have to be spelled in our letters by sound. That accounts for the various spellings of places in the war news, as different writers choose different spellings to express the same sound.

B. E. P. What you describe seems to be very much like gambling. The lure of chance, the promise of reaping big profits for a slight investment, have led many to realize the worry and the wickedness of the race for sudden riches. To understand just how many are led away by this evil fascination one need only know that even today many who, a week or two ago, counted themselves rich have been stripped of their wealth by the downward plunge of war stocks in the market. Gambling is a vice which every well-balanced man, and especially every Christian, should shun. Besides, the Good Book tells us that riches that come by any other means than those that are lawful and righteous bring no blessing.

Mrs. E., Nebraska. Anything that would tend to commercialize God's house is unscriptural. We have always held that many of the money-making expedients that are resorted to by churches, if employed at all, should be held elsewhere than in the church itself. Buying and selling are altogether out of place (see John 2 : 14–17). Church members who have a proper realization of their duty and privileges as such should be willing to give a sufficiency for the needs of the church without any other stimulation than the knowledge that they are aiding in the advancement of the Lord's work by so doing. We would cast no reflection, however, on any legitimate efforts to arouse enthusiasm and generosity. There are many ways to do this without turning the church itself into a "house of merchandise."

C. F., Richmond, Ind. The spirit of Christ dwelling in the heart will glorify the homeliest features and brighten the humblest life. Some of the finest Christians we have known, including not a few who have done noble work in the service of Christ have been homely men and women; yet they exerted a power and inspired a confidence among all with whom they came in touch. "Beauty," says an old maxim, "is but skin deep," but beauty of soul and strength of Christian character give a dignity and power to their possessor that no physical charms can equal.

Reader, Angola, Ind. You do right in taking God at his word on the promises, and also in associating yourself with others in practical Christian work. Pray that he may increase your faith. Doubts come from the tempter, and you should pray for strength to overcome these doubts when they assail you. You remember that when Christian was passing through the Valley of Humiliation he was assailed on all sides, yet he knew very well that there was an unseen Power that was guiding and protecting him at every step, and that all the darts and missiles could not hurt him. So it will be with you if every time you are tempted you ask for strength in the name of Him who said, "I will be with you alway," and with such a consolation you need not fear. We are sending your letter to the Prayer League.

H. C. P., Spokane, Wash. We are not to judge others. The very fact that a man prays, no matter what kind of man he may have been, is a sign to us that something divine has touched even his heart, and we should look at it as a sign of hope. It is unfortunately true that there are men who have amassed great wealth by oppressing the poor, but riches so obtained can bring no blessing. (See Prov. 22 : 6.) We should not envy such men, but rather pity them, for they are working for nothing. If in their religious profession they are assuming virtues they do not possess, they can find no joy, but the reverse, in such pretensions. Sooner or later they must account for their stewardship, whether it has been good or evil.

D. H. B., Hanover, Pa. 1. Miriam, at the time she watched her infant brother when exposed on the Nile, is believed to have been probably ten or twelve years old. 2. There has been considerable discussion concerning the practicability of observing the Passover on such a scale as is indicated in Exodus 12th chapter. One class of critics holds that as the people were approximately 2,000,000 in number, it would have required 150,000 male lambs one year old to meet the need, while others have pointed out that, besides the fact that among the Israelites there were large numbers of children, women, invalids and others who did not partake of the Passover, and also that a very small portion, indeed a mere fragment, would suffice for those who were entitled to partake on so solemn an occasion, 15,000 lambs would have been ample. Besides, the sacrifice was not confined to lambs alone, but goats were permitted to be taken (see Ex. 12 : 5).

B. F. S., Plainfield, N. J. The passage, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up," which occurs in Ps. 69 : 9, must be interpreted in connection with the spirit of the preceding verses. The psalmist is telling of his afflictions, which he has suffered through his devotion to God's cause, and he prays that the reproach put upon him may be lifted—the reproach which has caused his nearest friends to become estranged. His zeal for the honor of God's house and his intense desire to serve him had been in his heart like a consuming fire, and had aroused the enmity of the ungodly against him, and made him the object of their mockery and contempt.

M. W., New York City. The United States government puts the new money into circulation in two ways: by giving it to the banks in return for the older issues, and by giving it to the public, which calls at the sub-treasuries for it.

Mrs. R. W. DeW., San Francisco. The question of the popular preference as between the Authorized and Revised Versions of the Bible will take another generation, or possibly even longer, to settle. To the Bible student and the teacher and preacher, both are necessary; and it is well understood that the Revised Version is superior in accuracy of translation. The Christian Herald uses both. It cannot be denied, however, that for beauty and dignity of expression the Authorized Version is still preferred by many readers.

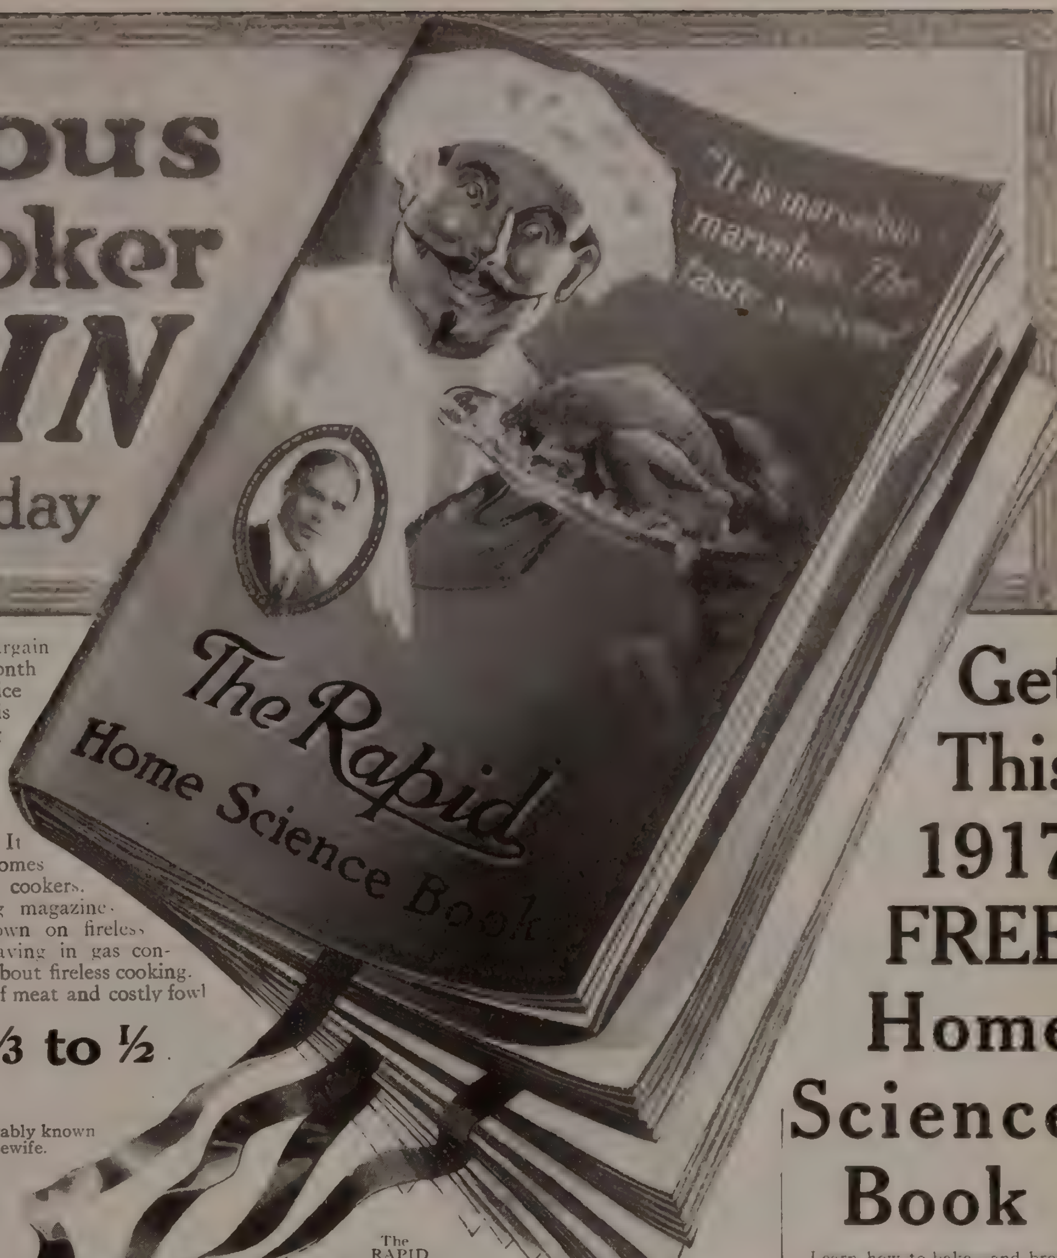
Tremendous Fireless Cooker BARGAIN

Mail Coupon To-day

"I Personally Guarantee Your Money Back if Not Satisfied"—
Wm. Campbell, Pres.

SEND your name and address on the Bargain Coupon below—or by Post Card. This month I am making a special personal bargain price on my famous RAPID Fireless Cooker. This is the Biggest Bargain Price Offer I am making this season.

No woman can get along without a fireless cooker today and keep house on a money-saving basis. This fact is demonstrated in the schools by Domestic Science teachers. It is found true in hundreds of thousands of homes where meals are regularly prepared in fireless cookers. It is urged in special articles in the leading magazines and newspapers. The gas companies are down on fireless cookers. Why? Because of the enormous saving in gas consumption. The grocers and butchers keep quiet about fireless cooking. Why? Because the folks who cook by fireless don't have to buy expensive cuts of meat and costly fowl



It is marvelous marvelous. The taste

My Bargain Price Saves ⅓ to ½ If You Order Now

No other cooker has won more fame than the RAPID. No other cooker is more favorably known throughout America and Europe or more strongly recommended from housewife to housewife. Low factory price and perfect cooking results make people choose the Rapid. 160,000 are in use today. Why pay more than the factory price? You can't add a single improvement to the Rapid that will make it do better work. And on top of the regular low direct factory price I am having this month this Bargain Sale to give you a chance to get your cooker at a price lower than you expected to pay. I can save you enough money on your cooker to make it an object for you to write me today. And I offer you the most standard, clean built, durable cooker possible to buy. This is the tenth season the Rapid has demonstrated its great usefulness and economy in the American home. Don't fail to write today for my Special Bargain Price and save ⅓ to ½ regular price.

Learn how to bake—and brown—meats, vegetables, desserts—everything a crisp, delicious brown "by Fireless." How to fry, boil, stew, roast—all inside the cooker—one operation. Odors and heat cannot escape. The kitchen keeps sweet and cool in summer. The Rapid is sanitary, compact, convenient—special casters to roll under table out of way. This book shows letters of scores of customers telling how the Rapid has cut their gas bills down 75%. It takes 4 hours to boil ham—only 30 minutes with the Rapid. 3 hours for roast beef—only 15 minutes with the Rapid. No watching or care. Food cannot burn, spoil or waste. A boon in preserving time and such an improvement in taste of all preserves. Gives more time and leisure to every woman—freedom from the hot kitchen work that undermines health and temper.

The RAPID Fireless Cooker is soundly made of aluminum and steel, absolutely fireproof. One Rapid will last any family a lifetime—used constantly to cook three meals a day. There is nothing about it to rust, warp or wear out. It is steam-proof and rust-proof. There are no ledges, valves, locks or patented complications. The Rapid is the simplest cooker as well as the most practical to make. Splendidly equipped with extra size cooking outfit of the well-known "WEAR-EVER" Aluminum cooking utensils made to our order without seams or ledges so as to be the easiest cleaned utensils the housewife can have. Also a special cake and pie rack—all free—nothing extra to buy. Heavy aluminum sheets form the lining of all cooking compartments and covers—pure aluminum which cannot rust or corrode. Aluminum transmits the heat from the bottom of the utensil up the sides and over the top so that the contents receive the cooking heat uniformly from all sides—hence the extra speed in cooking with a RAPID.

Every part of the interior of my Rapid Fireless Cooker is made of pure aluminum—the famous "Wear-Ever" brand

PURE

The Guardian of the Oat Dish

None But the Big, Rich, Flavory Grains Go Into Quaker Oats

Why is Quaker Oats, the world around, the dish of the connoisseurs?

Because it is flaked from the queen oats.

Because all the little oats—starved and insipid—are barred from this premier brand.

Because every flake is luscious. The flavor and aroma give it vast distinction.

It makes a winning dish. Children delight in it. So they get a wealth of this nitrogenous, vim-creating food.

Isn't that your idea of an oat dish?

If it is, be sure you get it. It costs no extra price. Any grocer will supply it if you specify Quaker Oats.

Quaker Oats

The Vim-Food Luxury

Oats contain over 16 per cent of nitrogenous protein—the most costly element in food.

They are rich in phosphorus and lecithin, which are brain and nerve constituents.

They are energizing, spirit-giving, and a perfect food for growth. That is why oats stand foremost as a child's food. But older people never cease to need the vitalizing oat.

10c and 25c per package
Except in Far West and South

An Aluminum Cooker for $1.00

Made to our order, extra large and heavy, to cook Quaker Oats in the ideal way. Send us our trademarks—the picture of the Quaker—cut from the fronts of five Quaker Oats packages, or an affidavit showing the purchase of five packages of Quaker Oats. Send $1.00 with the trademarks or affidavit, and this ideal cooker will be sent to you by parcel post prepaid. We require the trademarks or affidavit as assurance that you are a user of Quaker Oats. The trademarks have no redemption value. This offer applies to United States and Canada. We supply only one cooker to a family.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

WHEN the servant of Elisha stood upon the housetop and looked at the Syrian hosts encamped against Samaria, he saw only enemies. But when Elisha had prayed and God had opened the young man's eyes, had given them spiritual vision, he saw the power of God revealed in the form of horses and chariots encompassing and protecting Samaria and the prophet of Jehovah. And we, when we seem to face disaster, may well pray the prophet's prayer and ask that our eyes may be opened that we may see upon the mountains the salvation of the Lord.

Just now the nation faces serious questions, the path of peace is beset with increasing difficulties, precedents and history seem crowding a reluctant people into an unwelcome conflict. May we not pray to the Father to open our eyes, to help us to see our way with greater insight than is given to the physical eye, to rightly appraise the spiritual values of the human relationships which have been welded in more than a century of peace and friendship, and to be just in our judgments and righteous in our decisions?

M. E. E. asks: "Can we not remember our President, to hold up his hands and take our country to God in prayer? I wish this prayer could circle the globe." The President needs, as no other man since Lincoln, the prayers of the people of God, and we are sure that he is reassured and strengthened by the knowledge that everywhere throughout the land prayer is being made for his guidance.

H. C. J., a Christian Herald reader for thirty years, rejoices in the goodness of God, who, having answered many prayers, has crowned his blessings with the saving from typhoid fever of their little granddaughter. She says: "I write this that others may take heart and pray more earnestly. The Prayer League has helped me very much to believe and find my God."

Mrs. M. L. B. sends gratified acknowledgment of prayer answered in restoration of health. She asks prayer that misunderstandings may be wiped out and that she may once more be happy in her own home, now broken up. She also asks prayer that her daughter may be cured of terrible sick-headaches, which recur so frequently that she cannot keep a position.

R. R. sends in the names of two new members of the Prayer League who, with herself, have organized a local branch which will meet regularly for prayer and study. They ask prayer for the conversion of two young men and a father who are out of Christ, and for whom they are praying.

C. W. B. thanks God for his wonderful saving power. He writes: "I want to let you know that the Saviour has greatly answered our prayer for a great revival at the United Brethren Church, Clarksburg, W. Va. He has wonderfully blessed the church."

Mr. and Mrs. M. F. L. thank God for answered prayer, and Mr. L. adds a request for prayer for the healing of his wife, who is an artist and has contracted lead poisoning from her work.

J. McK. asks prayer that she may be given the assurance that she is guided by the Spirit in a decision which she must soon make.

A wanderer, who says he is tired of being a sinner, asks prayer that he may secure a position, be united to his family, and live as a man of God, as he once did.

F. R. sends an earnest request for prayer. For a year he has been under financial stress, his prayer has been answered again and again. Now it is imperative that he should be able to make the final turn that will insure him a new start and he asks prayer that nothing may prevent the maturing of these plans. He writes, "I know that material prosperity is not the most important thing by any means, but as everything I have and perhaps my credit depends on this successful culmination, I am very anxious."

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Marcellus, Mich.; Devall Bluff, Ark.; La Canada, Calif.; Brickland, Mass.; Round Mountain, Ala.; Jackson, Miss.; Bisbee, Ariz.; Chesterville, Ind.; Nashville, Tenn.; Hartford, Conn.; Marting, W. Va.; Earlville, Ill.; New Berlin, Pa.; Raleigh, N. C.; Lynchburg, Va.; Lorena, Miss. ("pray for a great outpouring of God's Holy Spirit and a revival this year at home church, Gasque Chapel, here"); Ashland, Kan. ("that many souls may be saved during evangelistic campaign just opening in this town"); Elida, Ohio; ("pray for revivals at Marion class, United Brethren church here and High Street church at Lima, Ohio"); North Hadley, Mass. ("that the cottage prayer meeting may revive the work of our church,"); Valparaiso, Ind. ("pray for State wide Prohibition").

J. L. S., Huntington, Mo., asks prayer "that we may have a church in this community."

Three parents ask prayer that their sons' minds may be restored; Mrs. E. B. and Mrs. M. L. M. ask prayer that their mothers' minds may be restored: ten friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves, friends and relatives.

His Grateful Mother asks prayer that son's sight may be restored; Miss E. A. asks prayer that a friend's eye may be healed without an operation; a Reader, that mother's sight may be restored; nine friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves, friends or relatives.

Forty-four friends ask prayers for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

M. D. asks prayer to be cured of the liquor habit and become reconciled with wife.

Four parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; three wives, their husbands: Mrs. H. S. F. asks prayer that doctor may be cured of the liquor habit; seven, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

Mrs. G. E. C. asks prayer that son may be saved and treat his family kindly; twenty-three parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twenty-six wives, their husbands; fifty-two, for other relatives or friends.

Eleven readers ask prayer for special blessing for others.

Seventy-three ask prayer for the healing of friends and relatives, including Mrs. J. B. P., that daughter may be healed of cerebro-spinal meningitis; another, Mrs. G. N., that son may be cured of asthma; another, Mrs. I. H. C., that husband may be restored to health without an operation; fifty-nine friends ask prayer for healing for themselves, including Mrs. M. T., who asks prayer that the use of limbs may be restored; seven friends, for restoration of hearing for themselves or others, including Mrs. A. S. H., that daughter may be cured of chronic ear trouble.

Thirty-two friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Forty-three friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

M. T. M., Philadelphia, Pa.; Mrs. C. E. C., Eldred, Pa.; Mrs. S. H. W., Bound Brook, N. J.; His Grateful Mother, DuBois, Pa.; M. L., Somerville, N. J.; Mrs. C. M., Artesia, N. M.; L. T., Pierceton, Ind; Mrs. G. E. C., Delevan, N. Y.; Mrs. M. C., Bismarck, N. D.; Mrs. J. B. P., Fort Griffin, Texas; L. D. M., Rowland, N. C.; Mrs. M. H., Grooville, N. Y.; A. H. Pottsgrove, Pa.; J. L. P., Independence, Mo.; Mrs. S. L. S., West Philadelphia, Pa.; S. D., Toronto, Canada; Mrs. G. H. A., Garrison, Kan.; A. M. C., Dallas, Texas; E. M. P., Dunlap, Ill.; Mrs. M. E. W. R., Friendship, N. Y.; Mrs. E. M. H., Suffolk, Va.

PASTORS of churches, and superintendents of Sunday schools, Christian Endeavor and other organizations desiring to hear the wonderful story of John Goode from his own lips should send in their applications now, to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York. Mr. Goode is now speaking to church audiences in and around New York City. Churches in which he has spoken are enthusiastic at his straightforward testimony to the power of God to save sinners. His story inspires new faith in the redemption of the fallen; his message is a stirring appeal to every sinner. Churches should not fail to take advantage of this opportunity now, as in the coming months Mr. Goode's services will be in demand by the New York Evangelistic Committee.

Stuff o' Dreams

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

"DREAMS," said the ultra-modern hero of a book that I have just finished reading, "are only a sign that your dinner hasn't been properly digested!"

"When I think that I'm in love," a cynic remarked to me, "I always take a dyspepsia tablet. If it cures me I know that I'm not in love!"

"Fairies," a sophisticated tot of six told me the other day, "are not real. You can't see fairies! They're only make believe."

"Don't those lights look like magic?" I remarked to a man as we rode through the dusk. The lights in question were vague glimmering lights that were reflected from high up, mistily, in a river. "Aren't they wonderful?"

"It's probably," the man answered, "a railroad bridge."

ON the Fourteenth of February I went out to buy valentines. I like valentines, and I know some tiny children who wait eagerly for the postman on the fourteenth of February. The postman might disappoint them if— Well, I went out to buy valentines. The stationery store nearest to my office was the first one I entered. A dapper young clerk came forward to wait on me.

"I want," I told him, "same hearts!"

"Hearts?" the man questioned. He looked at me with a faintly surprised lift of the eyebrows. "Hearts?"

"Yes, hearts," I answered. "Red hearts. Large hearts. For valentines, you know!"

"Oh, yes," the clerk laughed. "I know what you mean! But we don't carry them in stock."

I visited five other stores before I could purchase large red hearts. "Why, we don't carry them!" I was told, at each of the five stores. And it was St. Valentine's Eve.

I CALLED on the mother of three small girls a few days ago. With me I took a large fat book bound in scarlet, with gilt edges. It was a relic of my own childhood—a gift from my grandmother. While I was there I meant to read from its contents to the little girls.

The children were playing in the back yard when I arrived, so I went straight in, the flamboyantly scarlet book under my arm.

The mother was sitting in a chair, reading. She is a beautiful woman, who almost seems to radiate calm and repose —if one can radiate calm and repose. She was reading from a solid little book bound soberly in brown. She looked up as I entered the room, and greeted me with her rarely sweet smile. I sat beside her and placed my large, scarlet, gilt-edged volume on a small table. The vividness of it caught her eye.

"What book have you?" she asked, nodding her head in the direction of the table.

"Why, it's just a fairy story," I answered; "a story that I used to love when I was little. I brought it along to read to the children."

The mother of the children leaned forward and placed her beautiful calm hand on my arm.

"Dear," she said, "I would much rather not have you read fairy tales to my girls—I've never read anything of that sort to them."

I gasped. "Never read anything of that sort?" I echoed stupidly. "Haven't they ever heard any fairy tales? Don't they know about brownies and pixies and elves? Don't they believe in magic?"

The mother laughed. "Indeed no!" she answered, "They have been told only true things. They have never believed in the Santa Claus myth, or in Easter eggs, or in water-sprites—or anything of the sort. They have been brought up more scientifically than that! And I don't want to upset their minds with ideas of another sort. So—please don't read the book to them!"

I looked disconsolately at the scarlet book that seemed to blaze, defiantly, almost, from the little table. And as I looked at it I remembered how my grandmother had talked to me of Santa Claus, how our old pastor had once taken me on his knee and told me about an elf that lived, he was sure, in a pink blossom on his morning glory vine. I thought of our jolly Irish cook who had told me shivery stories, on dusky summer evenings, of leprecawns, and banshees; of fairy rings, and little men who wore red caps and guarded buried gold. I remembered the kind teacher who, when we were specially good in school, had read Hans Andersen, and Grimm, and Howard Pyle to us. I remembered bedtime stories, when the light had quite faded away and the gentle silver stars were dancing in the sky. . . . And, as I was busy remembering, I felt a sudden pity for the three little girls who had never felt the breath of magic in their hearts.

Perhaps it's right to bring children up in a common-sense way. Perhaps it's wrong to tell them fairy stories to fill their little minds with romance. But I'm glad—whether it's right or wrong—that magic wasn't left out of my life. I'm glad that I used to look for dwarfs under fallen trees. I'm glad that I thought that errant butterflies might be fairies; I'm glad that the sunbeams made me think of an enchanted queen's hair, unbound, and I'm glad that the wind in the trees sang a song to my childish heart.

OH, friend of mine, don't let yourself think that Valentine and Santa Claus are troublesome myths. Don't let yourself think that dreams are undigested dinners and love is a disease. For the romance and magic in the world is what keeps it young and beautiful and a pleasant place to live in.

A life without day-dreams, and airy castles in Spain, and almost magic hopes, seems to me a rather uninteresting life. It seems like a long hot climb up a dusty hill—with no view to see when you reach the top.

I'm not suggesting that you forget the serious, worthwhile things in the world, to ramble in a glorified world of unrealities; not at all. I'm not asking you to dream away hours when you might be working and striving and pushing forward and praying. And I'm not wanting you to read fairy tales when there are wonderful thoughts that should be read.

But the Creator himself, it seems to me, filled the world with a sacred kind of magic. He put gold into the sunlight, and misty velvet into the night-time sky. He put silver into the stars and the moon. He put "books in the running brooks, sermons in stones." He made leaves of marvelous shapes, and quaint, funny little acorns, and feathery small grasses. He made the miracle of flowers, opening in the spring—and he made a baby's hand, as pink as the sweetest of the opening buds. He put mother love into eyes, and charity into hearts, and gentleness into hands. And when he did all of this, I can't help feeling that he did it because he thought that beauty, and love, and magic—real magic—were necessary to us.

That's why I'm asking you to smile understandingly at the child who believes in fairies, and to see an enchanted palace in the vague distant lights that shine reflected in a river. That's why I'm asking you not to be too matter-of-fact about dreams, and love, and life!

A ROSE RECHRISTENED. The dogfish, long disregarded, principally looked upon by fishermen as a nuisance, has been sponsored by the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Fisheries, rechristened the grayfish, packed and put on the market under its new name at ten cents a can, and in two months is said to have realized a demand in excess of the facilities for its marketing. Grayfish is said to contain less protein and more fat than salmon, and to equal salmon in richness, wholesomeness and digestibility. Mediterranean countries are said to have used this fish as a food for many years.

The Committee

A Fact Story, but None the Less Sad and Funny for That

By M. V. P. YEAMAN

IT was Sunday morning in Milletsville. Services had begun in each of the four churches of the village, and the streets were empty except for a belated milk-wagon and the old expressman returning from the one train that was accustomed to disturb the Sabbath quiet.

Rev. Mark English, pastor of the largest congregation in the town, consisting of some two hundred members, looked up from his hymn book this Sunday morning, and saw three distinctly strange gentlemen entering the building. It was certainly a most unusual occurrence, for visitors to Milletsville were few and far between. The three sat down together in the last pew but one, and each reverently opened a hymn book and seemed to be following the words, if they did not sing.

The pastor wondered who they could be, or who in his congregation was expecting visitors that day. Perhaps they were new residents, and were contemplating membership in his church. Then like a flash came the thought that they might be a committee, sent out by some vacant church to hear him preach with a view to reporting back to the congregation at home. Why not? He knew that such a method of finding a preacher was sometimes practiced by vacant churches, though that was not the way he had received the call to Millettsville four years before. Small churches could not afford to send out committees to distant places; only large churches could do that. The visitors this morning then must be from some large city parish.

It was a new experience for Mark English, and he felt a thrill. After announcing the offering for the day, he glanced again at the three strangers. They were looking steadily at him, as if making mental notes of his appearance and pulpit manner. His eyes dropped, and he was sure now that he had rightly surmised.

"They cannot be other than a pulpit committee; and they are distinguished looking men too—intelligent, prosperous and well groomed. Undoubtedly they are from some wealthy and fashionable city congregation." And the Rev. Mark English nervously gathered together his sermon notes just as the deacons returned with the collection plates, and it was time for him to rise and begin his discourse. Ah, did he not owe it to himself and the cause to make a good impression now? And was he not justified in concluding that he would give favorable consideration to the new call? Hadn't he often preached exceptionably good sermons without a word of appreciation from this Millettsville flock? Wasn't the salary they had been paying him rather small too? And why shouldn't his growing daughters have the advantages of a city, as had the children of some other ministers he had known? Yes, he would preach his very best this morning, and he would accept this "opportunity."

He stood more erect than usual, and buttoned up his frock coat a little tighter than was his wont. He announced the text, and was glad to be able to recall the original Greek of the leading word, which he had not till now thought of giving his hearers. As he proceeded he quoted from several of the Fathers, and at one time referred to the glories of ancient Greece and Rome. At another point he grew dramatic, and raised his voice to so high a pitch that a sleeping child cried out with fright; and so vigorous was his gesture that he narrowly escaped dashing a vase of flowers from the desk. With pardonable satisfaction he was able to close with a line or two from the current number of the denomination's great paper, which had been loaned him the day before. At the end of it all he resumed his seat, confident of the favorable impression he had made, if the strangers were indeed a visiting committee. And of this he could tell even better by the way they would conduct themselves at the conclusion of the service.

He would speak to them at the door. They must not think him neglectful of strangers. He therefore introduced himself, and shook their hands. They appeared unwilling to disclose their identity, and gave him no names in return. He thought they even exchanged meaning glances with each other, that looked like a warning not to say too much. But why indeed should they blurt out who they were, and from whence they came? He had heard that such was not the way of committees. All this would come out soon enough. They were there, and he had made a favorable impression. What more could he ask right now? They had paid closer attention than strangers had ever before paid to one of his sermons, and to his manner of conducting a service. And besides, hadn't he noticed a perceptible nod of approval more than once during the service, and hadn't one of them made an entry in his note book as he was clinching one of his strongest points? Yes, they were members of a church committee. There could no longer be any doubt about it.

OTHERS, also, had noticed the strangers, and wondered who they were. And one good lady startled the pastor by remarking aloud in the vestibule, "I just tell you, they looked like they might be a committee from some church planning to steal our pastor! But they just shan't have him. The idea! It is as bad as stealing the cook out of one's kitchen, Mrs. Carrington, now isn't it?" Little did that good sister imagine that he was already leaning strongly toward an acceptance of the call.

The Rev. Mark English was by this time eager to be off, and to talk the important matter over with his wife, and was impatient to start with her toward the pretty cottage parsonage a quarter of a mile away. When out of ear-shot of the last group, she seized his arm and exclaimed, "Oh, Mark, did you notice those strange men at church? I just know, as somebody said, that they are a pulpit committee, sent out to sample your preaching!"

"I did," said Mark; "and did you notice that they evidently are from some strong city church? Small churches cannot afford to be sending out committees on a trip like this, paying big railroad and hotel bills for three men. I was wondering what city they could be from. Chicago, New York or Philadelphia. I have been trying to think what church in any of those places knows anything about me, or who could have recommended me. But I'll tell you right now, Madge, I am going. I'll not bury myself any longer in this dead little town. I need contact with the great outside world, and access to large libraries, and the benefit of the city ministerial associations. And you and the girls shall have the advantages of the city, too. The lectures, the music, the art schools and all that. Yes, we'll go; that is all there is to it."

"Yes, dear," replied Madge, enthusiastically, "you are right. We have slaved for these self-centered, critical provincials long enough, and they don't know that you would have been snatched up long ago by some large city church if they could only have known about you, and heard you preach."

All the afternoon they talked and planned, and Mark even looked over his library, wondering where he would get boxes to pack with. And Madge thought of how she would at last be able to have the children take music from a competent teacher, and that she wouldn't have to act as president of every society in the church to which they were going, and would have more time to gratify her own individual tastes, just like other women she knew.

When the children had gone off on the veranda to read the stories in their Sunday school papers, the minister and his wife had opportunity for a further confidential chat concerning the bright prospect of the future. "I tell you," said she, "I am sorry about that union meeting tonight, and that we aren't to have service in our own church, so that those men could hear you again, Mark, and you could have another chance to talk to them. You might be able after all to find out where they are from, and all about it. Don't you suppose you could drop into the hotel and look on the register, and at least learn where they came from?"

"I have thought of that," said the pastor, "but I will wait till tomorrow, though, when they are gone. It would not do to have them think me too anxious about this matter."

"Well," replied his wife, "any way, as you say, we'll take the call. Oh, I can begin to feel my freedom from this place, and these people already! And I am going right down to Wilkerson's millinery store tomorrow, and get that hat I wanted so much, instead of this fright I'm wearing just because I had to buy at Wood's, who is a member of your church. And I shall take Edith to that modern young dentist to have her teeth attended to, instead of that old vinegar-faced Dr. Ricketts you said we would have to patronize just because he happens to be an elder in the church. The old fogy! I expect every instrument he has is rusty, and I doubt if he ever took a dental journal in his life. And there is that old Mr. Potts, who never speaks to me, and then goes around saying that the minister's wife is haughty, and never notices him and his family. The ingrates! I never fail to speak to the whole kith and kin of them every single Sunday. It is positively getting on my nerves this bowing and bending to cranks and disagreeable people just because one is a minister's wife. I was talking to Mrs. Green, the new Baptist minister's wife, only yesterday, and she volunteered to tell me how she is going through this very thing already. I declare it made my heart ache for the poor young thing. It is a shame!" And Mrs. English set her foot down hard at the very thought of it all.

THE next day Mark English walked casually into the little hotel office, and after chatting pleasantly for a few moments with Mr. Henning, the proprietor, looked in an apparently half interested manner at the open register on the littered desk.

"Many guests now, Mr. Henning?" he inquired carelessly.

"No, only a few. There are three names, though, you won't find there. Had three fellows till this morning, who were sort of cranky. Said they didn't care to register, and I never did find out where they belong, nor what their names are; though they seemed to be nice gentlemen, too. Just said they were passing through town. By the way, I believe one of them asked me yesterday if I knew you, and how long you had been here. Said he happened to hear you preach in the morning."

The minister tried to hide the flush he felt coming over his face. "That so? And you say nobody found out where they are from, or where they are going? Curious lot, sure enough." And then, seeing that no clue as to the whereabouts of his new church was to be had from Mr. Henning, Mark went home to report to his wife.

"Sly dogs!" he said to her when he came in. "They stayed at the hotel, but they didn't register, and nobody knows anything about them. But oh, well, you remember John Everett told us that his committee did some mighty queer things when he got his call to Cleveland. Believe I'll look over the files of the religious papers and see if I can find out whether any large church has recently become vacant."

"And don't worry, dear," called out Mrs. English, "You never preached better than you did yesterday, and I know they will make a report that will get you the call. And I guess these Milletsville people will find out soon

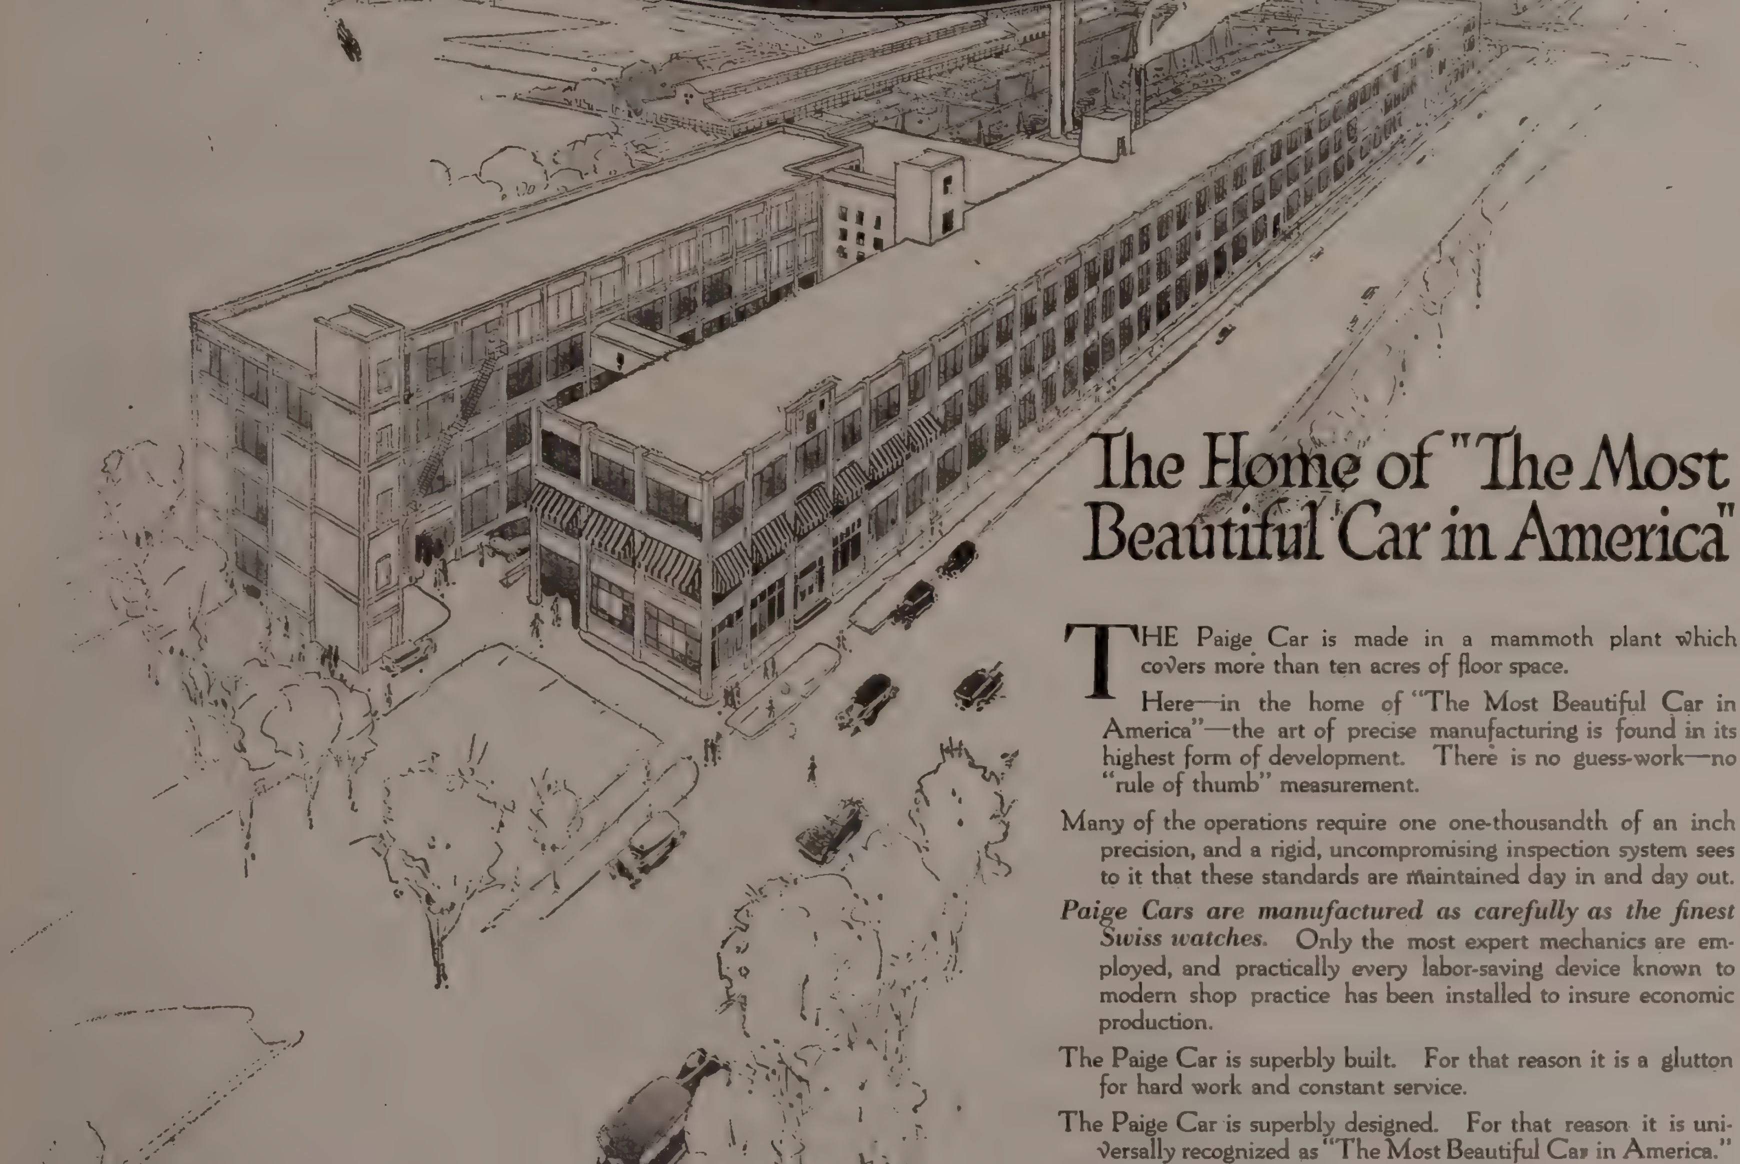
"The Most Beautiful Car in America"



The Home of "The Most Beautiful Car in America"

THE Paige Car is made in a mammoth plant which covers more than ten acres of floor space.

Here—in the home of "The Most Beautiful Car in America"—the art of precise manufacturing is found in its highest form of development. There is no guess-work—no "rule of thumb" measurement.

Many of the operations require one one-thousandth of an inch precision, and a rigid, uncompromising inspection system sees to it that these standards are maintained day in and day out.

Paige Cars are manufactured as carefully as the finest Swiss watches. Only the most expert mechanics are employed, and practically every labor-saving device known to modern shop practice has been installed to insure economic production.

The Paige Car is superbly built. For that reason it is a glutton for hard work and constant service.

The Paige Car is superbly designed. For that reason it is universally recognized as "The Most Beautiful Car in America."

SHERWIN-WILLIAMS

There is nothing so desirable as painted walls

The soft, rich, restful effects that Flat-Tone produces cannot be secured with any kind of wall covering. It is a heavy, durable oil paint that can be cleaned when soiled, is not easily marred and does not crack or loosen.

Although when measured by years of service given, and by general standards of economy, Flat-Tone has always led, it is now under existing conditions, almost invariably lower in initial cost than ordinary wall covering. The Sherwin-Williams dealer near you has the goods and the color cards. Ask us his name.

that we are not going to starve, if the salary is behind, and that you needn't grieve if they wouldn't consent to fresco the church as you asked them to do."

The next day Mark had an inspiration. "Madge!" he exclaimed, "I've hit upon a way to find out! I couldn't see from the church papers that any pulpit is vacant, but I'm going to saunter around to the depot, and make young Perkins the agent tell me what tickets he sold this morning. Those fellows certainly wouldn't carry their shrewdness so far as to try to deceive me by buying to some intermediate point, and throwing me off the track in that fashion. That would be going to a silly extreme, surely."

"Fine!" exclaimed the excited wife. "The very thing! Go right away, and see if three tickets were sold to the same place. Strange we hadn't thought of that before. Go, Mark," she said, pushing him into the hall. "I'll be dying to know."

At the depot Mark was pleased to find young Perkins at leisure and inclined to give his experiences with the whims of travelers in general.

"Much passenger business right now?" said Mark, finally.

"Light, awful light," said Perkins. "Only three tickets sold for the early train this morning, though it is true they were all three clear through to Baltimore."

The minister started so perceptibly that the agent thought he must have suddenly remembered some important pastoral duty that he was about to overlook. But the next sentence left the eager and expectant preacher almost limp.

"Yes," continued Perkins; "when I asked them if they were commercial travelers, they said no, but that they had missed connection here. Said they were Latter Day Saints. Isn't that the same as Mormon elders? Mormons! Jinks! The law ought to break up that thing, I say, and keep it broken up; don't you think so, Mr. English?"

BUT to the surprise of the staring agent, Rev. Mark English, looking curiously dejected and thoughtful, was slowly walking off in the direction of his home. In the cool of the veranda, behind the screening vines, he tossed his hat on the floor, and sitting down beside his wife, related the result of his call at the station.

At first she laid her embroidery hoop in her lap, and looked long and painfully at him. A tear started down her cheek, and her pretty chin began to quiver. Then there suddenly rang forth as merry a laugh as he had ever heard her give.

"Oh, Mark English! what silly geese we both have been! It has been positively wicked in us, and awfully worldly. Really, I was beginning to realize it, I think, while you were gone. How could we be happier than we have always been right here in dear little old Milletsville? We have health and two perfect children, and certainly we haven't wanted for the good things of life any more than the most fortunate of our parishioners. And all these people love you so. Oh, it was wicked of us. It was 'inordinate ambition,' like you were saying in the prayer meeting last week. We ought to be ashamed of the whole wicked thing."

"Well," said he, after a long pause, "I suppose you are right, as you always are. And I don't think after all that I want a call, anyway. I shall make it my ambition, God willing, and the church wanting it, to round out fifty years of service with a loyal people, as dear old Doctor Woodburn has just done over at Ellendale. But promise me one thing, Madge, and that is, that not for five years at least will you ever mention to me, or to any one, the occasion of the famous visit of the pulpit committee to Milletsville."

And Madge, with a smile, promised that she never would.

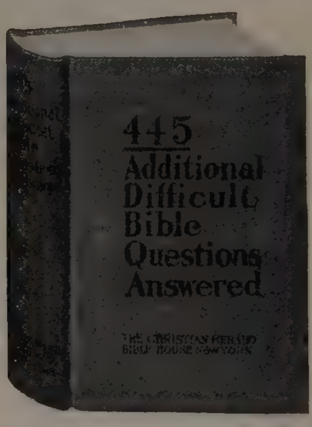
445 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED



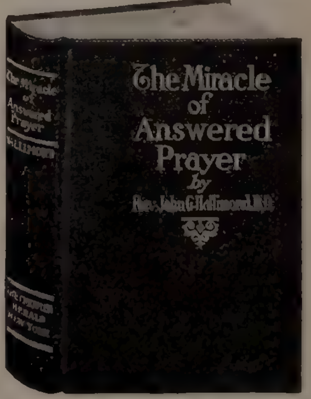
WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

THE MIRACLE OF ANSWERED PRAYER



By Rev. John G. Hallimond, D.D.

THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

This book contains authenticated instances, not ancient, but happening in our own time—now—of answered prayers. There is hardly a conceivable situation in human experience which is not included in this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

The Lutheran church itself was almost destroyed by fire, and all the property of the members was seized and their homes burned to the ground.

As in this sad village, so the unbridled Moslem hordes raged in all of the one hundred and twenty Christian Persian villages of the Urmiah plateau, and also in the Christian villages on Turkish soil. Attempts were made to induce the Turkish officials to call a halt in the carnage and robbery, or at least to grant protection to Lutheran Christians. They repeatedly gave assurance that all Christians should remain free and unmolested, but always the pledge was broken and conditions were worse than before. For six months the Mohammedans literally raged among the Christians, sparing neither young nor old.

When, in May, 1915, at the end of six months of terror, the Russian troops returned to Urmiah and liberated the Christians from the hands of their fanatical persecutors, they found only the pitiful remnants of the once large Christian population of Persia. The Lutheran congregations also had been dispersed and well-nigh annihilated. What was left of these latter in the course of time gathered in the ruins of the village of Gogtapa, where a native Lutheran pastor, who had providentially escaped, resumed divine services. The roof and the walls of the church had collapsed after the fire. He had the débris removed, and every morning before sunrise and every evening the remaining members assembled in this ruin, where the pastor expounded to them the Word of God, often amid wind and rain. The services made a deep impression upon all, and they always left their beloved church with sobs and tears. Soon their number was greatly augmented by many Christians who had escaped from the mountains of Kurdistan, so that finally the congregation was larger than before the war began. It was touching indeed to see how these mountain Christians followed with rapt attention the preaching of the Word. They had never heard anything like it before. All this encouraged the pastor, who in spite of the lack of means decided to make an attempt to rebuild the church. It was reconstructed in rude fashion, so that now the Gospel can be preached without interference. The other Lutheran congregations, however, have not been equally fortunate. Their houses and churches are utterly destroyed, and they have not been able to rebuild them. Now these Lutherans, who by God's help have weathered such a terrible storm of persecution, are still in danger of perishing from hunger and privation. They are the only denomination unrepresented in the relief. Having escaped from such great perils, shall they now perish from hunger and exposure? They lack all the necessities of life; food, clothing, shelter. They have no plows or harrows, hoes or rakes to till the soil, no seed or grain of any kind to sow and plant their fields and gardens.

Clearly it is the duty of American fellow Christians to lend a helping hand.

For the purpose of affording prompt relief to these persecuted believers, the Christian Herald has this week sent five thousand dollars through the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee, one-half of which is to be used in relieving the Lutheran native Christians of western Persia and the other half to be applied in aid of the destitute Armenians and Syrians. The need is urgent and we invite our readers to send in their gifts as promptly as possible. The distribution of aid among the Lutheran sufferers, till now unhelped from any source, will be under the supervision of a committee of American missionaries and native pastors. All contributions should be clearly designated by the donors, in order that they may reach the beneficiaries for whom they are intended, and should be sent to The Christian Herald, Room 93, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

"An Animated Hallelujah!"

YOUR article with portrait of Stephen Merritt revives some pleasant memories. It was in 1851–2, in Amenia Seminary, a preparatory school for both sexes, that there came into the troubled mind of my youth a light and freedom which have made all these years a poem and a song. At that time the boys were not much given to athletics. We had our games, but our chief interest centered in a daily prayer meeting held in our several rooms. Those were happy hours, when truly "heaven came down our souls to greet."

Once a week the whole school came together in a spacious recitation room for social worship. The meeting was opened usually with a brief address by the principal, John W. Beech, whose noble eloquence I have never heard surpassed. Sometimes our pastor, dear Ben Adams, came in and spoke to us. Then followed prayer and testimony. On one such occasion there burst upon us, as it were, a new sunrise—the fervent words of two new students from New York City: Charles Rogers and Stephen Merritt.

I cannot tell you adequately the delightful impression on our whole school life made by the presence and activities of Stephen Merritt. We all loved him and he loved us all. It was a goodly fellowship. I think there were together at that time some who later made their mark in college and the wide world. Among them were: John J. Harrison, who served many years in the Episcopal ministry; William J. Foss, who went early home; Albert D. Vail, well known in New York City; Denis Wortman, distinguished preacher and poet; Alonzo Collin, more than forty years professor in Cornell College, Iowa; Henry T. Staats, eminent in the Congregational ministry; William Romer, Simeon Frost, Robert J. Mitchell, and others whose names I do not now recall.

"Stephie," as we called him, was always overflowing with good humor and happiness. He enjoyed religion, as he said, to his finger-tips. I have called him an animated Hallelujah!

His exuberant trust and generosity is well illustrated by a story I heard of him, which is so characteristic that I am sure it must be true. On one occasion his wife remonstrated on his reckless giving away of his means to the needy and unfortunate. "Why, Stephie, if this goes on, how will we come out at the end of the year?" "Oh, my dear," he replied, "we shall come out at the little end of the horn, bless the Lord!" It proved, I think, a cornucopia. Through his energy and good management, by the blessing of the Lord, he was prosperous and seemed to have plenty to give away.

Isn't it too bad that such men should grow old and die? Ah, no! They live—they live forever in noblest ministry, and not very far away.

Hopkinton, Mass. QUINCY J. COLLIN.

HELP US SOW THE SEEDS OF BIBLE KNOWLEDGE

Dear Member of the Christian Herald Family:

One fine result of our First Bible Picture Study was that many of our readers found in the pastime a way to induce others to read and study the Bible.

We have had many, many letters from people who state that they entered the Bible Study only because of the interesting competition itself,—and then they became so impressed with the beauties of the Bible, with the message there for them, of inspiration and revelation, that they have become enthusiastic Bible students.

Their gratitude is great; practically all of them have expressed fervently their grateful acknowledgments to those friends or acquaintances who brought the Bible thus interestingly into their lives, and so led them to take the entire book to their hearts.

Hundreds of readers have asked us:

"Cannot you devise a way for us to help in spreading news of the Second Bible Picture Study, so that many unthinking ones who now regard the Bible as simply a book may be led to read it, and learn that it is God's living message?"

We Have Found a Way

If at length we have found a method which will induce people to read the Bible who could not be induced to do so through any other means, then it clearly becomes our duty to work out this idea to the furthermost extent. Of course, we can do this only with the help of our friends. People who have not cared to read the Bible naturally would not be found among readers of the Christian Herald. But it is probable that every member of the Christian Herald Family knows of one, two, three or four people who have never had the force of the great truths of the Bible brought home to them.

Do you know of any people, good at heart, who would be made happier, more contented, better, for the consolation of the Bible? Without doubt you do. Who, indeed, but is made happier by the Bible?

Do you think for a moment that these people will fail to be grateful to you, if you bring the Bible into their lives, by calling their attention to the Second Bible Picture Study?

Dwell upon the pleasure of the competitive nature of the Study, if you wish. Tell them of the lasting good they will receive in a greater command of words, an increased ability to concentrate, and that perhaps they may win one of the one thousand cash rewards. Once in the Study they will begin reading and pondering the 2,000 verses in "Pearls from the Bible," and before long you will find them reading the entire Bible more eagerly since they began to compete in the Bible Picture Study itself!

Show "A New Path to the Bible"

We publish herewith four coupons, all alike, each of which is called "A New Path to the Bible." We ask that you give or send these to four people who in your opinion would be glad to have a better knowledge of the Bible.

Just think of it! There are 300,000 homes already included in the Christian Herald Family, which means, at the rate of five to a family, that the membership is at least one and a half million. Now suppose that each of the present members of the Family were to bring this Bible Study to the notice of only one person not now a daily reader of the Bible! How potent that would be for the spread of the Gospel!

Some of the greatest movements in the history of the world began in a small way. Think of the mere handful of believers who, 1900 years ago, constituted what might be called the then Christian world. And think of the millions who now know the divine truth—a result of the untiring efforts of that small band, and of their successors throughout the centuries!

Here, we believe, is an opportunity for you to do a share of constructive Christian work. By bringing this interesting pastime to the notice of your friends, you may be bringing them at the same time to a knowledge of God's word. Is it asking too much when we suggest that you simply send or give four information coupons to those who may receive everlasting benefit through them?

A NEW PATH TO THE BIBLE

A Competition in Fitting Bible Verses to a Series of Pictures. One thousand Cash Rewards as an extra incentive.

Dear Friend:

This will tell you about a new and extremely interesting and profitable way to learn the Bible—the Christian Herald Bible Picture Study.

There is an entertaining element in this new Bible pastime which makes it different from any other way you might choose of obtaining a good knowledge of the Bible, and an appreciation of what the Bible means.

That is brought about, as you will find by reading both sides of this little announcement, by combining pictures and Bible verses. You are called upon to fit verses to the pictures, and to do that you must consider each verse carefully. Rules telling how you may compete expenselessly mailed upon request.

I have been much interested in the Bible Picture Study, and warrant you will find mental, spiritual and perhaps financial profit in it.

Very truly yours,

WE WILL DO OUR SHARE IN AMPLE MEASURE

A Free Outfit May Reward Your Efforts

On our part, we are not only ready to give to any one taking advantage of the "New Path to the Bible" Offer 20 weeks of the Christian Herald and the complete Bible Picture Study Outfit—but we will also help by sending you a Bible Picture Study Outfit free, if only three of the four people enter the Study. If two of them enter, we will send you a present (let it be a surprise as to what the present will be). If one enters, you will receive a present from us also—let us choose that for you, too.

These gifts are offered so that you will be led to place your "New Path to the Bible" messages with thought and care. Try to select people who will be fertile soil for the seeds you are sowing!

Doubtless you know some persons, living near you or perhaps in some other city, who are not scoffers but are indifferent—yet who might be attracted by the possibility of winning a prize and the pleasure of the home competition. Is not the result worthy of the effort? It would seem so, because we know of so many cases where people without the slightest idea of becoming ardent lovers of the Bible became such by reason of the necessity in the Bible Picture Study of reading over, and reflecting upon, the 2,000 verses in "Pearls from the Bible."

Write Your Name on Each Message

Be sure you write your name and address on each "New Path to the Bible" coupon, before handing or sending it out, and when the coupons come in to us we will keep a careful record, and credit you accordingly. Then after a reasonable time has passed we will send out to each person whose messages have had effect, the present to which these results entitle him or her.

As we have said, we stand ready to give an Outfit free if but three of the four people to whom you send the coupons enter the Study; and if two people enter or but one, you will receive some commensurate present.

If you wish you may tell your friends, when handing or sending out the messages, that they will be entitled to twenty weeks of a national weekly that will give them the news of the day from the Christian standpoint; that will keep them up to date on all matters of interest; that will acquaint them with some facts and events in this big world of ours which they will hardly find either in the daily paper or the secular magazine. We are sure that when they realize the interest they can find in a Christian atmosphere they will become permanent members of the Christian Herald Family, and that you will never regret your aid.

Full Rewards in Case of a Tie

Every one contemplating entrance into the Second Bible Picture Study should know that in case of a tie for any award, the full award tied for will be given each tying participant—no award will ever be divided.

All are notified also that the Bible Picture Study Prospectus will be sent free on request. It contains full information about the Study. The Rules, which tell how the public may compete free, without expense of any kind, may also be had upon request.

Now we have told you everything. Won't you help us in this undertaking, in this new way of interesting so many in the Bible? Our First Bible Picture Study proved the wide appeal and sure result of the competition. Won't you help us make this Second Study greater still?

We believe we have at length found a very effective way of spreading a love for the Bible, by promoting an interest in it.

Will you help us in this work by doing this small part—by distributing these four messages that tell the "New Path to the Bible?"

It will demand but a few minutes of your time—and it may mean so much to those who receive the message!

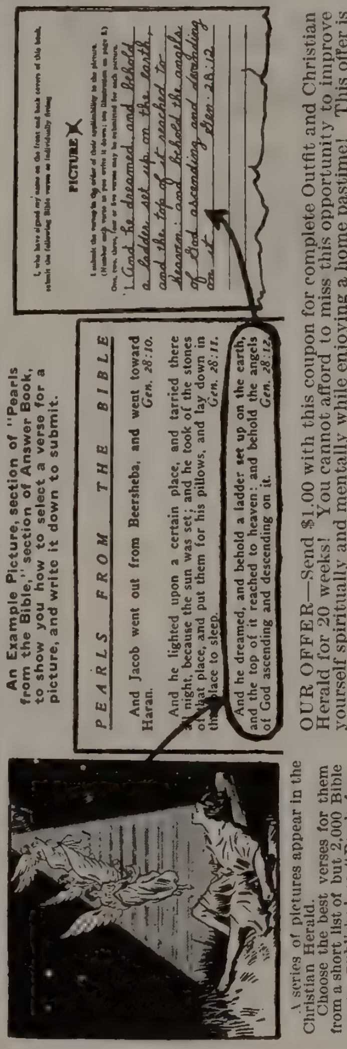
THE COUPONS BELOW are messages showing "A New Path to the Bible." You are told all about them on the preceding two pages.

CHRISTIAN HERALD SECOND BIBLE PICTURE STUDY



An Example Picture, section of "Pearls from the Bible," section of Answer Book, to show you how to select a verse for a picture, and write it down to submit.

PEARLS FROM THE BIBLE

And Jacob went out from Beersheba, and went toward Haran. Gen. 28:10.

And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep. Gen. 28:11.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. Gen. 28:12.

I, who have signed my name on the front and back covers of this book, submit the following Bible verses as individually fitting

PICTURE X

I submit the verses in the order of their applicability to the picture. (Number each verse as you write it down; see illustration on page 8.) One, two, three, four or five verses may be submitted for each picture.

1. And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it Gen. 28:12

My husband at once sent for men to carry me in my machilla in case we had to depart suddenly. They came and squatted in the back courtyard, where they lit a fire. A boy was also sent with a letter to the nearest planter telling him what we had heard. Meanwhile our table had been cleared and the guns brought out. The Doctor tried to teach me how to fire a Martini-Henri rifle. For hours we sat waiting anxiously, uncertain what to do. Then a letter came from the planter informing us that all his boys had run away and he had heard nothing. This looked bad. In time of war the women and children usually run to the hills to hide. We had prayer together and waited an hour or two longer.

At midnight we thought it better to depart and try to find our way to the coast. The machilla men were called. They shrugged their shoulders and refused to carry me. I went into my bedroom. There was no time to pack anything, nor could we have burdened ourselves with luggage. I put a bottle of bovril into a small hand-bag, and threw a Shetland shawl round my shoulders. My husband fastened a revolver on my waist.

SO we started, walking single file through the tall rank grass of the jungle. I went in front carrying the lantern. One or two of the machilla men accompanied us, though they would not carry me. But when we got to the Linjé stream I had to be carried across on Kuchilapa's back; so had the others in their turn.

Alighting on the other side I said, "Jambone" (good), which is equivalent to "thank you," and pegged on my way, sometimes sinking in marshy places. Suddenly a blaze of fire was waved in front of me. I stood paralyzed, forgetting all about my loaded revolver. Then we discovered that it was only one of our own boys flourishing a torch of burning grass. He had been sent ahead to ask the planter to come down and speak with us.

It appeared that we had reached the foot of his plantation. There was a msakasa (a rough shed) a short distance from our path. We went into it and sitting down on the ground awaited his coming. We spoke little. Dimly we saw each others' faces. Outside the frogs croaked incessantly in the marshes. After what seemed a long time the planter arrived. He insisted that we should come up to his house and rest for the night. He would send out spies to warn us of the approach of the enemy.

So we accepted his kindness. I was dead tired, and he let me have his only bed. It was simply a raised board with a few rugs on the top. The room had no furnishings save a small deal table. But I never slept sounder.

My husband awoke me at dawn to tell me that Namondé, the chief, had come all the way to tell us that it was a false alarm. But was it? What happened afterward makes us doubt it.

We stayed till next day with the planter, then returned home. For several nights I slept with my clothes on. Soon we settled down to the usual routine.

ABOUT eight o'clock every evening we had prayers and a hymn or two in our dining-room. Our boys and girls took a kneeling posture round the table, resting their elbows on it. Several natives from the village came also and squatted on the floor near the open door. It was a sweet, refreshing time, this homely meeting. It did us good and drew the natives nearer to us.

It was no wonder that I was laid down often with fever. On one occasion my temperature rose to 106 degrees, and the Doctor gave me a dose of tincture, which saved my life. What a relief it was when the burning dryness left me and the sweat broke out! I remember I lay that night on a low bed feeling perfectly happy, although a whole family of rats danced over me till dawn. A tin traveling-box acted as a table beside my bed. On it lay a candle, a water-bottle, a match-box, and the powder which I had to take at a certain time. The rats ate the candle, knocked over the water-bottle, saturating the matches, making it impossible to strike a light or mix my powder. In the morning a baby rat was found drowned in a basin of water near my bed.

But these were only part of our troubles. When the rains came and the hurricanes blew and we felt the insecurity of our house, when ultimately the wild chief Mkanda with a hundred or two of his men attacked our station and looted our house, then we suffered. But through it all we were saved by the wonderful providence of God.

But all these events seem but a dream now. Yet a little proof is left to show me that it all really happened. I open my desk and take out a letter which I received while waiting for my husband to join me after the native rising. I open it tenderly. It is written in a scrawling hand. It is from my girls. Translated it reads:

"Donna, good-bý. The washing is finished. The war is over. Donna, good-by. MELÉ, AJOULA, ACHILANDANA, NDENDEMELE."

War-Tossed Leaves

SECRETARY GEORGE A. SANFORD of the Army Young Men's Christian Association reports that great good is being done by religious literature throughout the various army posts on the border, abroad and wherever soldiers are stationed under the Stars and Stripes. A great many subscribers of the Christian Herald are sending their papers on to soldiers somewhere, the plan being for each sender to address his paper to an individual soldier. Often the soldier and the sender correspond, and the way is opened for much real service for the King, under whose banner citizen and soldier may march together. A soldier in the Philippines writes: "I have seventeen soldiers in a Bible class, and am holding hymn services every Thursday night. Sunday evenings we go to the city of Manila to church. The books and religious papers are fine. A good woman from Morristown sends the Christian Herald, and lately a publication 'Adult Sunday School Lessons,' which are just what I can use. I read my Bible every night from seven to nine." Another soldier in Hawaii writes: "I thank you very much for the Christian Herald, which I will pass on. Our battery subscribes for nearly every periodical, but nothing of a religious nature." A soldier in the Canal Zone says: "I have received the paper regularly and enjoy it very much." Subscribers who are forwarding their Heralds to soldiers and who have had no acknowledgment can find out from the adjutant of the post whether their soldier is still there.

Among the Evangelists

EPISCOPAL Church laymen, known as lay readers, have led other New York Christian men in forming an Institute of Applied Christianity, believed to be the first institute of its kind. It is on the lines of schools of applied science. The plan has been put forward in some measure to meet an appeal that all possible assistance be extended to the efforts to give the men of the pews, who have been aroused by Bible class and evangelistic movements in New York, definite work to do. An Institute Council has been organized in which practically all denominations are represented. The aim is to make trained volunteer lay workers out of the men of the pews.

Washington Court House, Ohio, is in the midst of a revival, said to be the first in its history. Evangelist Henry W. Bromley and party are conducting the meetings. A tabernacle seating 4,000 was erected and meetings were started on the first day of the year. All were largely attended and many conversions are reported. Dr. Bromley and his workers go to Dayton next for a campaign.

Evangelist H. S. Morrill of Aurora, Ill., has just concluded a four months' revival tour in Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska and Iowa. The meetings resulted in a large number of accessions to the churches.

Evangelist French E. Oliver and party, of South Pasadena, Calif., have been urged to spend from one to two years in the Western field. He writes: "We have seen thousands converted to God during the past few months."

Evangelist T. Edward Thomas has been conducting a union campaign at Lovington, Ill., during the month of February, and for March will be at Flora, Ill.

graduate department and the preparatory departments. Domestic science, literature, English literature and pedagogy are the doors through which the students are led to a proper preparation for intellectual and social life, motherhood and a place in the training of the young. About one-half the students are boarders, living in small dormitories, each of which constitutes a "family." There is one dormitory in the foreign style, which is preferred by a few of the girls, but which is unattractive, compared with the neat rooms in Japanese style. Physical and moral education are emphasized, and the scientific equipment is unsurpassed in Japan, except by that of the Imperial University. Science and mathematics are taught, but Japanese etiquette, flower arrangement and tea ceremony are given due attention. Foreign schools once neglected this cultural training, and in consequence their graduates were not in demand as wives; but even the foreign schools are now giving time to instruction in the ceremonies which must be known by every lady of culture in Japan.

No prizes are given at the Women's University, as knowledge and not vanity is sought. "Cramming for exams" is discouraged as far as it can be discouraged among ambitious young women. Though formal sociology is not prominent in the curriculum, practical sociology is fostered by careful observation, discussion of constructive methods and practical expression, both during school life and through a flourishing alumnæ association which binds thousands of women to this school. Every educated person in Japan must be a sociologist, for what settlement work and trips to the slums are to American students, all life is to the sympathetic graduate of an Oriental school. The laboratory is boundless, the need imperative, and the field for helpfulness includes every method of social service and relief.

Dr. Naruse's school is the grand outcome of a wise ambition. It is by far the largest single factor in building a finer womanhood through higher education in Japan.

These two schools are private enterprises, unsupported by any mission board. They are realized dreams, with the added quality of further growth after they emerged from ideals into solid realities. Their founders had a high purpose and they fought their way. They have "put it all over" the confused mass of Christian schools when it comes to hitching their auto to a tank of dynamic force. They dominate their fields to the exclusion of American enterprises that are sadly needed.

Christianity can work through Japanese as well as Americans, and these two Christian educators have done well in their work. Yet the highest class in the post-graduate department does not deserve the name of university, nor is it on the same level as the best men's schools in Japan. A true university for women is coming in Japan. From all that I am able to see, that university may, because of the financial backers it must have, be non-Christian and non-American. The vast sums tied up in American educational missions in Japan will then lack a Christian apex in women's education, as they do today in the education of men.

A DIVORCE IN BOOZEVILLE. According to the Chicago Tribune of January 27, the powerful brewing interests of Chicago will not only not oppose a bill pending in the Illinois legislature to prohibit the sale within the state of beverages containing more than ten per cent. of alcohol, which will stop the sale of whisky, gin, brandy and rum, but will welcome the passage of the bill. The brewers are also said to realize that the character of the average saloon has been the most powerful argument in favor of prohibition, and instead of furnishing lawyers and paying costs of defense of law-breakers, they are now advising their patrons to obey the law in all particulars and refuse to take any part in the defense of offenders.

PROPOSE PARTIAL SUFFRAGE. The report of the Committee on Electoral Reform issued in London on January 30, carried a recommendation by a majority of the committee for the conferring of some measure of woman suffrage. It proposed that the franchise be given to women already entitled to vote in municipal elections, but that women should not vote in parliamentary election until they had attained at least the age of thirty years. Miss Sylvia Pankhurst met this proposal with the statement that women attained maturity, if anything, earlier than men and that the last census showed a majority of women, between twenty and twenty-five years of age, to be earning their own living.

Evangelism and Union Effort

A REVIVAL conference was held in Chicago from January 31 to February 5 inclusive, in commemoration of the eightieth anniversary of the birth of D. L. Moody and the thirtieth of the founding of the Moody Bible Institute. Dean Gray of the Institute presided. In the closing session an appeal for world-wide prayer was given out, signed by the conference speakers, representing many different denominations. It pleads that "in this hour of surpassing sorrow, sin and fearful world tragedy, fellow Christians of every name and in every land may be united in beseeching the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ for mercy and help," and that "the fearful sorrows of this hour may be translated into a blessing, refining, lifting, and unifying the sadly separated children of God, and preparing the world for Kingdom conditions." Men and women, pastors and Christian workers from all parts of the country, filling the Moody Church to the doors, were moved by the power of the Spirit of God, and the cry was voiced from all parts of the house, "O God, renew my commission!" Many men of distinction in the church were present, besides evangelists and rescue mission workers.

C. W. Wade, owner of a department store at Fairfield, Iowa, and A. K. Harper, brush manufacturer of the same city, are respectively president and vice-president of the Business Men's Gospel Team of Fairfield. Organized six years ago, this Gospel Team is now widely known in Iowa and other states for its success in holding union evangelistic campaigns. There are twenty-seven men in the team, among them a member of the Iowa legislature, a banker, an editor, several college professors, and men in various other lines of business. Their work, it is claimed, has been followed by thousands of conversions. They accept no money for their own services.

Berne, Ind., for several years has had union church services during the week of prayer, held morning, afternoon and night. This year the services were held in the Reformed Church in the day time, the speaker being Professor H. D. Penner, of Newton, Kan., and in the evening in the auditorium of the Mennonite Church, the speaker being Dr. M. B. Williams, president of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists. The entire series was remarkable for attendance, interest and results. This plan is within reach of other communities, and would mean a new experience in Christian life and work.

Evangelist Byron J. Clark, of Kansas City, Mo., sends the following report on the system of organization which he uses in his evangelistic work: "First, we endeavor to secure volunteer workers from the various churches united in the work. Then we ask the workers to furnish a list of the names of all the unsaved persons they know in their community. A lieutenant has about six or seven workers, and each worker is given from seven to ten names. The lists of names are exchanged every forty-eight hours, so that each worker may visit every unsaved person assigned to that squad." This is something new in the line of personal-work organization.

The Forsythe Evangelistic party closed a campaign in Milwaukee, which lasted fourteen weeks. A union tabernacle was built on the South Side, and another on the West Side. The results were large, and the whole city was stirred by the movement. After the work had run several weeks one of the largest brewers of the city wrote personal letters to the large stores, asking them to forbid their employees to attend the meetings. This acted as a boomerang, and thousands took up the cudgel in defense of the revival.

Young People's Topics for March 18

Regalvanizing Indifferent Members

Epworth League Topic. Neh. 2 : 17, 18; 3 : 1, 3, 6, 15; Eccles. 9 : 10.

AT every season of revivals we are reasonably sure to see a group of people, fired with a splendid enthusiasm for their newly found Saviour, standing before the altar of the church to be admitted to its membership. It is a happy occasion, and pastor and people are aglow with courage and hope and praise. Even the organ swells with unwonted fervor.

Then a year later you enter the same church and expect to see all this enthusiasm crystallized into service; but more often than not you will find it granulated into indifference.

How shall this indifference be revitalized? First of all, you need a leader. The people of Jerusalem had long lamented the broken walls and ruined temple. For years they had mourned over the fallen estate of the city until Nehemiah came. It had not occurred to any of them to get busy. But Nehemiah first shamed them and then set every man to a definite task, assuring him of the favor of God and the protection of the king. Thus inspired, the people soon had the walls restored, the gates on their hinges, security for their homes and respect for themselves.

We need leaders like Nehemiah. There are folks who are good at stirring up enthusiasm and starting something, but the things they start are like a fire of leaves—a great blaze, a smudge, and a few black flakes on the wind. We need people with staying qualities, who will see the thing through. We need leaders also who can really lead, who know how to set other people at work and how to keep up the enthusiasm for the work. That capable person who can do the whole thing is no leader, is more often a calamity. There are thousands of new Leaguers, earnest, interested, anxious to serve the Lord Christ. We need leadership that will appoint to each one his task, that will be able to crystallize this interest into service, and if things are really being done, indifference will soon be galvanized into action.

The Curse of Cowardice

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. John 18 : 15–27

THE writer of Proverbs said, "The fear of man bringeth a snare, but whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe." Peter may not have known this particular proverb, but he let the fear of men lead him into a snare. Peter had some slight justification, looking at it from a purely human standpoint, for his Lord seemed to be wholly in the power of the authorities, and Peter had no way of knowing what might befall the disciple who should be apprehended. Peter had at least courage enough to follow.

We can't help liking Peter, he is so much like us. One moment, inspired by the Spirit, he declares Jesus the Messiah; at another he, of all the twelve the only one armed, swings his lone sword in defense of his Master; yet before the night is out his courage is out too, and he is a miserable liar, declaring, "I know him not," a craven running from a shadow.

We go to our conventions and we stand and sing, "Where he leads me I will follow," and then we vote "wet" because it will "hurt business" to close the saloons. We stand for our principles like a lone reed in a lake, straight when it's calm and blown under in a gale. Our fears cripple us. The man who is afraid loses what little native strength he has. His arm is withered, his gait halts, his faith wavers, and his voice is feeble and trembles at its own slight sound.

There is a sure specific for such fear. Peter found it just before Pentecost.

"Whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe," says the Proverb. "Lo, I am with you always," says the Christ. "Why should the spirit of man quail before men?"

FREE LESSONS IN MUSIC

Largest School Offers Instruction Gratis to Ambitious Students

An opportunity that will be eagerly seized by ambitious music lovers, both young and old, is being extended this month by the largest school of its kind in America, the U. S. School of Music of New York.

By an entirely new and amazingly simple and easy method for teaching music by mail—a system originated by this institution—more than 240,000 pupils have been successfully trained in their own homes to play the Piano, the Violin, Mandolin, Banjo, Organ, Cornet, Harp, Sight Singing, Guitar, 'Cello, Clarinet, Trombone, Piccolo, Flute.

At a recent meeting of the board of directors the school decided to accept a limited number of new pupils to whom full courses of instruction will be given without charge in order to further advertise this new system for teaching music by mail.

All those who apply at once will be enrolled for free scholarships—only a very small charge being made to cover the expense for postage and the sheet music required for lessons. The school is located at 225 Fifth Avenue, New York City, and any one interested can obtain full particulars simply by addressing a postal to the President, Mr. D. F. Kemp, Dept. 7. (Adv.)

The Poles and Their Religion

By NEVIN O. WINTER

Author of "Russian Empire of Today and Yesterday," "Poland of Today and Yesterday," "Texas the Marvelous," Etc.

"NIECH bendzie pochevalowy Jesus Chrystus" —(Blessed be the Lord Jesus Christ.)

"Na wieki wiekow" (for ages and ages).

Thus one Polish peasant greets another, as his ancestors have done for centuries. This quaint salutation is heard everywhere in the Polish sections of Austria, Germany, and Russia, the peasant always removing his hat in a truly gracious way as he thus greets a noble or a stranger. It is one of the surface indications of the deep religious instinct that seems to be inborn with the Slavic races, and that is found among both Russians and Poles. Devotion to the church of their choice reaches a degree for which it is difficult to find analogies in the New World.

The events now taking place in Europe may result in a realignment of Poland, if not in a reestablishment of her national sovereignty. Independence in a limited degree has been promised by both Russia and Germany. Whatever may be the outcome of the titanic struggle now taking place, the allegiance of at least a part of the Poles is very likely to be transferred to another overlord if the dream of another Poland, so long cherished in the Polish breast, fail of realization. Our sympathies must go out to these downtrodden people, who are so proud of their own ideals. It is only in the Austrian province of Galicia, where so much fighting has taken place, that the Poles have been allowed to breathe freely, speak their own language without fear, and openly educate their children in their beloved tongue. Polish peasants do not shine intellectually, since there has been little opportunity to develop the intellect. But, for that matter, what peasant does? The most of them are not even able to read or write.

On the way to the fields with seed. "The Polish woman of the lower classes has not emerged from the physical and mental slavery of former ages"

As a consequence, the Polish peasant impresses one as being rather slow in both thought and action. But he is not so slow as the Russian peasant, and he has more independence of thought and action than his Slavic brother. This quality sometimes approaches unruliness, a characteristic that, at times, has led Poles into conflict with authorities in the United States, as well as with their own clerical authorities. It has also resulted in the formation of a number of independent Polish Catholic churches on this side of the Atlantic.

The Polish peasant is essentially a tiller of the soil. This has been his occupation during all the preceding generations, and it still continues to be the height of his ambition. His talk is of agriculture, and most of his joys are connected with the different seasons. Most of his food is raised in his own garden or fields. Potatoes are a great staple, and cabbages are almost as important. Beans, corn, and beets add to the larder. Cabbages are much used in making the thick soups so well liked, and a soup is also made of red beets. In summer his costume is simple, consisting only of thin shirt and trousers; but in winter a padded sheepskin coat, with the wool turned inside, is added. To the bare feet are added coarse boots, and to the bare head a hat.

"Do the women do the work of section hands here?" I asked of a fellow traveler as our train was approaching Lemberg, which has been the objective of the contending forces so frequently.

"Yes," he answered, "and they do it exceedingly well." It was only another evidence that the lot of the Polish woman is especially hard. This is noticeable throughout all the Polish provinces of the three dominant countries. They do more than their full share of the family work. The Polish woman of the lower classes has not yet emerged from the physical and mental slavery of former ages. Sometimes one will see more women in the fields than men, and a kaleidoscopic effect of color is then visible. Blue, green, yellow, gold, and silver are mingled in various combinations. They pin up the overskirt, which leaves a bright petticoat exposed to view. This is more true than ever at the present time, for the men are in the armies, frequently fighting each other, because they cannot help themselves. It is no wonder that a girl naturally attractive soon grows old and haggard.

"The cottages are generally of stone or boards plastered over and whitewashed, the roof crowned with growing green moss"

Hard work with little pleasure, and the care of a family, which is generally large, must inevitably leave their mark before many years. At Cracow I have seen them carrying mortar for the masons and plasterers, where new buildings were being erected. They were spading the flower-beds in the parks, and were doing the work as well as the masculine overseer could have done it himself. They can hang paper or paint a house. Along the roads women would be seen carrying heavy bundles, or pushing loaded wheelbarrows. Everywhere they are doing work that involves considerable physical strength. Hence it is that many of these Polish women look haggard and old even before they have passed the third decade of life.

The marriage-day is the one bright spot in the girl's life, since it is made the occasion for festivities, and the ceremony itself is very picturesque. There is music by peasant musicians, who play their liveliest tunes. The whole village turns out on such occasions. Joy and jollity reign supreme for the day.

THE old Polish costumes have disappeared in Russia, but distinctive costumes are still worn. Red or yellow, with alternating green stripes, is most common. The men wear baggy trousers made of the same material as the skirts of the women. In one district, west of Warsaw, every peasant seemed to wear this costume. Some were working in the fields, others walking or driving along the highway. The children looked like little grandfathers or grandmothers, being dressed in exactly the same styles as their elders. The peasants dwell in the quaint villages which are scattered everywhere throughout Poland. The villages of Galicia are especially interesting on Sundays and holidays, when the national costumes are donned. The cottages are generally made of stone or boards plastered over, and are then covered with a coat of whitewash. The straw roof is frequently crowned with green-growing moss, which adds to its picturesque appearance, if not to its healthfulness. Water is drawn from the wells by a long pole balanced near the center. These wells have a decided old-world appearance. The interior of the cottages is usually divided into two rooms. In one room the entire family live, eat and sleep; in the other, in more or less harmonious contentment, dwell the cows, pigs, chickens, and geese. No household would be complete without a number of geese. Around the cottages a number of children are sure to be seen playing. A dozen or twenty or thirty of such cottages, each separated only by a small yard, make up a village. If there is a marriageable daughter in the house, the lintel of the door and the window surroundings are ornamented with little irregular hands, which is a notice to the marriageable young man.

No people look forward to holidays more eagerly than do the Poles. With each holiday is associated some legend or primitive custom. Christmas is an important occasion. The singing of Christmas carols is almost universal, and the Poles sing them well. For several days prior the women are busy fashioning things for the feast on Christmas eve. When the first star appears, the parents and children enter the dining-room. The table is laid as richly as circumstances afford. Under the tablecloth is laid a little hay in memory of the fact that Jesus was born in a manger. On Easter Monday the peasants pour pails of water over each other in a spirit of fun. On Sunday morning the peasants take baskets of eggs, cheese, and bread to the church to have them consecrated for the Easter dinner. This is the most elaborate meal of the year with both nobles and peasants. For several days previous, preparations have been made, and the table is set with the symbolical lamb in the middle.

"The Polish peasant . . . impresses one as being rather slow in both thought and action"

A DEEP religious instinct seems to be inborn with the Slav peasants, both Russian and Pole. The only difference is the form of his religion, for practically all the Poles are adherents of the Church of Rome. With both races religion and patriotism are closely intertwined. The Slav temperament seems to be particularly susceptible to religious impressions, and devotion to the church reaches a degree for which it is difficult to find analogies in any other part of modern Europe. In the daily life of the Polish peasant, the name of Christ and the Virgin will be heard repeatedly. He would not think of living in a house that had not been blessed by a priest. A manufacturer would find it difficult to keep his hands if the factory had not been blessed. A theater would die from lack of patronage if the priestly blessing had been denied the building. The Pole is probably the most faithful of all the adherents of the Church of Rome.

In the old capital of Cracow one will find a shrine in almost every block, and at many of the prominent street intersections. In the country they rise up in the most unexpected places. Some of them are simply weather-stained wooden crosses, which stand erect among the fields, while others have an image of the Saviour or Virgin. Some of the plaster figures are most incongruous, and are so crude as to be really absurd. The Polish peasant is not satisfied with his worship in the churches, but he must bow himself at all of the shrines which he may pass.

One can only speculate as to the cause of this religious enthusiasm. It may be that the contest with Mohammedanism brought out these traits, and intensified the devotion of the masses to their own church. While other people were attracted more or less by different faiths, and were affected to a greater or less degree by the currents of the Reformation, the Poles remained faithful to their church, for which they were always ready to fight and die. For the church they would willingly draw the sword. To be a good Pole, one must be a good Christian; and in order to be a good Christian, one must be a good Catholic. It is almost pitiful to see the desperation with which the Polish peasants cling to what seem to a Westerner to be antiquated religious forms, and into the observance of which they seem to throw their whole soul. The men in the churches will almost equal the women in numbers, and they seem fully as absorbed in their devotions.

The devotion of the Polish peasants is most noticeable in the churches. Worshipers prostrated upon the floor, and sometimes stretched out to represent the cross, may be seen at almost any time. On the great days of church celebrations, it is difficult at times to move about among the swaying and recumbent forms of the worshipers without trampling upon some one or more. Occasionally a worshiper may become afflicted with some form of hysteria; some venerable man may beat his head upon the stone floor in his agony of spirit, while others will be afflicted with such depression that they become absolutely dumb. Children are early taught to do the various acts of homage. The sacred images are all worn smooth by the osculations of the devoted worshipers, while the stones underneath are worn into hollows by their genuflections. Every conceivable device is employed by the clergy to obtain and retain control of the simple mind of the peasant.

The most holy city in Poland is Czenstochowa, which is in Russian Poland, and about half way between Cracow and Warsaw. There is nothing attractive about it, except the evidences of religious devotion. When the Swedes invaded Poland, these Northern hosts captured Warsaw and Cracow. The king fled at first, but finally rallied his forces and defeated the invaders at this holy city of Czenstochowa, in 1655. The victory was due, according to the belief of the Poles, to the direct intervention of the Virgin Mother. For that reason the image which resides in this church is supposed to have a special holiness. The image itself is decorated with many precious stones, among which are diamonds, rubies, emeralds, topazes, and pearls—scarcely any precious stone is missing. Above the picture, a massive gold crown stands out conspicuously. Many miracles are believed to have been performed here, and the Virgin is credited with several personal visitations.

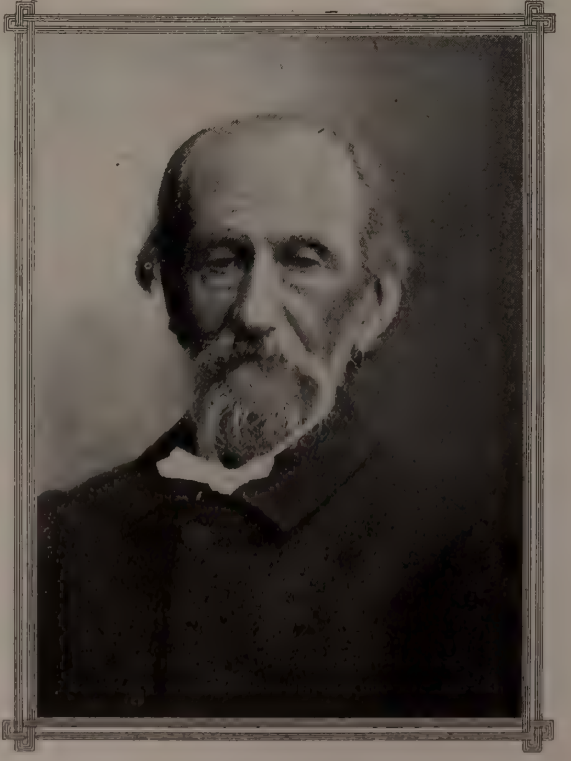
It is a wonderful privilege for a Pole to be permitted to make a pilgrimage to Czenstochowa. No sacrifice is too great to be made in order to accomplish the journey. He will walk day after day, suffer cold and hunger, and remain here, patiently and uncomplainingly, for hour after hour during the ceremonies of the special festal occasions.

Andrew Murray: the Mystic of South Africa

THE death in South Africa of the venerable Andrew Murray removes from the sphere of mortal affairs one whose influence, cast wholly on the side of truth and righteousness, may without any exaggeration be described as having belted the globe. During the entire period covered by the lifetime of the present generation this man of gentle spirit and consecrated life furnished tens of thousands of people in all parts of the world—people who never saw his face or heard his voice—with an incentive to individual devotion and the attainment of a lofty conception of Christian profession and responsibility such as few men of our time have been permitted to exercise. Wordsworth sings of the "harvest of a quiet eye." Murray's was the harvest of a quiet heart. His own soul abode in quietness and confidence, and from his spiritual habitation of security and peace he taught men everywhere how to stand still and see the salvation of God; to wait patiently on the Lord; to trust, and not be afraid.

Andrew Murray was born of Scotch parentage in Graaf Reinet, South Africa, in 1828. Sent to Scotland for his education, he, together with his brother, graduated from Marischal College, Aberdeen. He then proceeded to Holland, entered Utrecht as a theological student, completed a three-year course of study, became ordained, and returned to South Africa when barely twenty years old. He was at once sent by the Synod of the Dutch Reformed Church as a missionary to the Boers in the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, the "parish" allotted to him being about twice the size of England. Here the next seven years were passed in arduous and incessant labor, which, together with an attack of malarial fever, broke down his health and compelled his being sent to Europe to recruit. Returning to South Africa, Murray put in three more years across the Orange River, after which he received and accepted a call to Worcester, Cape Colony. While in that charge the wave of revival fervor which, rising in America, swept over Great Britain, eventually reached the shores of South Africa. The spiritual impetus which resulted led to Murray's commencing to write those gems of devotional literature through which he became so justly famous—books which became a sort of spiritual heritage for English-speaking Protestantism throughout the world.

It was during his ministry here that he was chosen moderator of his church. A vacancy occurring in the Cape Town church, he accepted a call, and labored in that position for seven years; but the strain of the collegiate system and joint pastorate was too great for him, and he finally took a smaller charge at Wellington. His congregation was partly composed of French Huguenots, and here, in 1874, inspired by the life of Mary Lyon, he founded the Huguenot seminary for girls on the principle of Mount Holyoke College, which he visited America in order to inspect. Dr. Murray took an active part in the home and foreign missions of his church, and a sense of the need of workers led to his starting a Mission Training College, where young men were trained in mission work and teaching. He was also president of the South African General Mission, formed in 1894. This work was undenominational, among Jews, Africans, Hindus, and Europeans, and was under an executive board in South Africa and a council in England.



In 1893, Dr. Murray visited England, and during his six months' stay conducted a series of meetings which for spiritual intensity have rarely been equaled in that country. A lasting impression for good remained, and to this very hour a stream of blessing flows through the British Isles, whose head-waters were Andrew Murray's meetings and ministry.

Great as is the abiding influence of Andrew Murray's life and labors through the medium of the spoken word, it is as a writer of devotional literature that it attains its highest value. During the past twenty-five years three men have excelled in this difficult and peculiar ministry—one an American, one a South African, one an Englishman. Their names are J. R. Miller, Andrew Murray, and F. B. Meyer.

IT is not the purpose or province of this article to institute a comparison of the work of these three great devotional writers. It is concerned only with Murray's. His is, indeed, a wonderful list. Of his many books, each containing a message for the burdened heart, what can be said? Many, if not most, of us have read one or another of his earlier volumes: "Abide in Christ"—first written in Dutch, and afterward translated into English—or "The Holiest of All," a remarkable exposition of the consecrated life. Then there is "The Two Covenants," in the preface of which the author asks the reader whether he is really seeking to find out exactly what God wants him to be, and is willing that he should be. This, indeed, is the object of all Murray's writings. His intense interest in missionary work is set forth in "The Ministry of Intercession" and "With Christ in the School of Prayer," while the intense desire he ever displayed for the experiencing by every believer of the higher life is exemplified in "The Spirit of Christ" and "The Full Blessing of Pentecost."

In these and many other volumes Andrew Murray leaves his rich bequest to the world. It is not possible to place an adequate appraisement on the legacy; it is not easy to estimate the value of the quiet, assuring, triumphant message of Andrew Murray.

The Women's Battle for Bread

By ARTHUR H. HOWLAND

"HAVE they enough to eat?" I asked.

"How should they have enough to eat?" the mother answered. "They never in their lives had enough to eat."

And their faces and bodies showed it. Four little children, who ought to be plump, rosy-cheeked and happy-eyed, huddling about their mother and looking up with their pale, pale faces and wondering, patient eyes at the visitors who had come in out of the snowy night to talk with them.

In the bedroom just off the kitchen their father lay slowly dying. He has been in bed for two years. The rooms were neat and clean. The tired, thin little white-faced mother looks after that. But the days and nights wear along, telling the same changeless tale of misery and hunger.

Food—mountains of it, near at hand. But these children year after year are pinched and hungry.

Such is the family of Wolfe Lustig, at 328 Henry Street, New York. The family is on the list of the United Hebrew Charities, and that organization pays the room rent—$10.50 a month—and allows the mother four dollars a week for food, clothing, medicine and other necessities. So when potatoes jump to ten cents a pound, and meat and sugar and onions and other kitchen supplies go up correspondingly, the cruel problem of finding enough for the children, the dying father and her weary self becomes crueler still.

A little nearer East Broadway, at 302 Henry Street, is a family whose trials are slightly different and a little less. It is the family of Isidore Shantzsky. Here the children smile and look well. Such handsome, lovable little rascals they are—Malte, aged 9; Michael, 8; Eva, 6; Becky, 4, and Selah—in the baby carriage. Isidore is a painter, but that work is scarce in winter, and he does not seem to know how to find another job. Further, the mother is sickly, and much of the housework is left to Isidore's unwomanly hands. Two stifling rooms—for the seven of them. This family will not apply for charity.

What do they eat? Bread—bread, and water that they try to make taste like tea.

There was a fire in the rough kitchen stove, and a little pile of coal and wood under the table, so we knew they would not be cold for a few days. And a big loaf of bread on the table. But the children—such rare beauty to be clothed in such awkward, pitiful rags! They have some more presentable garments to wear when they go to school—for they all go to school except the baby, but the baby and Becky had no shirts on their soft little bodies. I wondered how these little people fared in colder weather, and if there were times when there was no fire in the stove and no fuel under the table.

But cases like these do not tell the truest story of New York's present strange famine. These are cases such as come ordinarily to the attention of the charity societies and offices. There are always thousands of such cases in New York.

The new situation in New York just now is that so many thousands of families, who ordinarily have enough to provide themselves with needful food, clothing and fuel, suddenly find themselves unable to do so. Mothers who had learned how to manage with the ten, twelve or thirteen dollars a week their husbands earn cannot manage at all under the new conditions, and they are frantic. Worst of all, they are unwilling to let their needs be known because they have always been independent and self-supporting, and cannot bear the thought of appearing as applicants for charity. The two things they will do are to attack the small merchants, who in their eyes are immediately responsible for their distress, and to join in public demonstrations demanding wholesale relief.

Two such cases came under my personal observation, and I know they are typical of the many of which we have been reading and hearing—the thousands of New York homes that are rising in revolt against new records set by that ambitious aspirant for new records—the High Cost of Living.

The rumor came one afternoon that a woman had been killed by the police during a food riot in the Bronx. The report was that she had been carried to a hospital after the riot and had died there. I called up the hospital by telephone and was told, after some delay, that the woman had been sent home that morning. I asked for her address, was at first told that the hospital did not have it, and after a little urging on my part was furnished with an address on Fulton Avenue. The number given proved to be a vacant lot. Then began a long chase, which ended in another hospital than the one to which the woman had first been taken and in finding that she was still alive. The family's correct address was given in a morning newspaper printed in Yiddish. I had gone there, groped my way through several dark basements, and was told that the woman's children were being cared for by a neighbor next door.

I found the children, Dorothy, nine years old, and Sadie, four. Sam Blumenthal and his wife were eating their supper. Mrs. Blumenthal had learned that the injured woman had been taken from the first hospital to a police court; that she had collapsed there and had been taken to another hospital. I asked her to tell me frankly about the famine. Were the people really suffering?

Surely the people were suffering; surely it was hard. This poor woman who had been hurt had found a woman crying the other morning at the market. She asked what the matter was, and was told that the woman did not have enough pennies to get the things she had come to buy for the day's needs. So Mrs. Kibble had counted out fourteen pennies from her own scant store and given them to the grateful woman. Mrs. Blumenthal herself had been accosted by a woman as she was returning from market, who begged her for a few potatoes. She divided with her her little store of the precious vegetables.

At the hospital I was told that Mrs. Kibble had been brought there at three o'clock in the morning. The doctor in charge of her case could not account for her collapse, not finding any signs of fracture on her skull. After a few days I went back to the hospital and learned that the woman had been sent home. This time I found her weak, pale, tottering and so little—this woman whom a policeman had accused of assault. Little Sadie came in, and a little later the kind-hearted neighbor and together they told me the story. The judge before whom she had appeared at last merely looked at her, and told her to go home, without even listening to the policeman's complaint. That was Magistrate Matthew Breen, and I like to put his name down as the name of a kind-hearted judge who doesn't forget to be gentle.

The women's version of the story was that Mrs. Kibble stood watching while the riot went on, and saw a policeman push a woman through a window. She said to him: "You ought not to do that." After putting the injured woman under arrest, he came back to Mrs. Kibble, beat her with his club on head and mouth, and she fell bleeding to the sidewalk. These are the sort of things the women of New York are suffering in their efforts to make an effectual protest against the strange pressure of conditions they cannot comprehend, but which they know are threatening to destroy them and their homes.

An investigator for the New York Times reported the other day that "Among those persons who have no regular income of at least ten dollars a week, or who are dependent upon the charity of neighbors or organizations, bread and tea are the only meals known. Some poor families on the lower East side have had herrings occasionally, but the price of fish of that kind has doubled in the last few months.

This visitor reports the case of Gustav Neubert, of 527 West Fifty-second Street. "They have had nothing to eat but bread and tea for so many weeks that Mrs. Neubert says she cannot remember just how long. The father is a longshoreman. When illness does not prevent him from working he is able to make $10 or $12 a week. Even then the family has a hard time to keep above the level of complete destitution.

Next day, while I was at the office of the Mothers' Anti-High Price League, a delegation of Jewish butchers came to confer about plans. The women, even those who could afford it, have been for some time refusing to buy chickens and fish, onions and potatoes. One thousand butchers in different sections of the city had determined to close their shops as a protest both to the wholesale dealers and to the public, hoping to force the mothers to terms.

For the women are conducting a genuine boycott, and they and their leaders are determined to break the power of wholesalers and middlemen, and are urging at Albany an amendment to the city charter to make it possible for the city to open community stores where food may be sold at cost, thus forcing the private dealers, both wholesale and retail, to fairer terms.

SEEING THE INVISIBLE

A SERMON By JUNIUS B. REMENSNYDER[*]

Text, II Kings 6:17, "And Elisha prayed, and said, Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw; and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."

"THE entrance of thy Word giveth light," says the psalmist. No book in the world is so full of the light of truth as the Bible. God's word has more illumination for the mind and more food for the heart than any volume the mere product of man's greatest genius. This is not only true of the New Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, but it is also true of the words of Jehovah in the Old Testament. There are three things notable about the Old Testament.

FIRST, it is a Revelation. This is what it purports to be. It does not profess to be the work of some gifted writer, moralist or philosopher, seeking to entertain the reader. It is no attempt of a great thinker to solve the hard problems of life. There are many such books to be read with interest and profit, and which have given their writers deathless fame. But the Old Testament stands quite apart from all these in a unique class by itself. In it God and not man speaks. It brings us a voice from the eternities. He who made the mind here parts the clouds, sealed from the beginning, and gives us messages from the infinite.

The attempt of some skeptical critics to prove that the Old Testament is an evolution and not a revelation is a lamentable failure. Evolution is a growth from a lower to a higher stage, a development from an incomplete to a perfect type. But Scripture exactly reverses this process. It begins at once in the noblest and most perfect form. The first verse: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," reveals more of God as a personal Creator than all the ages had discovered. The first chapter of Genesis, unfolding the origin of the universe, is the sublimest ever penned, striking earth's greatest philosophers dumb with awe. To call the Bible an evolution, it would have to be a backward process. Revelation alone explains the Book of books. It gives us truths from the mind, the heart, the mouth of God.

AGAIN, the Old Testament is a prophecy. It heralds a better age to come. It is a preparation. It looks forward to a consummation of a great divine purpose. It proclaims but the dawn of the fulness of time. It foretells the era of light, truth and grace. It points to the day-spring from on high visiting men. It makes ready the way for the coming of God's only begotten Son. Notable proofs of this are given in the greatest of Old Testament prophets, Isaiah. In his ninth chapter, so vivid and wonderful a prophecy is given of our Lord's nativity, that the church has appointed it as the chief Christmas lesson.

And in his fifty-third chapter Isaiah gives so minute a description of Christ's sufferings and vicarious sacrifice on the cross,—"he was wounded for our transgressions" and "the chastisement of our peace was upon him"—that it exactly voices the sentiments of the season of Lent.

AND thirdly, the Old Testament is a history. It is a record of God's dealings with his people. It shows him time and again revealing himself to them, and taking a hand in their fortunes. Once he appears to lead them out of some wilderness; again, to reprove them for their sins; at another time, to extricate them from some danger. Ever does he go before them as the Shepherd of Israel. Thus it is a history of the providence of God in dealing with his people. And it is this third feature which gives the Old Testament so perennial an interest, and makes its study so practically helpful for us. In this Scriptural history, in these thrilling narratives, we see God's dealing with men, we learn his providential ways, and we know how to expect him to act with us.

Of all these historic incidents related in the Old Testament, it seems to me this one we have chosen for our text is one of the most suggestive and beautiful. Elisha was one of the very greatest of the Old Testament prophets, the mantle of that prince of them all, Elijah, having fallen upon him when Elijah ascended into heaven. The king of Syria, warring against the king of Israel, found that his most secret military plans were revealed to the king of Israel by Elisha, and thus frustrated. So he sent a great army to Dothan to capture him. When Elisha's attendant saw this mighty host surrounding them, feeling altogether helpless he cried, "Alas, my master, what shall we do!" Elisha answered, "Fear not; they that be with us are more than they that be with them." And then, to quiet his servant's astonishment at this answer, Elisha prayed. "Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes that he may see; and the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw; and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."

The great truth revealed here is the fact of an invisible world. This material world which we see, touch and feel, we are certain of. We know it exists, and we shape and mold our lives with respect to its wants, needs and uses. But we are spirit as well as body, and so we live amid two worlds; there is another world than this outer, material one. All around and about us lies an invisible world. We are inhabitants of a world seen and of a world unseen; a world of time and a world of eternity. This invisible world, too, is peopled. A whole concourse of existences and agencies fill it that we never dream of. They are, also, of a higher type and quality than any earthly ones. These are symbolized here by "horses and chariots of fire." What a splendid vision it must have been to behold these mountain peaks crowned with these majestic chargers, radiating light and breathing fire from their nostrils as they bore the celestial armies in chariots glittering like the sun! So very near, all the while, lies this larger and mightier invisible world not of earth, but of heaven, a world of spirit, of another life, of God, of cherubim and seraphim, of angels and archangels, and of the spirits of just men made perfect, that is, our sainted dead. And this world is just as real, just as true, just as certain, as is this visible one in which we have our present temporal life.

The other great truth taught by this grand Old Testament scene is the providence of God over his servants. This is shown in a marvelous and wonderful manner. When Elisha, without sword or shield, is surrounded by mail-clad barbarous hosts, so that by all material tests his death is imminent, he is really not in the slightest danger. But, unseen to the physical eye, the mountains round about him are "full of horses and chariots of fire" set for his defense. He is then absolutely secure. It is not in the power of his enemies to touch a hair of his head. This is only in accord with God's promise. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him and delivereth them." God, who rules over the armies of heaven, will not have his righteous will thwarted on the earth. He loves his servants. He declares that he is their heavenly Father, and that they are his sons and daughters. And nothing is allowed to happen to them contrary to his loving will. No scheme of enemy, no matter how artfully laid; no might of foe, no matter how superior in force; no malice, no matter how fierce and bitter, can harm the hem of their garments, unless God sees that it is best to permit it. Though, then, the universe quake with throes of terror, though devils fill earth, sea and sky, yet above it all sounds the proclamation of the mighty angel: "Hurt not those having the seal of the living God in their foreheads." The powers and forces of the invisible world are incomparably stronger than those of this finite one. And so the pious soul can ever calmly say: "I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." God and his holy angels girdle me with a cordon of fire.

REMEMBRANCE

I thank my God upon every remembrance of you.
Phil. 1 : 3.

"I WANT you to know you are never forgotten.
That the old, old days hid in memory sweet
Are still a part of my life that I cherish,
Without them so much would be incomplete.
And you are mixed up with so much I remember.
Your name so often I utter in prayer;
Never forgotten, on earth or in heaven,
Always the child of God's tenderest care.

"I want you to know you are never forgotten,
That my thoughts and my prayers are folding you round;
Rest in his promises, go where he sends you,
Do what he bids you, faithful be found.
Look up and trust him, a new year is dawning.
Stretch out your hand and take his today:
Bought by him, loved by him, never forgotten,
Hid in his heart forever and aye."

Author Unknown.

HOW do we come at, realize, make a practical fact in our lives, of this great truth of revelation? That question this Biblical narrative answers. When Elisha's servant was stunned with alarm, the prophet prayed: "O Lord, I pray thee open his eyes that he may see." It is therefore in answer to prayer that the secrets of this other and greater world about us are revealed. And still another factor is faith. With our physical eye we see this world of matter and sense, but with the eye of faith we behold God and the invisible spirit world.

The eleventh chapter of Hebrews is a most remarkable illustration of this point. It opens with the verse: "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." And then follows a long series of Old Testament saints who illustrated this fact in disregarding and rejecting outward prizes and temptations for the higher, better and more enduring things beheld by their inward eye. The greatest of these saints is Moses, of whom it is said: "By faith Moses refused to be made heir to the throne of Pharaoh, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God; for he endured as seeing him who is invisible." By faith and prayer, then, a rational readiness to believe in this environing spiritual world, and a holy longing and prayer to gaze into its blessed secrets, its glories will become visible to our soul's rapt eye. One of the greatest thinkers thus tells us that in his childhood, falling asleep after a season of meditation and prayer, he had a dream that he saw God. "His mantle covered the heavens, and I slept under it with tranquil peace." So vivid, he says, was this vision that he could not doubt its reality, and it, constantly recurring, colored all his thoughts of life.

THE great lesson of this majestic Biblical narrative is the closeness with which we are surrounded by a spiritual world. It is just as real as this visible one. Its inhabitants are spiritual personalities far stronger and mightier than we who are flesh and blood. They do the will of God in heaven, and they hold themselves ready at the command of the Almighty King to do his will upon the earth. And our fortunes are very much more in the keeping of these invisible hosts than they are dependent upon the earthly causes and forces that we see, and that man is blind who walks through life without recognizing this fact. We need then to have our spiritual eyes opened, that we may see and take into our plans and purposes this invisible world that everywhere overarches and presses upon us. "Our inner vision thus needs to be opened to see God in Nature as the greatest thinkers and poets and mystics have done—God with his love and wisdom and power. One man looks abroad over God's world, and sees neither its beauty nor its Maker in it. A second looks over the same scene and sees the beauty in it but not its Maker. But a third looks, and he is like Elisha's servant: his eyes are opened, and he sees in Nature what neither of the others has seen; he beholds God dropping its beauty from his hand, and the mountains aflame with horses and chariots of fire, commissioned to do his will upon the earth.

If we could thus behold the spiritual world as we do the natural, we should find that every life is held in God's hand, every faculty kept, every step taken, and every work done, under the surveillance of a power higher than our own. Carlyle thus wrote: "My belief in a special providence grows yearly stronger, unsubduable, impregnable." Could we but realize this plain, undeniable fact—this reality of a superimposed spiritual world—it would give us a courage, a confidence and a comfort such as nothing else can bestow. It was because of this clear insight into the spiritual world, and because he saw the invisible hosts of God guarding him, that Luther could write that wonderful letter to the elector Frederick, who had warned him not to leave the Wartburg fortress, as Duke George would certainly kill him. Luther wrote in reply: "I will leave, though it rain Duke Georges for nine days and nights; for I can rather protect you, as I am under the guardianship of a far mightier Power than your imperial highness." And he did leave, and no one hurt him. It was this vision of the unseen world Joan of Arc had beheld in her far-off simple village home at Domremy, which, recurring to her again, enabled her to cry, as the terrible furnace of fire engulfed her shrinking limbs, "Jesus, Jesus, my voices!" Said Borden Parker Bowne: "No one knows what it is to walk with God in the deepest sense, who has not walked with him in the dark."

OF especial comfort is this Old Testament lesson for those in sorrow, those smitten by some sharp blow of adversity or bereavement, which has left them desolate, stunned, crushed, or those beset by a fiery sea of calamities. It teaches such not to lose heart, or sink down in despair. But let them open their spiritual eye of faith, and they will see God's glittering hosts and heavenly ministers all round about for their defense.

But this Old Testament scene is also a great, wonderful and blessed truth for us in all the experiences of life. It is the worldly man, who sees only with his carnal eye, who is impractical, and who must fall in his blindness. But the Christian, with true vision, sees two worlds, and walking by the invisible, the God who saved endangered Elisha will be his preserver in life and in death.

Every Month

SUNDAY, March 18. Rev. 22 : 2. "The tree of life, which . . . yielded her fruit every month." Then, if the Tree of Life yielded her harvest every month, in whatever season we come to it we shall find congenial fruit. In this the Tree of Life is unlike every other tree. In the life of every other tree there are months in which it yields no fruit. There are months when it seems as if there would be spring no more, "that nature's ancient power is lost." And again there are months in which we have only the promise of fruit, a preliminary green, or an early sourness which foretells a mellow harvest later on. But the Tree of Life distinguishes every month with ripened bounty. It meets us according to our season, and the fruit it offers always corresponds to our need.

Then the Tree of Life has treasure for life's May-time. We are, perhaps, much inclined to speak about our religion as though it had only specifics for the reprobate, for those who have wasted their substance in riotous living. We make it appear as though we have only cordials for the fainting, heartsease and rue for those who are broken and bruised. We emphasize one month and not every month. But the Tree of Life has fruit for young love's May-time. It offers juicy nourishment for the sunny days of vision and dream. For the dancing season it is a veritable vine of exhilaration. It has young things for young hearts. Yes, indeed, it is a Tree of Life bearing fruit for those who "through their hearts today feel the gladness of the May." "The joy of the Lord is your strength."

And so it is with the autumnal months. The Tree of Life does not offer May diet for September souls. Our autumnal month will find congenial fruit. In September some of the May visions begin to appear like idle dreams. The bright programs which we hoped to accomplish by June seem to be even further from fulfilment at the end of August. Things are now sobering very fast. The sere and yellow days are upon us. Well, the Tree of Life yields her fruit in these later months. The Tree of Life meets us in our autumn and offers us the fruit of yet nobler hopes, fruit of marvelously rich reconciliations, fruit bursting with abounding grace, fruit that revives and restores the soul and renews our youth like the eagle.

And what if life has its winter months? What if there come icy airs, and pitiless blasts, and cruel snows? Will the Tree of Life be bare? Nay, it yieldeth its fruit every month, in winter months as well as in the genial months of summer. It has fruit of wonderful virtue for our wintry days, even "the joy of the Lord," "the peace that passeth all understanding," "the consolations of God," "and hope that maketh not ashamed." And so every month has its bounty, for in every month grace has its crown.

The Perfect Law of Liberty

MONDAY, March 19. James 1 : 25. "But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed." James in this verse employs a phrase which is not applicable to any body of law known in human jurisprudence. He speaks of a "perfect law." Where shall such a law be found? Not in the code of Solon or of Lycurgus; not in the Roman law, or the Code Napoleon; not in the English common law, nor in our federal Constitution, nor in the statutes of any state or of any city. The history of legislation is a history of compromise and repeal. The Court of Appeals in New York was formerly called the Court for the Correction of Errors.

There is but one law of which it may be said it is perfect, and that is contained in the Holy Scriptures. It is not the Mosaic law, though that was the most perfect code for the age in which it was given. The Levitical law was neither universal in its application nor permanent in its duration. It was imperfect, incomplete. Christ came to complete it. He said, "I am come to fulfil the law." An apostle says, "The law was our schoolmaster to lead us to Christ." A schoolmaster is helpful for a time, but we do not take our schoolmasters with us through life. The law of the schoolroom no longer binds us when we become men and women, but it is of value to us in so far as it has helped us to acquire power to meet and master the problems of life.

The perfect law of liberty, and the only perfect law, is that of Christ. Briefly stated, it is the law of love. This is his statement of it: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God . . . and thy neighbor as thyself." This is the royal law, incomparable and divine.

Faith, Hope and Charity

TUESDAY, March 20. I Cor. 13 : 13. "And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity." Paul's eulogy on love, which makes I Cor. 13 one of the beauty spots in the garden of the Scriptures, must be read to the end to be fully appreciated. Full-orbed Christianity requires Faith, Hope, Charity, these three. Not any one of these, to the neglect or disparagement of the others; but each of these in a divinely ordered proportion and in the liveliest cooperation. Faith must lay hold of the facts and principles of the religion of Jesus Christ as they are set down in his Word, and must never suffer these facts to be destroyed or perverted by doubt or denial. This is the fundamental requisite.

Hope must reach out for the promises which the Lord proposes to the faith of his followers. Hope must picture to the Christian the full realization of blessings only imperfectly seen and held now. Faith plants its foot on the records of the past; Hope prepares to take a confident stride into the future.

But lest all this appear as a rather selfish procedure, the apostle has joined both the faith and the hope of the Christian to Love—the love which he has described in detail and extolled in the preceding verses. Love out of gratitude to him who first loved us gives expression in a thousand practical forms to the truths which Faith has grasped and which Hope expects to realize fully in the final consummation. Love lives in the present. Love is joyous, energetic, untiring service of God and men, and sheds a heavenly luster on the whole activity of the confessor of Christ as he tries to meet the obligations which his twofold relation to God and to his fellow men imposes on him.

Faith ceases when it becomes sight; Hope is turned into reality when it reaches fruition. Love remains forever.

Obstacles and Purpose

WEDNESDAY, March 21. John 21 : 17. "Lovest thou me?" A certain person, giving his testimony in meeting, said: "I know what religion is by a painful experience of ten years." He was like one of New York City's early clergymen, who was sure that when he died he would go straight to perdition. A clerical friend said to him: "What is the first thing you will do when you get among the lost?" He replied, "I will immediately proceed to organize a prayer meeting."

There is a class of melancholy Christians who are ever troubled with a morbid introspection, a searching after infinitesimal defects, which are often magnified into sins worthy of condemnation. They deny themselves the Holy Communion and the joy of the Lord, until they come to find a kind of comfort in sorrowful scrutiny.

The moment Peter began to look at himself and the rolling billows, he began to sink; looking to Jesus saved him. After Peter's awful denial of Christ and his repentance, the Master said to him, "Lovest thou me?" Here is the test of discipleship—not some little failure magnified into largeness, but What is the trend of your being? When you stumble, is your face toward Christ? Then you can exclaim, "Thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." Love is the master passion of the soul. Here is the evidence of your salvation. Would you die for Jesus' sake? Is he the Alpha and Omega of your ambition? Do you love him, his church and his followers? Then you are his child indeed and in truth.

The League of Pity

THURSDAY, March 22. Matt. 9 : 36. "But when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion for them, because they were distressed and scattered as sheep not having a shepherd." Pity is peculiarly a Christian virtue. Each of its constituent parts is one of the fruits of the Spirit—love, condescension and the impulse to serve. These united, we have one emotion, rather, let us say, one motive, which is among the indispensable qualifications for membership in the Kingdom of God on earth.

Think of Christ's first miracle. It was an act of pity. Shortly after the marriage feast at Cana, there was another miracle. A woman lay sick of a fever; Christ pitied her and spoke the word which drove the hectic flushes from the purpling cheek, and the fluttering heart beat again in unvexed rhythm. Is not this the story of almost every miracle? Did not pity prompt them all? He pitied the widow about to lay away from her gaze forever her only treasure. He pitied the lepers and the blind, and those who had lost the kindly light of reason. Most of all he pitied the poor puppet on the throne, the man who wanted to do right but was too weak to resist the mob. Whom did Jesus not pity? He pitied the man who betrayed him; he pitied the women who brought spices to his tomb; he pitied Thomas; the vacillating Peter great overgrown boy, brave one minute and coward the next. He pitied the empty-handed fishermen after a night of fruitless toil. He pitied his brother James, who, like Thomas, was a doubter; and to convince James, Jesus appeared before him in spiritual body.

What is the lesson of it all? It is summed up in the Master's own words, "Follow me." And in Paul's words, "Let the mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus."

Godly and Human

FRIDAY, March 23. Heb. 5 : 8, 9. "Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; and being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him." In the study of the redemptive work of Christ we are confronted with a mystery that will never be explained to our logic. The Scriptures clearly teach the divinity of Jesus, but just as emphatically they assert his true and perfect humanity. On his human side the Son of God had to learn his lesson of obedience like any other human being. No demand of the law was lessened, none of its rigor was mitigated for him. He had taken man's place under the law, and according to the terms of the law God proceeded to deal with him until he had met every requirement of the law and was perfect.

Our salvation was not to be achieved by a fiat of the Almighty, but by a carefully thought-out plan which would meet the claims of God's justice and at the same time serve the ends of his mercy. Our redemption was earned by much labor and sorrow of the Son of God, who to that end had become the Son of man.

Before the tribunal of God Christ can appeal to the record of his obedience and ask the release of sinners on the merit of the righteousness which he acquired and the penalties which he suffered for them.

The sinner who follows with wonder and awe the earthly career of his Lord from Bethlehem to Calvary ought to regard his salvation as doubly assured, because both God and man have labored to achieve it. Jesus would be the Author of salvation by his eternal decree of love; he is now become the Author of salvation to us because he has rendered to God that obedience which we had failed to render, and now asks only that we obey him; that is, that we believe the Gospel message of his work for us.

The Divine Gardener

SATURDAY, March 24. John 20 : 15. "Supposing him to be the gardener." Christ has been given many names in the Bible, but none more significant than Mary's unintended name, the "Divine Gardener." The first man, Adam, dwelt in a lovely garden of Edenic beauty. The second Man, Jesus, from the gardens of Paradise came to cultivate soul gardens that they might bring forth fruits and flowers to the glory of the church militant and finally be transplanted into the fields of the church triumphant.

Mary thought him Joseph's gardener, who had given a resting place for the body of her Saviour; but she little thought he was the world's Gardener, who had beautified her own spirit with the white lilies of purity, peace and love. Mary had tried to be her own gardener, but had sadly failed to stop the growth of carnal, thorny briars, poisonous weeds of passion, tares of unholy desire; but when she cast herself at Jesus' feet, weeping the bitter tears of penitence, Mary went forth in the beauty of her Divine Gardener.

Do we not all need the care, the cultivation, the pruning, the grafting, the breaking up of the fallow ground, at the hand of our celestial Gardener? Then we shall bear fruit unto life eternal, and we shall beautify Paradise regained with the perennial flowers of hope, faith and love, like those planted on that Easter morning in the soul garden of Mary Magdalene.

THE PRESIDENT DELIVERING HIS INAUGURAL ADDRESS

The Inauguration of 1917

WASHINGTON was bright with flags and bunting; along both sides of Pennsylvania Avenue white pillars bore gilded eagles; but the inauguration of 1917 was not a gay affair. The army being largely on border duty, and the National Guard either there or recently returned home, there was not the usual military display. The events of the last five weeks, the President's request for power, the debates in the Senate, the feeling that the nation stood on the crumbling edge of the chasm of conflict—all these combined to create for this inaugural an atmosphere of soberness such as befitted a nation struggling to remain at peace yet fearful of war. For the first time since the second inauguration of Abraham Lincoln, the line of march of the parade was guarded, the Twelfth and Sixty-ninth New York regiments lining Pennsylvania Avenue from the Capitol to the White House as the President went by. Mr. Wilson left the White House for the formal ceremony at eleven o'clock going to the east front of the Capitol, where he took the formal oath of office, the real oath having been taken at noon on Sunday, March 4, in the President's Room at the Capitol. The Bible used for the sealing of the oath opened at the Forty-Sixth Psalm. Significant indeed are the opening words: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea."

In his inaugural address, President Wilson said he would not attempt to review the important events of the last four years, but would deal rather with the present and the immediate future. The war has set its mark upon the minds, the industries, commerce, politics and social action of America. One result has been to draw us close together as a nation. In all this experience, our ideals have not been forgotten. "We have been deeply wronged upon the seas, but we have not wished to wrong or injure in return. As some of the injuries done us have become intolerable, we have still been clear that we wished nothing for ourselves that we were not ready to demand for all mankind—fair dealing, justice, the freedom to live and be at ease against organized wrong. . . . We have been obliged to arm ourselves to make good our claim to a certain minimum of right and of freedom of action. We stand firm in armed neutrality, since it seems that in no other way we can demonstrate what it is we insist upon and cannot forego.

"We may even be drawn on by circumstances, not by our own purpose or desire, to a more active assertion of our rights as we see them and a more immediate association with the great struggle itself. But nothing will alter our thoughts or our purpose. . . . We desire neither conquest nor advantage. We wish nothing that can be had only at the cost of another people.

"We are provincials no longer," the address continues. "The tragical events of the thirty months of vital turmoil through which we have just passed have made us citizens of the world. There can be no turning back. Our own fortunes as a nation are involved, whether we would have it so or not. And yet we are not the less Americans on that account. We shall be the more American if we but remain true to the principles in which we have been bred." These principles are the peace of the world, the political stability of free peoples, the equality of all nations in the matter of right or privilege; that peace cannot securely or justly rest upon an armed balance of power; that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, that the seas should be equally free and safe for all nations, that national armaments should be limited to the needs of national order and domestic safety, and that it is essential to the preservation of peace that every nation should sternly repress and prevent any attempts by its own citizens to encourage or assist revolution in other states.

In closing, the President said: "I stand here and have taken the high and solemn oath to which you have been audience because the people of the United States have chosen me for this august delegation of power and have by their gracious judgment named me their leader in affairs. I know now what the task means. I realize to the full the responsibility which it involves. I pray God I may be given the wisdom and the prudence to do my duty in the true spirit of this great people. I am their servant and can succeed only as they sustain and guide me by their confidence and their counsel. The thing I shall count upon, the thing without which neither counsel nor action will avail, is the unity of America—an America united in feeling, in purpose and in its vision of duty, of opportunity and of service.

Power to Arm Ships Is Refused

THE full forces of militarism, rallying in support of the Armed Neutrality Bill and the Army and the Navy Appropriation Bills, made their supreme effort in the last three days of Congress, and were thwarted by the simple expedients of amendments in the House and unlimited debate in the Senate.

Power which had been asked for the President to arm and convoy merchant ships and to use "other instrumentalities and means" to keep open the commerce with the Allies was refused.

President Wilson was bitterly disappointed, and on Sunday night issued a statement in which he said in reference to the Senate opposition: "A little group of wilful men, representing no opinion but their own, have rendered the great government of the United States helpless and contemptible."

In the armed neutrality measure, as passed Thursday in the House, the indefinite and unlimited "other instrumentalities and methods" proposed to be given to the President were withheld, as was also the insurance of arms or munitions, or of ships carrying them to belligerents. The House vote on this was 403 to 13.

Congress and the country were surprised by the wide publication on Thursday morning of a note from Zimmerman, German Secretary of Foreign Affairs, to the German ambassador at Mexico. This is the note:

> On the 1st of February we intend to begin submarine warfare unrestricted. In spite of this, it is our intention to endeavor to keep neutral the United States of America.
> If this attempt is not successful, we propose an alliance on the following basis with Mexico: That we shall make war together and together make peace. We shall give general financial support, and it is understood that Mexico is to reconquer the lost territory in New Mexico, Texas and Arizona. The details are left to you for settlement.
> You are instructed to inform the President of Mexico of the above in the greatest confidence as soon as it is certain that there will be an outbreak of war with the United States, and suggest that the President of Mexico, on his own initiative, should communicate with Japan suggesting adherence at once to this plan; at the same time, offer to mediate between Germany and Japan.
> Please call to the attention of the President of Mexico that the employment of ruthless submarine warfare now promises to compel England to make peace in a few months.

A spectacular and exciting feature was forced into the discussion by the surprising publication of the Zimmerman note. The Senate, being the President's counselor in foreign affairs, took up this matter early Thursday and hotly discussed it until midnight. Senator Lodge, Republican, of Massachusetts, introduced a resolution requesting the President to confirm to the Senate the authenticity of this amazing document and to furnish all information concerning it not incompatible with the public interest. Late at night a response came from the President, enclosing a report from Secretary Lansing, saying that "the government is in possession of evidence which establishes the fact that the note referred to is authentic."

Cable dispatches of Saturday brought from German Secretary Zimmerman an admission that the note is genuine, but was to become effective only in case the United States should become involved in war with Germany.

The bill authorizing the President to furnish arms and convoys to ships and "employ other instrumentalities and means" had not passed the Senate, and on Saturday there appeared from the tone of the debate a growing possibility that it might not pass before the expiration of Congress Sunday noon. In that event, the President, firmly opposed as he was to calling the new Congress into special session, would be forced to do so to gain the power he sought. The feeling was strong in both houses, particularly since the appearance of the Zimmerman note, that Congress ought to be at hand while the war crisis lasts.

The most striking feature of the Senate debate was that there were no "peace" speeches of moment. The Senators who opposed the measure disapproved it because of the unlimited authority it sought to confer upon the President to create a state of war without the consent of Congress.

Cabinet members McAdoo, Daniels, Baker and Burleson hastened in the name of the President to assure Senators that the President did not mean to use the power given him under the bill to invite war with Germany, but as a protection against war.

Senator William J. Stone, the Democratic Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and heretofore the President's closest friend in the Senate, was most strongly of all opposed to the bill and in a five hours' speech led the debate against it. He urged the adoption of an amendment to prevent arming of ships carrying munitions and to strike out "other instrumentalities and means."

Senator Stone warned the Senate that the authority sought to be granted would make war with Germany inevitable. He said that he was "opposed to war without infinitely greater provocation than we have had," and believed the President himself took the same view. "I would rather trust him," he said, "than all the weakling officials about him who daily fly their kites to see which way the wind blows. I would rather trust him than the jingoes who are so prevalent in some sections of the country at this time. There are even Senators and members of the House who somehow have been duped or persuaded, or have persuaded themselves, to ally themselves with England, to announce themselves as partisans of that power. I can't share that idea." Declaring that "the notion that the Entente are fighting our battles is a dream, a nightmare of disordered brains." He called attention to the Allies conference for commercial cooperation after the war.

"I believe this bill to be not only violative of the Constitution," Senator Stone said, "but destructive of one of the most important powers vested in Congress—the war-making power—and that its passage would set a precedent fraught with peril to our form of government. The power to be granted is too broad, too sweeping."

"The proposal for the public arming of private ships raises a question of the greatest moment," he continued. "It would be idle to put guns on the ships if men were not put on to man the guns. It is said there is a program to place on our merchant ships two or more small boats, submarine chasers, having unusual capacity; these boats are to be lowered to the water when the danger zone is reached and hover around the ships. What would be the legal status of such a ship? Would she be an armed merchant ship or a quasi-war vessel? If the President allows the navy to arm American ships with submarine chasers it would be an act of war, and we should be in the wrong."

Senator Hughes objected to discussing this plan in public. Senator Reed said if the Foreign Relations Committee knew of such a plan they should inform Congress either in public or in secret. Senator Stone continued:

"There is no reason for secrecy regarding the boats any more than regarding the guns and gunners. Americans have been selling quantities of munitions to the Entente and American ships have been carrying them. This is not unlawful. It is permissible. I would not deny our people the legal right to sell to one belligerent just because the other cannot reach our market. But if this Government should arm merchant ships, put gunners aboard and send the ships, loaded with munitions, to a belligerent, we would become by that very act the ally of the Government benefited. We would be in the war."

Senator Hitchcock, floor manager of the measure, said he did not think it was the intention of the President to arm or convoy munition ships. He said to arm such ships would be a violation of neutrality.

"If he would not," replied Senator Stone, "why do we bother ourselves to pass this bill?"

Senator Lewis, Democrat of Illinois, asked: "Does the mere carriage of munitions change the responsibility of the American Government to protect its citizens or affect Germany's liability for their destruction?"

"That is a question for Congress only to decide," answered Senator Stone. "I ask you, can a ship be divided into two parts—one part public and the other private; one part warship, the other part peaceful ship of commerce, making of it a sort of maritime Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, changing as it pleases from one to the other? It must be one or the other, in my opinion. If we want to enter into war, if the occasion is as grave as some of the Senators say, let us say so We have the right, the power to say so. Congress is the only power in this great Government that has that right, and I am unwilling to establish the precedent of shifting the war responsibility to the President."

Senator Hardwick, Democrat, asked Senator Stone if the President did not have power to defend and protect American citizens against assault without authority of Congress.

Senator Stone replied: "Yes. If a war vessel of the United States should see a merchant ship of this country assaulted on the high seas and an effort be made to destroy her, even though that war vessel were not acting as a convoy, such a warship would not only have the right but it would be her duty to protect that ship.

"But if a foreign power assaults merchant vessels of the United States when our war vessels are not present and we hear of it, as we are hearing of these things now, I do not think the President could direct the navy of the United States to begin war on that foreign power. For that he would have to come to Congress."

Senator Sutherland, Republican of Utah, supported the bill, but declared the President already had authority to protect our citizens on our ships.

Senator Fall declared the President does not have constitutional authority to use the navy and merchant vessels as he wants to, despite his claims. "I think the President had in mind," said Fall, "that this act by Congress should be a declaration of war—a limited declaration of war."

"It seems to me," said Senator Cummins, "the bill is a declaration of general hostilities."

Senator Brandegee said: "I am in favor, and have been for a long time, of directing the President to wage war. Several of the Republican members were in favor of doing that." He called the opponents of the bill "filibusters" and bitterly denounced their motives.

As the debate proceeded late Saturday it became more and more bitterly acrimonious. It developed before the end into perhaps the most heated contest ever held in the Senate.

Late in the afternoon advocates of the bill circulated among the Senators a manifesto, to which were secured 76 signatures. The text of this manifesto follows:

"The undersigned United States Senators favor the passage of Senate Bill S.322, to authorize the President of the United States to arm American merchant vessels.

"A similar bill already has passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 403 to 13.

"Under the rules of the Senate allowing unlimited debate it now appears to be impossible to obtain a vote prior to noon, March 4, 1917, when the session of Congress expires.

"We desire the statement in the record to establish the fact that the Senate favors the legislation and would pass it if a vote could be obtained."

Twelve Senators refused to sign the manifesto.

REPUBLICANS—Clapp, Minnesota; Cummins, Iowa, Gronna, North Dakota; Kenyon, Iowa; La Follette, Wisconsin; Norris, Nebraska; Works, California—7.

DEMOCRATS—Kirby, Arkansas; Lane, Oregon; O'Gorman, New York; Stone, Missouri: Vardaman. Mississippi—5.

The debate continued all of Saturday night and on Sunday up to noon. Senator LaFollette, who was the leading opponent and was expected to make one of the strongest speeches against the measure, was not given opportunity to get the floor. Senator Hitchcock, manager of the bill, himself gained the floor and held it for two hours, until at 12 o'clock, the gavel fell, announcing the end of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

IN the recapture from the Turks of the town of Kut-el-Amara on the Tigris, which took place on Monday, the 26th of February, the British, to some extent, revenged themselves for the surrender of that town by General Townshend in the spring of last year.

General Maude, British commander, who has a force of about 125,000 under him, began operations against Kut about two weeks ago by an attack on the Turkish positions on the north bank of the river at Sannaiyat, which ended rather disastrously, for the attacking force was repulsed with apparently heavy losses. The British then fell back a short distance on the northern bank and waited the results of the operations which they had undertaken on the southern bank. These operations progressed very favorably, and the force engaged therein steadily plowed its way forward until it reached a point from which it could make no further advance, until the other force in front of the Sannaiyat position made progress.

On Thursday morning, February 23, the British delivered another assault on the Sannaiyat position. This was successful to the extent of taking and holding against six Turkish counterattacks the first two lines of the enemy's trenches on a front of 450 yards to a depth of 100 yards. Thursday afternoon another assault was launched; hard fighting ensued, which lasted well into the night, in which both sides suffered heavily, but which ended in the British increasing their front in the captured trenches to 900 yards.

The British, seeing that the attention of the Turks was drawn entirely to Sannaiyat, effected a crossing of the Tigris in the Shumran bend of the river south of Kut, before daybreak Friday, and threw a pontoon bridge over the river before night, enabling them to transport large forces over the river rapidly, and, to entrench these forces in the rear of the Turks at Sannaiyat.

As soon as this crossing was effected the frontal assault on the Sannaiyat position was resumed, and on Saturday the third and fourth lines of the Turkish trenches were captured on a front of 1,050 yards. This made the position untenable, and the Turkish forces retreated in good order to the northwest, while at the same time the Turkish troops in Kut-el-Amara, being between two fires, evacuated that town, retreating west, the two forces subsequently uniting and continuing their retreat in the direction of Bagdad, from which place it is reported that reinforcements are advancing to meet them. The character of this country makes it improbable that any serious stand will be made by the Turks until the two forces consolidate near Ctesiphon, about fifteen miles from Bagdad.

General F. S. Maude

In command of British at Kut-el-Amara

This Turkish retreat, though harassed by the British cavalry, seems to have been effected in good order, as indicated by the fact that the British claim to have taken only about three thousand prisoners in all the operations from the first assault on the Sannaiyat position to the end of February, a number rather subnormal in operations of such importance.

The great advantage that the British have in the present drive is that they are in much stronger force than in the previous one. Townshend did not have more than 30,000 men present at Ctesiphon, the critical battle, while Maude ought, in case another takes place there, to muster at least 100,000.

In view, however, of the importance of the stake—Bagdad—and the effect that the fall of that city into British hands would have on the Moslem world, we may be sure that the British will make an energetic effort to take the town and the Turks the most desperate one to defend it.

TURNING now to the western front, we are again confronted with a retreat, and this time of a totally different character, and one concerning which competent English opinion itself entertains no illusions. The latter statement is proved by the speech on the afternoon of March 1 of Mr. Forster of the War Office in the House of Commons: "At the same time it is probable the enemy is retiring not merely as a defensive measure, but with the object of saving his strength for a great blow on one or the other of the Allied fronts. There is every indication that he will make a supreme effort to end the war in his favor this year."

The retreaters are the Germans and the character of the retreat is concisely put in the German official bulletin of March 1, in the statement that the ground "was systematically and voluntarily evacuated and the defense placed in another prepared for defense."

The British bulletin of the same day gives an accurate statement of the extent of the retreat when it says:

"During February we captured 2,133 German prisoners, including thirty-six officers. The following villages also were either captured or surrendered to us by the withdrawal of the Germans: Ligny, Thilloy, Lebarque, Warlencourt, Pys, Miraumont, Petit Miraumont, Grandcourt, Puisieux-au-Mont, Serre and Gommecourt."

The scene of the retreat is the territory immediately north and south of the Ancre River in the Picardy or Somme sector of the western front, and up to the present time this Ancre River has formed the northern boundary of the sphere of activities on that sector. The territory evacuated thus far is equal in area to about twenty-eight square miles. The number of prisoners taken by the British so far clearly shows the slight resistance the Germans have offered during the past month. Having thus established the strategic character, location and extent of the German retreat, we are now confronted with several interesting questions in attempting to determine its military value and its ultimate purpose.

The first of the questions is, Have the German forces as yet reached the prepared line of new defenses? Many things indicate that a negative answer must be returned. One indication of great importance is the fact that the Germans are positively asserted to have blown up the church towers and other observation points in such places as Bapaume which are still in their possession. It is self-evident that had they any intention of retaining possession of these towns they would not deliberately deprive themselves of the advantage of these observation points. These and other facts of like value, as indications, lead one to conclude that at the present time the German retreat is by no means over, and a study of the topography of the country itself, the natural defenses, and so forth, seem to point to the fact that the present retreat is only the beginning of a retrograde movement by the Germans which will affect their whole line from a point to the immediate east of Arras in the north to as far south probably as Roye, near the great angle of the western line, and that Bapaume and many other places, in addition to those already mentioned, will be surrendered with only the semblance of a struggle.

It need surprise no one if, after the German line settles into position, that position will be found to be several miles to the east of Bapaume.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

The liner Laconia, 18,000 tons, torpedoed February 25

AMERICAN Lives and Dutch Vessels Submarined. The menace to neutral interests in the German barred zone about the British Isles was strikingly evidenced during the past week. On February 22 seven Dutch steamships which had been held at Falmouth, England, since the barred zone decree was put into effect, and which had been assured of reasonable safety by the German Admiralty after inquiries by the Netherlands government, were torpedoed shortly after leaving Falmouth harbor. Two of the vessels were carrying foodstuffs consigned to the Dutch government, two of them were carrying mixed cargoes of foodstuffs consigned to Dutch merchants, and the other three were outward bound in ballast. The total tonnage of the seven vessels was 33,314. The ships were all warned and their crews permitted to leave in safety, being rescued after several hours by trawlers. One of the ships was towed back to Falmouth by a British trawler. The incident aroused great indignation throughout Holland and the government filed a vigorous protest at Berlin, which resulted, later, in an offer by the German government to replace the lost vessels with German tonnage to be paid for by the Dutch companies after the war.

At 10.50 o'clock on Sunday night, February 25, the British liner Laconia was torpedoed without warning off the Irish coast. The Laconia was carrying no munitions, but was loaded with contraband, although she carried passengers, and in addition was armed for resisting submarines. The Laconia stayed afloat about forty-five minutes, and her entire complement of passengers and crew were able to take to the boats before she sank; but a number of deaths resulted from exposure before trawlers came in answer to the Laconia's wireless. Of those who died two were women, and American citizens—Mrs. Mary E. Hoy and her daughter Elizabeth, former residents of Chicago, returning to London, where the husband and son of Mrs. Hoy were in business. Another of the passengers of the Laconia whose life was lost was a mining promoter named Eva, who, although a British subject, was a veteran of the American Civil War. During the month of February, the first full month after the announcement of the barred zone, 188 ships were sunk, two American with a tonnage of 3,320; 52 other neutrals, tonnage 94,170; 113 British, tonnage 323,810, and 20 belonging to other belligerents, tonnage 44,270—a total tonnage for the 28 days of 65,770.

American Ships Run the Gauntlet. The American freighters Orleans and Rochester, which sailed from New York on February 10, safely ran the gauntlet of the submarine zone, arriving at Bordeaux on February 26 and March 1 respectively.

A Dry Capitol. The Senate bill making the District of Columbia prohibition territory after November 1, 1917, passed the House February 28 by a vote of 273 to 137. The Senate and House conferees on the same date agreed upon a report on the Post Office Appropriation Bill which assured the passage of the bill carrying the Reed "bone-dry" amendment, barring the shipment of liquor into prohibition states. After November 1 there will be no saloons in the District, although it will still be possible to import liquor for personal use, under the bill just passed.

Skilled Chinese Make French Shells. According to the New York Times of February 25, Chinese skilled laborers are being sent to France from Tientsin and from French Indo-China at the rate of 2,000 a week, the number in France having on that date already exceeded 100,000. Chinamen are hard workers, willing to work long hours and to live on very little, which is one reason why they are unwelcome in America; but they have been found very useful by the French in agricultural work, and in the less important elements of munitions manufacture. The Chinese are offered double the normal wages in China, and are guaranteed the return of their bodies to home soil in case of death.

To Unify Child Labor Laws. The new Federal Child Labor Board, which consists of Attorney General Gregory, Secretary of Commerce Redfield and Secretary of Labor Wilson, issued a letter on February 24 to each of the forty-eight governors of the states, inviting their cooperation in making it easy for business interests and workers to get the most possible benefit from the act, which becomes operative September 1. This is the law which forbids the handling in interstate commerce of articles produced by child labor.

Dr. Jowett Gets a Call. Westminster Chapel, London, England, on February 26 voted to extend a call to Dr. J. H. Jowett, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York, and well beloved by Christian Herald readers, to succeed Dr. Campbell Morgan as minister. Dr. Campbell Morgan had accepted a pastorate in Melbourne, Australia, but has been forced to request a postponement because of his inability to reach Australia owing to the submarine menace.

A New President's Flag. Navy Department General Order Number 257, issued January 2, 1917, authorized a new design for the President's flag. The old design specified the great seal of the United States on a blue ground. The new flag consists of a blue field with four white stars, one in each corner, and in the center a wide-spread eagle, with a red, white and blue shield on the body, the design being very similar to the shield of the United States, but based upon the seal which has been used in the White House for many years as the personal seal of the President.

Publishers Agree to Share. Newspaper publishers, meeting in Washington on February 26, voted unanimously to cooperate with the Federal Trade Commission in its administration of the print-paper situation, agreeing to reduce their requirements, if necessary, to make the plan successful.

An Unofficial Referendum. During the second week of February the American Union Against Militarism sent out 100,000 return post-cards, asking people whether they wanted this country to go to war to enforce our rights of commerce in the war-zone declared by Germany. These cards went to all kinds of people, in both rural and city districts. The recipients were asked to mail their answers to their congressmen. The result, based on returns to thirty Congressmen from widely scattered parts of the country, was a heavy vote for peace. The average was six for peace to one for war. The lowest vote against war in any district was four to one; the highest, eleven to one.

Fragments of News. Edwin Gould, Jr., grandson of Jay Gould, was accidentally killed while hunting on a small island off the coast of Georgia on February 25. He used a clubbed shotgun to kill a trapped raccoon, and the gun was discharged with fatal results. . . . Germany on February 27 refused, because of the difficulty in communicating with submarines, to guarantee safe passage of the United States naval vessels Des Moines and Cæsar from Alexandria to Beirut. . . . It was announced on February 26 that twenty-eight arrests had been made under the Defense of the Realm Act in Ireland, and it was later announced that the twenty-eight would be permitted to live anywhere in England, but would not be permitted to return to Ireland during the war. . . . A tornado in central Alabama on February 24 wrecked telephone and telegraph communications, destroyed considerable property, and left from eleven to twenty dead in its wake. . . . Motion picture films that passed through the United States custom houses in the calendar year of 1916 represented a total length of 50,000 miles; 43,000 miles were American films exported, the other 7,000 being European films imported. . . . Local option, which has been called the "Banquo's ghost" of the New Jersey politics, was again defeated in the Jersey Assembly on February 26. . . . American shipyards are reported to have sold abroad in 1916 vessels aggregating about 100,000 tons. It was reported on February 24 that the Cunard Line had ordered here five big ships of 15,000 tons each. . . . During the year 1916, 1,253 ships passed through the Panama Canal, exceeding the number of 1915 by 83. During the month of January, 176 vessels with an aggregate net tonnage of 557,839 tons used the canal. The best previous record, July, 1915, was 170 ships of 547,370 tons. . . . The government of Ontario on February 28 endorsed a bill providing for equal suffrage. It was expected that the measure would pass without opposition. . . . A project is under foot in Havana for a great union English-speaking church, to be supported by all denominations. . . . The state of Tennessee became "bone dry" on March 1. . . . The Senate of the state of Iowa on February 22 passed a "bone-dry" prohibition bill. . . . The will of a prominent churchman of New Jersey left to the First Presbyterian Church of Passaic the sum of $1,000 to endow a "strangers' pew." . . . . By the death of Governor E. Cabeza de Baca of New Mexico, Lieutenant Govenor W. E. Lindsay succeeded to the governship. The lieutenant governor was elected on the Republican ticket, but is said to be a radical Progressive. . . . Through passenger service between Boston and Washington over an unbroken rail communication through the Pennsylvania terminal in New York City and across the new Hart's Island Bridge has been announced to begin on March 15.

Gerard Sails for Home. Former Ambassador Gerard sailed from Corunna, Spain, on February 28 on the Spanish liner Infanta Isabel which was expected to reach Havanna March 8 or 9.

Big Bills Passed. The Senate on March 1 passed the Revenue Bill providing for taxes and bonds from which the government expected to realize $548,000,000 in the coming fiscal year. $300,000,000 of the sum was to be raised by bond issues. On March 2, the Senate and House cleared the way for the final conference on the Navy Bill carrying an appropriation of $535,000,000. This bill authorized new construction as follows: 3 battleships, 1 battle cruiser, 3 scout cruisers, 15 destroyers, 1 destroyer tender, 1 submarine tender, 58 coast submarines, 10 fleet submarines and 3 coast guard cutters.

Tracks in the Snow

JACK FROST has painted beautiful flowers on the window panes this winter season, and exquisite winter scenes have been presented. All nature was resplendent with its decoration of snow. The ground was covered with a quilt of the whitest, softest down, the trees were gorgeous in their white bloom. And in the snow were tracks. The birds made some of them, the house-cat on this and the other side of the fence made others, the pet dog and the neighbor dog that came over to play with him made others. The hunter with his gun and dog found the track of the rabbit, the flock of quails, the fox, the deer, the bear, and followed them to find and secure his game. There were in the snow the prints of grown people's shoes, and of tiny little ones with the marks of sled-runners on either side.

Life is a winter's snow, and everybody is making tracks in it. The rabbit does not have the same track as the squirrel, nor the cat the same as the dog. Every person in the world makes a track in the snow different from that of any one else. Some can be tracked to the scene of danger and evil, others to safety, happiness and honor. Some footsteps can be traced directly to the saloon or gambling hell; others to the school, the place of employment, the church, the hovel of poverty with alms, and the fields of laudable mental and moral endeavor, and back to the home again to shelter and love. It will be well for those whose footsteps in the snow lead badward and downward to turn about and make them goodward and upward. The snow is beneficent as well as beautiful. It clears the atmosphere of its impurities, kills disease germs in the soil, and augments the currents of great rivers. It is thus used as a type of purity and beneficence in the spiritual realm: "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." (Ps. 51 : 7.)

Carloads of Peanut Shells

A CONTRACT was closed with a man at Cleburne, Texas, for 100 carloads of peanut hulls to be used in a combination feed for livestock. The people of the south used to throw away the seed of their cotton. Now they extract the oil for table purposes, and make cattle-food of the hulls, and are commencing to make paper out of the stalks. Peanuts used to be sold as a luxury at the little corner stand, or by the push-cart man with his tin roaster, especially to the children the day the circus came to town. Now peanuts are used as a popular article of food, and the shells are ground up as food for cattle. We live in such an age of utility that the things that used to be thrown away as waste are made to pay a decent dividend on the whole investment. Would to God we were as saving of our time, energy and money for his service as we are of our material substance for ourselves! The 100 carloads of peanut shells call to mind this injunction to economy: "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." (John 6 : 12.)

A New Kansas Rabbit

FROM several counties in western Kansas there comes the report that a new breed of rabbits has appeared which has been called Belrabbit, because it is supposed to be a cross between the Belgian hare and the jack rabbit. Two or three years ago two crates of Belgian hares on their way to Colorado broke open and the animals escaped, and their interbreeding with the jack rabbit of that section made the new type which has appeared. They are said to be better eating than the Belgian hare or jack rabbit. Rabbits are so prolific, however, and so often bark the young trees and eat up vegetation, that while the flesh has important food value, the farmers fear it will not compensate for the damage possible to the crops. They became so plentiful and pestiferous in California that there was a liberal bounty on their destruction, and huge drives were the result. A good fat rabbit is considered in America as delicious food, but the Jews were not allowed to eat it. This is the clause in the law that condemned it: "And the hare, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof, he is unclean unto you." (Lev. 11 : 6.)

Buys a Van Dyck

VAN DYCK'S beautiful portrait of the Countess of Clanbrazil, the gem of the Earl of Denbig's collection, has been purchased, it is reported, by Henry C. Frick for $250,000. Sir Anthony Van Dyck was born in Antwerp in 1599. At fifteen he studied painting under Rubens. He did some great work in Italy. Invited to England by Charles I, he was knighted and made principal paintor to the king in 1632. It was during this period, when he painted the royal family and notables to the court, that he executed the beautiful full-length portrait Mr. Frick has secured. The painting "Man in Armor" and the "Marches a Grimaldi" are in the Widener collection in Philadelphia. Van Dyck has beauty and grace in his colors, and form and strength in drawing have given permanency to his fame. His "Adoration of the Shepherds" breathes the spirit of devotion for the Christ. All geniuses, all artists, derive their inspiration from Infinite Intelligence, from Absolute Beauty, which is God. There is in the Scripture this reference to supreme beauty: "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." (Ps. 27 : 4.)

Jewels Traded on Curb

A NEW curb market has sprung into existence in London since the war. Its headquarters is in Hatton Gardens, a short, narrow street, which is the home of the wholesale jewelry trade, and its dealings are in precious stones. Most of the dealings are transactions which before the war would have taken place in Amsterdam. The brokers are mostly silent, elderly Russians, Belgians, and Lithuanians. Thousands of dollars' worth of stones change hands daily in this strange street market. Among the traders are some of the world's finest jewel experts. This jewel curb market has less of substance in it than many of the produce and merchant exchanges of the world. The habit of putting wealth in the form of jewels and trading in them was quite a business among the Jews. Christ thus refers to it in illustrating the essential truth of his Gospel: "The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it." (Matt. 13 : 45, 46.)

Woman 111 Years Old

HANNAH McFERRIAN, a colored woman who claims she has the evidence that she is a hundred and eleven years old, is visiting her great-granddaughter, Mrs. E. V. Green of Topeka, Kan. She lives in a little home near Monegaw Springs, Mo., and made the trip to Topeka unaccompanied. She remembers the war of 1812, and tells of the sensation which was produced when the British took Washington. She then lived in Virginia with her master, who soon after moved to St. Clair County, Missouri, taking her and the rest of the slaves with him. She says her master was always good to her and the rest of the slaves, and she does not remember to have seen him strike one of them. She has twelve children and two hundred or more descendants. When asked to what she attributed her long life, what rules of life she had followed, she said she had no rules; she "ate a plenty, slept a plenty," and was busy at something all the time; and then, looking up, she said: "There is the secret of my long life: just trusting the Lord. I have left everything to him and he has been with me to help me and make me happy every day since I was a little girl. I feel that it's God's mercy that has let me live so long." "And even to your old age I am he; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you." (Isa. 46 : 4.)

Cigarettes and Boys

DR. RICHARD C. CABOT, in a lecture in a large city recently, is reported to have said he had never been able to get into an anti-cigarette crusade, as he had seen too many boys who had started to smoke while in short trousers grow into healthy men. The doctor doubtless made qualifying statements with reference to the deadly cigarette which would make his position on the question less dangerous. He could have said that while some boy smokers in short trousers grew up to be healthy men, many boys who began smoking while they were in short trousers grew yellow and sickly and weak and stupid, and were hauled out to the graveyard, physical, mental and moral wrecks. What the apostle said to Christians about their being temples of the living God, and the avoidance of contamination, can here be used with reference to boys, and older persons as well, who use the deadly cigarette: "Touch not the unclean thing!" (II Cor. 6 : 17.)

Government Contemplates Buying Monticello

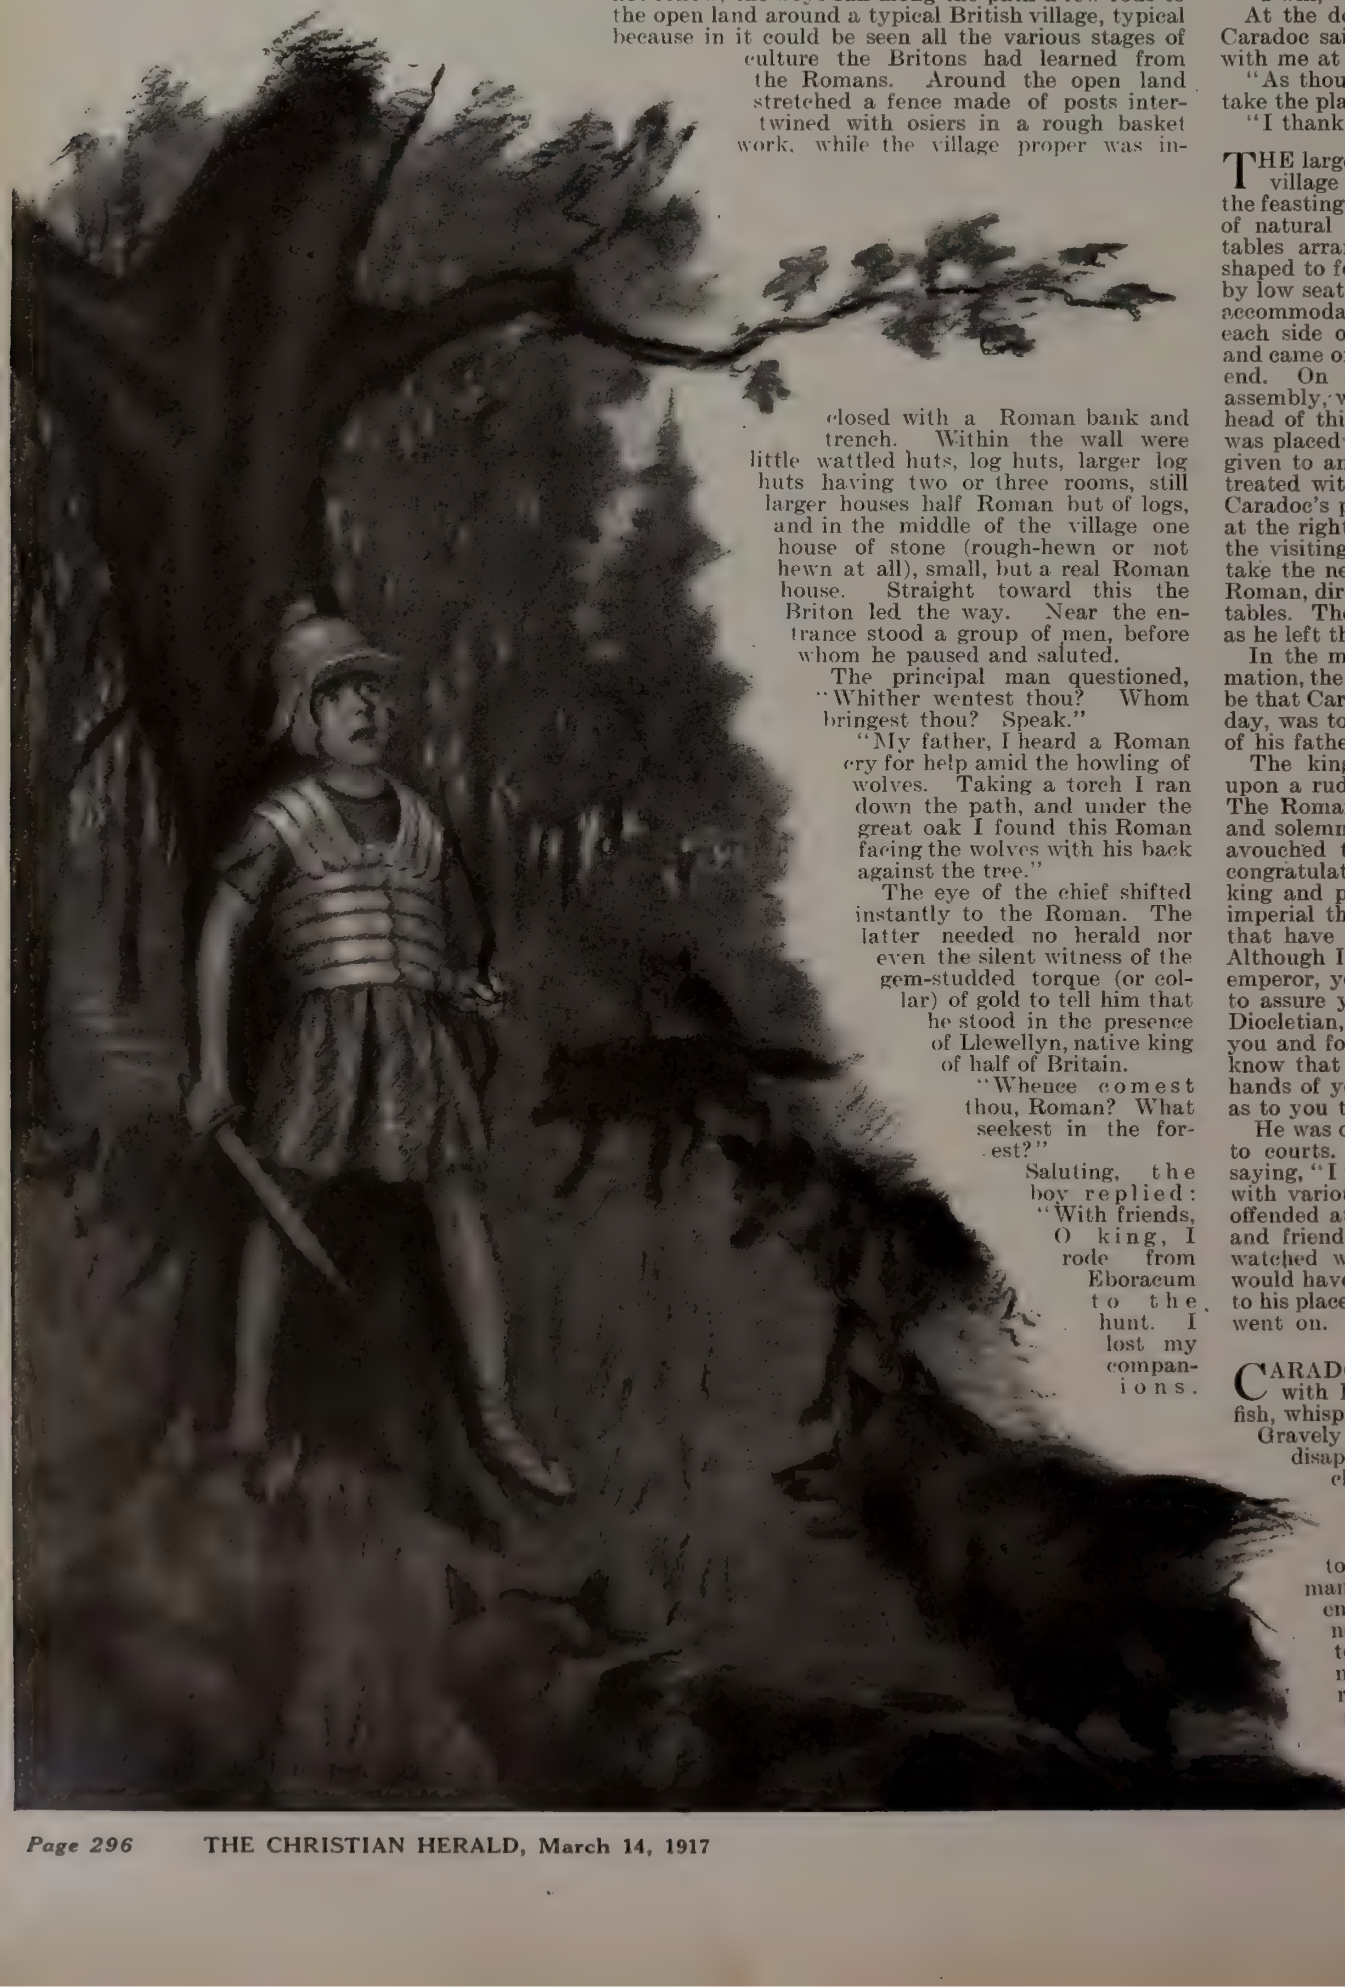
FOR some time there has been a proposition to acquire government ownership of the old home of Jefferson. Monticello, which was the residence of President Thomas Jefferson, is situated in Albemarle County, Virginia, near Charlottesville, on a high hill overlooking a lovely landscape. The farm connected with it was fertile ground, and Jefferson took great joy and pride in cultivating it. Jefferson was a delegate to the House of Burgesses of Virginia, his native colony. As a member of the Continental Congress, he was made chairman of a committee to draw up a declaration of independence. With him on the committee were Franklin, John Adams, Roger Sherman and Robert Livingston. By request Jefferson wrote the immortal Declaration. Jefferson succeeded Benjamin Franklin as minister to France, and in 1790 became Washington's Secretary of State. Jefferson is claimed as the founder of what is now called the Democratic Party. In 1794 Jefferson withdrew from public life to his beautiful estate of Monticello, where he remained three years farming and pursuing the literary and scientific studies he loved so well. Then he was called from his retirement to the vice-presidency, and then to the presidency, to which he was chosen for a second term. During his first administration we acquired the Louisiana Purchase, one of the greatest empires of the world, and during his second term the slave trade was abolished. Jefferson died at his beautiful Monticello home and was buried there. Among his papers after his death was found the following inscription for his tomb "Here lies buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia." By all means let Monticello pass into the possession of the American people. It is to be hoped the committee having the matter in hand will be able to come to some arrangement by which the nation may take title to the home of one of its chief founders, so that the people may point to it and say what was said of another: "For he loveth our nation." (Luke 7 : 5.)

A Message to Caesar

By WARREN ROCHELLE

THE Roman strode through the forest, bow in hand, arrow on the string. Coming to a beaten path, he followed it, glancing frequently behind where, in the darkening woods, he could see dim gray shapes slipping through the bushes. One came a little nearer and, as quick as thought, the arrow flew. The gray brute fell. The Roman breathed more easily and hurried on.

Not all the wolves stopped to snarl over the cannibal feast. At a little greater distance they still followed. Another arrow found its mark, but the deepening dusk gave the beasts more courage. Closer and closer they crept till the Roman, seeing no hope of escape, placed his back against a huge oak and awaited their attack. He shot his last arrow and drew his sword, calling on Diana, the hunter's god.



The wolves seemed to know that he had no more arrows, for they slipped out of the bushes and sat down in a half-circle in front of him. They lolled out their tongues, they snapped their white teeth, but they did not quite dare the direct attack, waiting till the darkness should deepen. The suspense was terrible. The boy, for he was but a lad of fourteen or fifteen, called on all the gods he knew. He was tempted to dash among the beasts and end it at once. Again he sent out a cry for help. "Iesus Christus, my mother's God, save me!"

A gleam of light; feet ran down the path; another boy flashed a torch in the faces of the wolves, which shrank in terror. He touched the torch to dry leaves. The wolves scattered. This boy was evidently a native Briton, but he spoke in good Latin. "Thou art safe! Come to the village."

With backward glances to see that the wolves did not follow, the boys ran along the path a few rods to the open land around a typical British village, typical because in it could be seen all the various stages of culture the Britons had learned from the Romans. Around the open land stretched a fence made of posts intertwined with osiers in a rough basket work, while the village proper was inclosed with a Roman bank and trench. Within the wall were little wattled huts, log huts, larger log huts having two or three rooms, still larger houses half Roman but of logs, and in the middle of the village one house of stone (rough-hewn or not hewn at all), small, but a real Roman house. Straight toward this the Briton led the way. Near the entrance stood a group of men, before whom he paused and saluted.

The principal man questioned, "Whither wentest thou? Whom bringest thou? Speak."

"My father, I heard a Roman cry for help amid the howling of wolves. Taking a torch I ran down the path, and under the great oak I found this Roman facing the wolves with his back against the tree."

The eye of the chief shifted instantly to the Roman. The latter needed no herald nor even the silent witness of the gem-studded torque (or collar) of gold to tell him that he stood in the presence of Llewellyn, native king of half of Britain.

"Whence comest thou, Roman? What seekest in the forest?"

Saluting, the boy replied: "With friends, O king, I rode from Eboracum to the hunt. I lost my companions. My horse left me when I got down to drink. I walked and walked. Wolves followed me. I came to the path and followed it to the oak where this boy found me. Canst thou give me a guard, O king, back to Eboracum?"

"Not this night, Roman. It is a long march from this village. Caradoc, take the Roman within. See that he is refreshed and has a change of raiment, and bring him to thy feast. Haste thee, for we wait."

Saluting the king, the boys entered the house, Caradoc calling the servants. But slaves and freemen alike had gone to have their part in the feast. He himself, led the Roman to his room. While the latter bathed, Caradoc brought British garments, skins as soft as chamois, with fur like seal. When the Roman was arrayed, the two boys paused a moment and looked into each other's eyes.

The Roman spoke first: "Thou art Caradoc, prince of Britain?"

"Thou hast said."

"I am——"

"Haste thee, Caradoc, thy father waits." It was a British chief who spoke.

The boys moved at once toward the door. As they went Caradoc said with barbarian frankness, "I like thee, Roman. Wilt be my friend?"

"I will," answered the Roman.

At the door the boys again saluted the king, and Caradoc said, "Father, I desire that this Roman sit with me at supper."

"As thou wilt. This is thy feast. Let the Roman take the place of thy cousin Gryffyth."

"I thank thee, my father."

THE large open space or square in the center of the village was filled with people impatient to begin the feasting. The upper end of the space formed a sort of natural platform or dais. On this were several tables arranged in the Roman fashion, low tables shaped to form three sides of a rectangle, surrounded by low seats, or rather couches. Each of these tables accommodated nine of the principal guests, three on each side of the rectangle, while the servants went and came on the inside of the table by way of the open end. On a still higher dais, visible all over the assembly, was a single table. The central place at the head of this was, of course, the king's. At his right was placed a visiting king. The place at his left was given to an old man in a long white robe, whom all treated with as much deference as the king himself. Caradoc's place was the first on the side of the table at the right of the king, just around the corner from the visiting king. His cousin Gryffyth was ready to take the next place when the king assigned it to the Roman, directing Gryffyth to a seat at one of the lower tables. The latter gave Caradoc a look of utter hate as he left the royal dais.

In the midst of the feasting a herald made proclamation, the substance of which the Roman gathered to be that Caradoc, in honor of this his fourteenth birthday, was to be formally recognized as prince and heir of his father's royalty.

The king arose from the supper, seated himself upon a rude throne, and called Caradoc to his side. The Roman watched with keen interest the strange and solemn ceremonies with which the subject chiefs avouched their loyalty and the visiting kings gave congratulations. He also arose, and, approaching the king and prince, saluted as though approaching the imperial throne, saying: "O king, I thank the fates that have brought me to be present here tonight. Although I have no credentials from his majesty the emperor, yet, as the only Roman here, I must speak to assure you, O king, of the good-will of the great Diocletian, and of the friendship of the Cæsar, both for you and for your people. The Cæsar will be glad to know that the royal power is to be continued in the hands of your son, Prince Caradoc. I pledge to him as to you the friendship of Rome."

He was only a boy, but he spoke as one accustomed to courts. The king smiled with frank cordiality, saying, "I thank thee, Roman!" The princes watched with various feelings apparent in their faces. Some, offended at first, were won by his respectful manner and friendliness. Others, especially the old Druid, watched with frank dislike. Saluting again, as he would have saluted the emperor, the Roman returned to his place. The ceremonies soon ended, and the feast went on.

CARADOC touched the Roman and quickly drew with his finger upon the table the outline of a fish, whispering, "Sum."

Gravely the Roman shook his head, but seeing the disappointment in the prince's face, leaned closer and whispered, "My mother is."

From the first the Roman had been aware of the hostility of the old Druid at the king's left, and it seemed to him to include Caradoc too. Whether the old man had seen the sign of Caradoc plainly enough to understand, the Roman could not tell; but the Druid turned at once to the king and said loudly, "This night thy son has entered into thy royalty. Tomorrow let him enter the service of the gods of his fathers, that some day he may unite thy power and mine."

"One thing at a time," said the king. "Let him feast tonight as a prince. Tomorrow the service of the gods."

"That is well, if only when the morrow comes he shall be willing to do his duty. Let him say so now."

"Son," said the king turning to Caradoc, "thy uncle here, ever jealous for the honor of the gods, fears thou wilt not be willing to become a Druid. Tell him plainly and set his fears at rest."

The Roman thought Caradoc's face paled a little at his father's word, but the prince answered quietly, "My father, I am but a boy. The priesthood and the royalty together are too heavy for me. Let my cousin Gryffyth share in the honors and succeed to his father's place as I to thine. The robe and the torque are too heavy for me."

"It is written in the prophecies that Britain will be finally freed from Rome when her king becomes the head of her religion," said the old man in a loud voice and with his keen eyes watching both the prince and the Roman. Several of the chiefs started and looked also at the Roman.

Quickly but quietly the king addressed them: "We complain not against the government of the Cæsar, but my brother and myself have felt often that it would be much better for our people if the power of each could be united in the hands of one. He has most generously waived the rights of his son Gryffyth, that my son Caradoc may become in time both Druid chief and king of Britain. Speak, my son. Say thou art ready."

"My father, if indeed it be necessary that one man be both king and Druid chief, let Gryffyth be that man."

Something like anger began to rise in the king's face and quiver in his voice: "Boy! Wouldst throw away thy heritage? Thou shalt not! Speak again! Say thou art ready even now!"

The Roman watched his new friend. The prince had hesitated. His face had flushed and paled. Now a quiet strength seemed to arise within him. Lifting his eyes to the face of his angry father he answered calmly: "My father, I cannot become a Druid. I am a Christian."

IF the earth had opened to swallow up Caradoc, that company of princes had not been more surprised. A moment the king gazed. Then he burst forth, "Never! Thou art not a Christian!" (The contempt he put into the word no print could express.) He laid aside his dignity as king and pleaded as a father with his son. "Stand up and say that this is some folly; that thou wilt enter the priesthood tomorrow!" Seeing no sign of yielding in his son's face, anger arose in his own and flared in his voice: "Speak! Say that tomorrow thou wilt put on the Druid's white robe!"

"This comes of the Roman learning and that old teacher against whom I warned thee," said the Druid. "Wilt thou let him defy thee to thy face?"

The angry king needed no inflaming. "Stand up!" he roared.

The prince arose.

"Wilt thou serve the gods tomorrow?"

"My father, I cannot. I serve only the Lord Christ."

Partly intoxicated, wholly angry, the king fairly shouted: "I swear by the Blessed Isles thou shalt serve the gods tomorrow! Take him away!"

THE Roman did not comprehend the awful menace in the words. He was rising to stand by the prince, but Caradoc signed to him to keep his place, and walked quietly away with the guards. The Roman gazed after him a moment, then faced the king.

The old Druid was saying, "That Roman boy is a Christian, too."

"Art thou a Christian?" asked the king, anger still quivering in his voice.

"I am not," said the Roman. There was no fear in voice or manner.

"That is well," said the king. Rising from the table he signed to the boy to come with him. In the house he spoke to the Roman alone.

"Boy, where didst thou first meet my son?"

"Tonight, under the great oak by the path. The Roman told again of his wandering in the forest, the pursuit by the wolves, and his rescue by Caradoc. Seeing that the king's wrath seemed to have cooled a little, he ventured to plead for his new friend.

At that the king stopped at once, saying, "Thou art not a Christian. Thou wilt persuade my son to give up this superstition."

"I will try, sire, but I hear that Christians never give up."

"Try. If he will not listen to reason, do not spare to tell him that Christians must die. Tell him of the imperial edicts."

"I will do the best I can. When shall I see him?"

"In the morning." The king paused, then went on. "Another thing, young Roman; my brother cherishes a foolish dislike of your people. I do not, nor does Caradoc. We believe that the government of Rome has brought great good to Britain. But should Caradoc fail to take my place his cousin Gryffyth will take it. With his father he hates everything Roman. For the sake of thine own people do thy best to win Caradoc from this new religion." He then called a slave and gave brief direction.

The slave led the Roman to a cubiculum, saying, "This is the sleeping-room of Prince Caradoc. I will send his servant."

Hanging on the wall of the little room was a suit of armor similar to that of a legionary, only smaller, a boy's size. With it were the Roman sword and pilum.

On a little shelf lay a book as if just put down by one suddenly called. Picking it up the Roman read in Greek, "I say to you, Every one who shall confess me before men, also the Son of Man shall confess him before the angels of God: but the one denying me before men shall be denied before the angels of God."

"Domine! Art thou also a Christian?" It was Caradoc's servant.

For the third time that night the Roman said, "I am not."

"Art thou a friend of my prince?"

"I am."

"Follow me, domine, but speak not."

Going out by a side door and passing in the rear of the houses they came to a wattled hut near the village wall. The servant whispered to the soldier on guard at the door, then signed to the Roman to enter. Not without a thrill the Roman stooped to the low doorway and passed into the utter darkness of the hut.

A hand clasped his. "My friend!" The Roman knew the voice and caught the prince in his embrace.

A MOMENT they stood thus, then Caradoc led the Roman aside, and said, "There is a mat over here." They seated themselves Arab fashion, the Roman trying to think how to begin his task of persuasion.

"Canst thou get a message to Cæsar?" Caradoc spoke first.

"I can."

"Perhaps thou couldst even get an audience and speak to him thyself?"

"I can."

"I pray thee seek an audience at the earliest opportunity. Tell the Cæsar that soon, very soon, Gryffyth son of Modred will reign in place of Llewellyn, friend of the Romans. My uncle Modred hates the Romans as much as ever did Hannibal of Carthage. Tell Cæsar to look well to his province and to double his guards when Gryffyth grasps the scepter of Llewellyn."

"Thy people will rise in vain!" All his race pride quivered in the voice of the Roman.

The prince went on calmly and sadly. "I know. My father knows. Yet the land will be red. Think of the scattered villas. Not all the blood will be ours." His voice thrilled for a second, then went on in sad gentleness: "But it will be all in vain. The legions will burn our towns. My people will be quenched in blood. As thou hast heart of mercy give my message to Cæsar."

"Why? Thou art prince of Britain. As long as thou livest thou wilt keep thy rebel people quiet."

"My friend, I shall not again see the sun set."

"Why not?"

"Heardest thou not what my father said, that I should 'serve the gods tomorrow'?"

"And thou wilt! He asked me to talk with thee. Surely thou wilt."

"As thou sayest, I shall serve the gods tomorrow."

"Glad am I!" cried the Roman. "Now I will go and seek thy father and say to him ——"

"I shall indeed serve the gods tomorrow, not as priest but as sacrifice."

Something in the tone caught the Roman. "What dost thou mean?"

"Hast ever seen a sacrifice to the gods?"

"Full many, in Rome."

"I mean a sacrifice to the gods of Britain. Hast

The President and the War Spirit

CONGRESS, in granting to the President necessary powers to act in the present critical state of affairs, took occasion to express itself strongly in favor of peace so long as peace may honorably be maintained. In this, we believe, Congress truly represents the popular spirit of the American people. There will be no shirking of patriotic duty, if events should really call for war; but meanwhile the people of this country, despite incendiary newspapers, are not losing their heads in any false notions of hurrah belligerency.

The short, sharp congressional debate was given spice by the carefully-timed publication of the Zimmerman note, printed elsewhere in this issue. This mystery note, appearing suddenly at a moment of extreme tension, created great excitement. But Congress and the public quickly reacted to a realization that this note even if its source and authenticity were unquestioned, still had little real seriousness. If genuine, it was not cause for war, though a strong argument for our preparedness. Certainly no German proposals were necessary to urge Mexico into bitterness toward us. For a long time no word has been so hated in Mexico as "Gringo." No discovery of overtures from Germany to Japan were needed to warn us of the deadly menace of the "yellow peril." Our newspapers have been full of that for years.

Plots and rumors of plots, however spectacularly staged before us, need not surprise us. All wars are results of plots and counterplots. Our chief concern, secure as we are in our strength, should be to keep our own hands clean from entangling alliances, that may lead no man knows where, and to keep our own hearts clean of hate and unneutral prejudices.

That the war movement in this country is deliberately promoted by the Wall Street interests and their wide-spreading connections must be clearly apparent to any thoughtful observer. Big bankers, munition-makers, shipping directors and manipulators of produce are nearly all for war. Such newspapers as have long been the most servile spokesmen for the big financial interests are now loudest in their demands for hostilities.

Now, it must be admitted that these are not the interests which care much about human rights or the sacredness of life. They are ever the oppressors of the people, not their defenders. What they are interested in are the profits of commerce, the enhancement of their stocks and the protection of their loans to the Allies. Their high-sounding phrases concerning the sacredness of life are strange to their mouths and unknown in their hearts. To protect their stocks and loans they would stampede millions of Americans into the war shambles.

It was the same in Europe. The people of England and the people of Germany had no quarrel with one another. Neither was conscious of any sacred rights being transgressed. But the financial lords, the commerce-captains and the domain-seeking diplomats of each alliance had rival ambitions and grievances; and raising, on either side, the convenient cry "For God and humanity," they swept their deluded peoples into conflict. And they are holding them there, in defiance of God and in outrage of humanity.

The peoples of Europe, even those in the trenches, want peace. They never wanted war. During an experience covering over two years as a war correspondent with seven different armies on every European point except the Dardanelles, W. G. Shepherd seized every opportunity to put the following question to army officers of various ranks:

"If all the people in Europe had been given an opportunity to vote as to whether or not there should be a war, would you have had war in Europe?"

This question was answered by German, British, Austrian, French, Italian, Serbian and Belgian officers. The response was always the same. There was never any other answer than this:

"Of course not."

We cannot believe that one in ten of the people of our country want war, on any cause that now exists. If the proposal could be put to vote it would be overwhelmingly defeated. The greater pity of it is that if we are forced by the financial jingoes into war, the great body of our common people, who do not want war and see nothing to be gained by it, will be the ones thrust forward for slaughter, while the powerful, selfish magnates will further fatten and glutton upon the spoils.

The extra powers imposed upon the President, and the direct responsibility that goes with them, will undoubtedly serve to render him all the more conservative and cautious. He knows that back of him stands the real governing elements of this country, and that they reelected him because he kept us out of war. He knows that these patriotic elements of our citizenry, these solid and substantial elements of our industrial, political, social and religious achievement and progress still see no cause to abandon the blessings of peace.

The Case of Ruth Cruger

THE disappearance of Ruth Cruger, the pretty New York high school graduate and Sunday school teacher, under circumstances that baffle the police and thousands of other searchers, is more than a single tragedy; it is but a part and a type of a dread tragedy being constantly enacted in every great city. In New York City alone between four and five thousand persons disappear every year, and of these, last year, nearly 1,500 were girls. About 1,200 of the girls were traced, but even in most of these instances irreparable harm had been done.

If Ruth Cruger was abducted by infamous men, as the only clues seem to indicate, there are no words with which adequately to denounce their baseness.

The good character of this girl is strong indication that her disappearance was not voluntary. She had kind parents and a happy home; she had been well brought up, and her associations were wholesome. And it is this phase of the case which must strongly impress upon every father and mother a keen realization of the dangers that ever beset their daughters, even in the seeming security of a good home and good environment.

Food Prices Breaking

NEW YORK and several other cities are having an enlightening experience with the high cost of living. Food riots and similar demonstrations have emphasized the seriousness of the situation. Never have state and municipal authorities showed less backbone in an emergency. In New York, Governor Whitman, after a survey of the situation, has come to the conclusion "that the people must learn to eat what they can pay for"—in other words, accommodate themselves to the demands of the extortioners and foodstuffs speculators. The mayor of New York side-stepped the responsibility by laying it upon the state authorities. Meanwhile, the suffering continued. In hundreds of thousands of homes, a brave fight was being waged with hunger, with little or no encouragement from the men elected to offices of responsibility, who should have stood by them when they were being exploited and deprived of the necessaries of life. It is impossible to withhold our sympathies from the people, when we know that thousands of cars are held up, loaded with food, and that storage warehouses are still choked with produce. We are told by health officials that stale bread, corn meal and rice will help out the sufferers; but what of the hundreds of thousands of little children who are undernourished?

But now a break in food prices has come, and it is not due to any official precipitation, but solely to the fact that the speculators, unable to ship food supplies to Europe, are compelled to release them. The public owes little thanks for this partial relief to the authorities, since it is wholly the result of conditions brought about automatically by the export situation. It is a good time for state and city officials now to help the downward trend of prices, and to keep them down by every means in their power. In this way they may, in a measure, make up for their indifference and neglect at a time when their efforts might have greatly modified the situation and lessened the public suffering.

Art and Heart

"I ALWAYS say to my young friends," said Adelina Patti, "not, Can you shake, can you trill, can you imitate a mocking bird—but, Can you sing a simple ballad in honest, straightforward fashion—such a ballad, for instance, as 'Home, Sweet Home'? That is the real test."

Patti knows. And it is worth observing that what she says of singing applies also to every other work in life.

Naturalness is the soul of art.

No two things are more closely akin than art and heart.

Architecture, with all its grandeur, had its beginning and will have its ending in the humble building of a home.

The highest attainment in painting and sculpture is the representation of the elemental emotions. The greatest picture in the world is of a mother and her baby.

In literature, the greatest works are not those of the eagles of genius on far-circling flight, but of the sweet-cooing doves that nest under our eaves.

The great songs are not the grand oratorios, but the simple ballads that sing themselves. The great music is not the complex compositions which only a few masters may interpret, but the soul-whispered harmonies which every one must feel.

The fancy stunts are very well for practice, for development of skill and confidence; but they are only means to an end. The end is true interpretation of human feeling.

The truest art lies in directness.

The great message is always a simple one.

A Sack of Worries

A WAYFARER carried a heavy sack, under which he toiled and complained unceasingly. From none could he get help or comfort.

And as he slowly journeyed, groaning under his burden, the Angel of Optimism came to him and spoke kindly, saying:

"Brother, what carriest thou?"

The man answered surlily, "My worries."

The angel smiled pityingly upon him and said, "Let us look into thy burden and examine thy worries."

And so they looked in. But lo! the sack was empty.

"Why, surely," cried the man, "there were two great worries, too heavy for man to bear. But—ah, yes, I had forgot—one was a worry of yesterday, and so it is gone."

"And the other?"

"That—why, that was a worry of tomorrow, and it—it has not yet come."

Then the angel smiled with infinite pity, saying:

"Hearken! He who bows himself down under the worries of yesterday and tomorrow wears himself out for nought. But he who carries only the worries of today hath no need of a sack for his sorrows. If thou wilt cast this black thing aside, and give all thy strength and cheer and courage to the things of today, real misfortune never can burden thee."

Wondering, the man did as the angel commanded.

And as he took up his journey and went lightly, swiftly on, his heart and his hands were free to relieve many a brother wayfarer of his burdens and to pluck sweet fruits and flowers along the wayside.

And when he came at last to the setting of the sun it was with smiles and a song.

The President and the People

IN every great crisis it becomes more and more evident that the tie between President and people is essentially a mutual one. With that tie intact, the President speaks with the confident knowledge that he is the interpreter and the voice of 110,000,000 Americans.

It is a tie which, so long as it is sacredly maintained, inspires the fullest confidence. The people support the President, and the President responds by throwing the whole weight and influence of the executive office, together with his individual ability, in support of the highest interests of the people.

He recognizes the sovereignty of the people on all vital questions that may arise, and the people in turn recognize, in the course followed by their wise, conservative Executive, that unswerving fidelity which constitutes the true greatness of a President.

Congress trusts him, the people trust him. He will justify that great trust by acting only with and for the whole people. The clamor of faction, the noisy demands of militarism and capitalism, and the wrangling of a few dissensients in the press, will not deter him from doing his whole duty toward the people, as he sees it.

May this mutual bond never be broken, and may President Wilson continue to be guided by the same wise regard for the will of the people in the present crisis that has kept the country on safe lines since he became its Executive.

Lloyd George and Church Benefices

The present British premier, David Lloyd George, who has been a member for twenty-six years of the Castle Street Welsh Baptist Church, London, now has in his hands the appointment of the archbishops of Canterbury and York, the bishops of the Established Church, the patronage of the English deaneries and twenty-five canonries, besides two hundred livings in the absolute gift of the Crown, and 176 benefices in the alternate gift of the Crown and other patrons.—Boston Transcript.

40,000,000 Church Members in the United States

Latest Statistics Showing the Progress and Present Standing of the Different Denominations

THAT people in times of general unrest, like those we are now passing through, seek consolation in religion is made evident from the latest reports of all the Christian denominations in America.

Notwithstanding unusual conditions which might militate against their growth, practically all of the denominations record substantial growth of membership, and the United States has today over 40,000,000 Christian communicants, the largest number ever known in the nation's history. Statistics compiled by Dr. H. K. Carroll (who had charge of the First Religious Census for the Federal government), show that the religious bodies, Protestant, Catholic and Eastern Orthodox, have crossed the forty million mark by 17,000. The net increase for 1916 was 747,000, or 204,000 in excess of the increase of 1915.

Twenty-six years ago the total number of Christian communicants in the country was 20,618,000, and the present total shows a net gain of 19,399,000, or 94 per cent. The Protestant Christians of America in full church connection have nearly doubled in a quarter of a century. In this they have greatly outstripped the rate of growth of our population. The nation's increase in population during the same period was about 39,000,000, or 61 per cent.

Gains of the United Protestant bodies in membership were about 500,000, while the Catholic gains were 220,000. The largest Protestant denominational gains were: Methodist, 136,000; Baptist, 132,000; Presbyterian and Reformed, 79,000; Episcopal, 27,000; Lutheran, 20,000.

During the year there was a comparatively small gain in the number of churches—117 new being recorded. In 1915, it will be remembered, there was a net loss of churches. There is, however, a gain in ministers of 2,643, or nearly double that of a year ago.

The small increase of churches in 1916 is not necessarily to be accepted as an indication of weakness, for it is explained that a number of churches, particularly in the rural districts, are being united or merged for the sake of efficiency and economy, and without any reduction in communicants or attendance. It is explained also that the loss in churches by the Disciples of Christ is more apparent than real, and is caused by faulty methods of reporting in past years.

Dr. Carroll presents some illuminating figures, showing that the prevailing estimate of the strength of Protestantism throughout the world 172,000,000 is far too low, and that the denominational adherents, great and small, of the Protestant faith in all lands today total very close to 200,000,000. The Lutherans lead with 70,500,000. Methodists, 32,418,000; Presbyterians and Reformed, 30,800,000; Anglicans, 26,758,000; Baptists, 21,000,000; Congregationalists, 4,355,000; all other bodies, estimated, 12,000,000.

Our Sunday schools in the United States have had a total aggregate increase in the last ten years of 6,300,000, with a gain of between 15,000 and 16,000 schools.

WHILE all of the churches have been greatly affected by the war, and especially those with large foreign missionary interests, it is worth noting that the spiritual activities of every denomination have been well maintained, and the material needs abundantly supplied; this latter particularly in the case of those churches that have been most active in relief work. Although the exigencies of the war imposed many new burdens, not only have these been gladly and generously met, but the old burdens, in a majority of cases, have not been neglected.

The Methodist denomination continues its steady progress, and reports growth in all branches during the year. A view of present Methodist conditions throughout the world shows: 54,369 ministers; 97,907 lay preachers; 9,671,035 members and probationers; 95,301 Sunday schools, with 950,986 officers and teachers, and 9,081,092 Sunday school scholars. The figures of Methodism for the United States are found in the table above. The statistics are the latest procurable. There are in all sixteen Methodist bodies in the United States, and these have made a net gain in communicants in twenty-five years of 2,882,824, being the largest gain reported by any Protestant denomination. The gain during the past year in American Methodism has been 136,176 communicants.

THE Baptist denomination has made the record of another year of material and spiritual progress, notwithstanding the great war and the trying conditions it has brought to all the churches. The Baptist situation throughout the world is given as follows:

Place	Churches	Ministers	Members
North America	53,076	38,042	6,304,021
South America	197	79	14,299
All Europe	5,242	3,379	617,757
Asia	2,369	1,000	216,180
Africa	108	126	17,899
Australasia	343	235	30,168

In the United States and territories all of the Baptist organizations show gains in membership and resources. The total number of Associations reported is 1,986. Sunday schools, 43,597, officers and teachers, 335,620; scholars, 3,535,038. In the foreign field there were at latest reports: Baptist Missionary Church in Europe—members, 139,270; Sunday schools, 2,431; scholars, 119,440. In heathen lands—churches, 1,575; members, 166,330; Sunday schools, 1,970; scholars, 86,402. In the Home Missionary Department the whole number of missionaries in service was reported as 1,230.

THE year 1917 is a notable one in the work of the Lutheran Church. It marks the four hundredth anniversary of the beginning of Protestantism, and will reach its climax on October 31, 1917, the exact date of the anniversary of the nailing of the historic theses by Luther on the Castle Church door at Wittenberg, Germany. The plans for this year of Jubilee have proved a stimulus to all forms of church work during the year 1916. A marked feature of the year has been the production of numerous new publications. A movement has also been started during 1916 which contemplates the erection in Philadelphia of a monument to the patriarch Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, founder of the Lutheran Church in America. Planning for this great Jubilee promises to draw the various elements of the Lutheran Church closer together. Nearly all branches of the Lutheran Church are now cooperating in various ways. Lutherans, who can claim the largest enrolment in their Concordia Seminary of any Protestant theological seminary in America, report 9,831 ordained ministers, a net gain of 204. In their 15,069 congregations they have 2,445,276 confirmed and 3,774,774 baptized members. The net gain, smaller because of a drastic revision of church rolls than ordinarily would be the case, was 31,360. (Dr. Carroll's figures are very closely in agreement with the denomination's own estimates.)

The Lutheran statistics by bodies are given below:

	Ministers	Congregations	Communicants	Baptized members
General Council	1,753	2,606	517,931	800,892
General Synod	1,425	1,847	360,749	469,721
Synodical Conf.	3,268	3,909	827,056	1,336,661
United Synod, South	261	494	54,662	72,462
Independent Synods	3,124	6,221	684,878	1,095,038
Total	9,831	15,069	2,445,276	3,774,774

The tendency today is in the direction of the consolidation of the Lutheran Synods, and toward increased efficiency in the various departments, with a steady growth in membership at possibly a slightly reduced ratio.

IT has also been a stirring year in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Causes have been at work within the denomination which prevented new accessions from reaching a record number. There was an increase during the year of 26,739 communicants and 59 ministers and a loss of 7 churches. Mission work has gone on with unabated vigor, and 124 new missionaries have been sent to China, Japan, Brazil, Mexico, Alaska, Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines during the year. The total of Episcopal communicants enrolled in the United States shows considerably over 1,000,000 members, with 8,134 churches and 5,680 ministers.

The Presbyterian denomination looms up among those that have made substantial progress during the year, the net gain in communicants being 67,562, with 43 additional ministers. There has been in the same period a decrease of 86 churches, some of these being due to the merging of rival churches in rural neighborhoods. The total contributions for all causes during the year were $28,122,426, establishing a new record for the denomination. This is exclusive of its aid in war relief.

DURING the year the Reformed Church has reached he highest point in its history in the number of accessions to membership on confession. The latest Year Book of the denomination, commenting on the situation, says: "The figures should give cause for quiet confidence in God that he has not failed us in these days when the sneer of the critic is flung in our faces that 'the church is losing ground.'" In the number of ministers and churches, also, there has been a proportionate increase. The Reformed Sunday schools are also claimed as establishing a new record, the total enrolment being the highest the denomination has known in any year. It is also worthy of remark that the contributions for foreign missions are $9,000 ahead of the previous year, notwithstanding the multifarious demands on the church's charity due to the war.

SOME gains are reported in all branches of Congregationalism during the year. The latest official statistics, furnished to the Christian Herald by the National Council of the Congregational Churches in the United States, show these figures on international Congregationalism:

Chapels, churches and stations throughout the world	13,378
Membership in all lands	1,451,724
Sunday school membership	1,721,983

In the United States, according to the latest Year Book of the denomination, there were 6,103 Congregationalist churches, 5,997 ministers, and an estimated membership aggregating 780,414. Dr. Carroll's figures are very close to these totals. The Sunday school membership in the United States is placed at 766,103.

H. E. Rogers, statistical secretary of the Seventh Day Adventists, reports growth at home and abroad throughout the year. At the close of 1915, the denomination was conducting work in 92 countries, employing 9,476 laborers. It has now 26 union conferences, 130 local conferences, 109 mission fields, 3,876 churches, and 136,879 members, of whom 17,438 were baptized in 1915. The total contributions for evangelistic and institutional work during 1915 were $5,066,330.15, a per capita of $37.01. There was expended in mission territory during the year $1,133,786.58. The amount given for foreign missions by the members of all the Protestant bodies in the United States and Canada was, according to last report, an average of 81 cents per member, or, the report claims, less than one-eleventh of the average of members of the Seventh Day Adventist denomination.

CONDITIONS in the Society of Friends have not materially changed during the year. The four great branches, or divisions, known as the Orthodox, "Hicksite," "Wilburite" and Primitive, have been exceedingly earnest in advocating constructive peace work, and their numbers have kept well up in consequence. "Our gains during the last two years have not been greater than our losses from death and other causes," says a report from Assistant Secretary Walker of Philadelphia, "but there has been a decided increase in the religious activities of our meetings. The great desire of Friends at this time is that all the Christian churches shall unite with them in emphasizing the teachings of Jesus concerning war. How can people claim to 'believe in' the only begotten Son, when they reject, or only half accept, his plain teachings? What the world needs is 'less Churchianity and more Christianity.'" The Friends have a growing missionary work in Mexico, the West Indies and Africa, which is maintained at an annual cost of $45,000. During the past year they conducted a peace movement, sending out many thousands of pieces of missionary literature. The organization is in a healthy condition generally.

It is not easy to get anything like an accurate estimate of the strength of the Eastern Orthodox Churches in North America. The latest available estimates, however, give the following figures: Pure Russians from Russia, 50,000; Russians from Austria-Galicia, 20,000; Russians from Austria-Hungary, 14,000; Russians from Austria-Rumania, 5,000; Creoles in Alaska, 1,500; Aleuts, 1,500; Indians, 1,000; Eskimos, 800; Americans, 254; Persians, 77; Japanese, 28. Total membership of the Russian branch of the Greek Orthodox Church (1915), 94,159. It is claimed that in 1916–1917 the Russian Orthodox Church increased even in the face of war conditions, and that the foregoing figures are under the mark; that she has 100,000 actual, regular communicants, and some 300,000 irregular believers, making in all, in America, 400,000. In 1915 the church had but one bishop present in the United States; this year it has one archbishop, Most Rev. Evdokim, and three bishops, one of Canada, one of the West, and one of the Hungarian Church in America. There are several bishoprics to be filled. The Orthodox Church in America is not a proselyting body, but endeavors to hold her own, especially the young. It has in the United States church property valued at $1,500,000; 100 chapels, 257 parishes, 254 ministers, and schools in each parish.

THE Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (which claims to be the legal successor to and lawful continuation of the original Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and has been declared to be such by the United States Courts) has an actual enrolled membership, according to latest available reports, of 73,899, and is increasing. It is distributed throughout the United States, Canada, the British Isles and Australia, with missions in several foreign countries. Joint headquarters are at Lamoni, Iowa, and Independence, Missouri. The General Sunday School Association has a membership of 38,938, with 81 district organizations and a total of 746 schools and 3,213 teachers. These figures are furnished by R. S. Salyards, general secretary of the Reorganized Church.

There are 23 national sections of the Theosophical Society with international headquarters at Madras, India. The total membership of the Society is estimated at upward of 25,000, of which slightly more than one-fifth is in the United States. There are 174 American lodges or chapters. The international president of the society is Mrs. Annie Besant, social worker, orator, journalist and editor. During the past year 19 lodges have been chartered and 13 lodges dissolved. The executive officers in the United States are: National president, A. P. Warrington, Krotona, Calif.; Ray M. Wardall, Seattle, Wash., vice-president.

Secretary Dittemore, of the First Christian Scientist Church, Boston, in his latest report to this paper, announced 85 new organizations formed during the preceding twelve months, and 170 additional readers, who are the equivalent of ministers in other denominations. There are, however, a number of unorganized bodies of Scientists, known by, but not reporting to, the central organization, which does not make record of any bodies that are not chartered; consequently there is no official statement of total membership. It is estimated, however, by Dr. Carroll that the total Christian Scientist membership in the United States is upward of 85,000, with a considerable increase in churches and readers for the year.

The Salvation Army records a year of progress. It has 946 corps and outposts in the United States, with 7,367 local officers of various grades. It supports 134 industrial homes, 16 slum posts and nurseries, 25 hospitals, and 2 children's homes. Its whole statistics show progress, with representation in 60 countries and colonies, 9,673 corps and outposts, 1,173 social institutions, 17 naval and military homes, and between 40,000 and 50,000 meetings held weekly in different lands.

Several of the minor denominations have reported no material change in conditions. A few have made no direct reports.

It is evident from the reports received that, as a whole, the spiritual growth and material resources of the Protestant churches of America have not been seriously affected by the war. In many of the denominations the great crisis in the Old World has awakened a new sense of duty and responsibility, and a deeper conviction of the need of the church to draw nearer to God and work with intensified zeal for national and international righteousness.

Washington Stirred by a Revival

GIPSY SMITH, JR., has been stirring the national capital to an unusual interest in things spiritual. The evangelist came to Washington from Alexandria, Va., where he had conducted a very successful revival. The Washington meetings began January 28, when the big tabernacle, seating three thousand, on Sixteenth and V Streets, N. W., was formally dedicated, and continued until February 26. A committee of Presbyterian ministers, with Rev. John Carpenter Palmer, Washington Heights Church, as chairman, had the meetings in charge, but a number of churches of other denominations cooperated in a united effort to bring the largest blessing. For several weeks, meetings for special prayer and preparation were held throughout the city.

The evangelist was assisted by Forest Cole, leader, and a choir of four hundred trained voices. The music was a distinctive feature of the campaign. Thousands were turned away from the evening meetings, and overflow gatherings were held in St. Andrew's Protestant Episcopal Church. The audiences were cosmopolitan. Vice-President Marshall, Secretary of State Lansing, Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Daniels with their boys, and congressmen with their wives could be seen in the throngs. By the middle of February, over five hundred persons were recorded as "hitting the sawdust trail" and taking the evangelist by the hand in token of their determination to forsake sin and follow Christ.

Nine years ago Gipsy Smith, Sr., captured the hearts of the people of Washington, and night after night Convention Hall, seating six thousand people, was packed to hear the converted gipsy tell the story of the Cross. His son, Rev. Albany R. Smith, now thirty-six years of age, has something of his father's manner and forceful presentation. He has not only his gipsy ancestry, but also his wild seafaring experience, as a background for spiritual illustrations. He ran away from his home and for eight years served with the British Marines, traveling all over the world. The prayers of his godly parents followed him in his wanderings. After his conversion he worked his way through Crozier Seminary and was for two years associated with Dr. Wilbur Chapman in evangelistic work. In the presentation of the truth he is dynamic—a "chosen vessel" to convict sinners and arouse the "soundly sleeping" nominal church member, whose name is legion. "I want to jolt the church folk of Washington into a realization of the fact that they must live the Christian life," he says. "The world is tired of hearing explanations and expositions on religion. They want to see the Bible verified in human lives."

MRS. BELLE CALDWELL CULBERTSON.

Evangelist Biederwolf and party have recently closed a very successful revival campaign at Wilkinsburg, Pa., and on February 18 launched a new campaign in Lawrence, Mass. Thirty churches are cooperating, the local ministers are on the firing-line, cottage prayer meetings are being held four days a week, and every trolley car in the city is aiding the work of publicity by free advertising space. The tabernacle is 310 feet in length and 134 feet wide, with a seating capacity of 6,000. The platform holds a choir of 1,200.

Washington For Christ

Helping Old World Sufferers

THERE have always been people who could be depended upon to "stand by" an enterprise and see it through. The world likes such people and has revered many of them until the term "stand by" has come to be a mark of honor. In the dark days of the Revolution certain patriots stood by the Continental treasury pouring in money as other patriots spent blood and some invested life as well as gold. The nation holds these in grateful memory.

In this day when war is again desolating continents and is leaving in its wake the same old sorts of suffering, only in degrees magnified almost beyond our power of comprehension, the hand of America has ministered to this war-born misery in a measure never before known in the annals of relief. All misery has not been reached, all the suffering has not met succor; but the money given by the people of America has helped and has helped mightily to relieve in part the horrible total of distress. Today many mothers who, but for American giving, would be childless, hug their dear ones to their breasts, but other mothers beat their breasts in the helpless agony of a bereavement that need not have been for the giving, though generous judged by any former standard, is yet less than it could have been, less than it should have been, less than it will be.

After many urgent suggestions and prayerful consideration the Christian Herald Relief Fund announced the Monthly Offering plan. We recognized it, a business-like, efficient and thoroughly Christian method of meeting a continuing situation that changed but little except to grow worse. We have been much gratified at the response of the members of the Christian Herald Family to the first and the succeeding announcements of these Monthly Offering clubs. We have asked them to pray over the whole matter and to act in accordance with their judgment.

At this writing, March 1, there are 286 registered members of the clubs. The total gifts of the members of the first nine total $379 a month and the gifts of the members of Club No. 10 bring the total well above $400. This approaches $5,000 a year and at the rate the registrations are coming in it is probable that the yearly total will be in excess of $5,000 by the time you read this. For some weeks we have been planning to publish the names of the members of these clubs, which follow.

Please address your gifts to the Christian Herald, Room 93, Bible House, New York City. In due course acknowledgment will appear in the paper. State any preference you may have as to the use you wish made of your gifts.

JOHNSON'S PREPARED WAX

Now Made in Liquid Form

so that it may be more easily applied and polished. It is the same as our Paste Wax except that it is liquid.

A Wonderful Furniture Polish

Johnson's Prepared Wax Liquid cleans, polishes and finishes with one operation. It forms a thin protecting coat over varnish, greatly prolonging its life and beauty. It is easy to apply and may be polished instantly with but very little rubbing.

For Polishing Automobiles

Johnson's Prepared Wax Liquid is easy to apply and polish—a good sized car can be made to look like new in half an hour. It preserves the varnish and protects it from the weather, adding years to its life. It covers up mars and scratches—prevents checking and cracking—sheds water and does not gather dust.

Tell your dealer that Johnson's Prepared Wax is now made in liquid form and insist upon him securing it for you.

Circassian Walnut and Beauty

YOU can not expect your walnut furniture to reflect its true beauty, unless it is clean and shining—free from dust, dirt and soil. Its radiance is dimmed—the beauty of the grain is hidden.

Just try cleaning and polishing all your furniture and wood work this way: wet a piece of cheese cloth with water, wring it almost dry, add a little and go over the surface, then polish with a dry cloth. You will be astonished at the result—your furniture will reveal hidden beauties.

Remember, O-Cedar Polish is equally successful in cleaning, polishing and beautifying all woods and all finishes.

All dealers sell O-Cedar Polish in convenient sizes (25c to $3.00) with this distinct understanding—if you are not delighted with the results, money will be refunded without a question.

Anywhere in the City

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

HE was just a flower-seller, standing on the crowded corner of a city street—a dark, foreign-looking man, who shivered when the keen wind snapped past him, and held his tray of blossoms appealingly in hands that were blue with the cold.

"Vi'lets, nice vi'lets," he kept saying in a curious monotone. "Ver' cheap—ver' pretty! You buy-a de vi'lets?"

His voice held a certain appealing note, but—well, the street was very crowded, indeed, and the corner was a busy one. And the people brushed by, fighting with the wind, absorbed by their own thoughts, unheeding!

I watched the flower-seller. And as I watched him, I could not help noticing the people who passed him by.

THERE was the Stout Man. He wore a great fur-lined overcoat, and yellow chamois gloves, and expensive, made-to-order looking shoes. His face was red and his eyes were cynical, and when he heard the flower-seller's cry he sneered. When he sneered I felt that I thoroughly disliked the Stout Man. I could almost tell that he was thinking of the expensive orchids that he had bought last night for Marie to wear. I could almost feel him comparing them to the flower-seller's tight little bouquets.

AND then there was the Woman with the Sad Eyes and the glossy, shimmering black hair. Long ago, before her eyes were sad, she might have come from the flower-seller's own country—where the sun was a glorious ball of molten gold in the turquoise of the sky, where the breezes were soft, and red roses grew gloriously on the green of the hillside. The Woman with the Sad Eyes hurried by the corner with head averted and mouth drawn. I noticed that there was a bit of rouge on her lips, and that a brilliant blur of carmine stood out from the white of her cheeks.

AND then the Mother came. I could telll that she was a mother, for she carried many lumpy packages—packages that bulged and split and fell apart clumsily. One caught a vague glimpse of a tiny jacket, and a pair of stubby-toed little shoes, and a cheap wooden horse. She hesitated as she heard the flower-seller's voice, and her hand went longingly to her shabby black leather purse. Perhaps she was remembering how he had brought her roses once when he came a-courting. He was young then, and smiling, and buoyantly alive. And the violets were wrapped in waxy tissue paper, and tied with a silken cord. The Mother sighed and jerked her hand sharply away from the shabby little purse. A quarter was—a quarter, and the children needed so very many things!

THE Business Man walked past, head down, deep in thought. He had just put through a big deal, and he was going to rush up that contract and get it signed before some other fellow. . . . Perhaps the scent of the violets reached out to him; for, just for a moment, his face lost its hard look, and he sniffed the air eagerly, hungrily. And the stuff of dreams crept into his eyes, and one imagined that he might be thinking of her. Perhaps he remembered that her cheeks were tinted with the soft pink of springtime apple-blossoms; that her hair was a golden cloud in the lamp-light. But it must have been a very large contract, for of a sudden the Business Man jerked himself away from the corner and walked on briskly. I saw the dream fade out of his eyes, leaving only the hardness.

AND the Shopgirl came down the street. She came wearily, and I knew that she must be very tired. Waiting on hard-to-please people is not an easy task, and at the end of the day hearts as well as feet will ache. The Shopgirl walked wearily, but when she saw the tray of purple violets she stopped short, as if the fragrance of them made an invisible wall that blocked her way.

I couldn't help wondering what the blossoms made her remember; for on that busy street-corner I had seen the flicker of so many memories! I wondered as I saw her, doubtfully at first, draw a coin from her flat little pocket. That coin, I knew, meant luncheon and perhaps dinner to her. Shopgirls, oftentimes, are not very well paid. As she selected her bunch of flowers I watched her eagerly, and I saw that her pale thin little face looked almost happy—almost pretty. As she turned away from the flower-seller's tray she caught my gaze and, bridging the gap of convention and custom and indifference, we smiled. After a moment, hesitatingly, she stepped over to my side.

"Pretty, ain't they?" she questioned half shyly, the flowers pressed to her thin face. "D'you know what they make me think of?"

"I was just wondering," I answered. "I was just watching you, and wondering."

"I was raised," the Shopgirl told me, "in the country. Back of my house there was a deep meadow all damp and swampy in the springtime. It wasn't much of a field for farming, and my father used to let it run wild.

"There was more violets in that field than in any other part of the town! We children would always go there after school with little baskets, and we'd rake away the dead leaves and the moss and find them hiding away—and we'd fill our baskets with them. . . ." The Shopgirl's voice broke, and her misty eyes gazed away, past the city street, past the city itself, to the damp meadow where violets grew in the springtime. "An' we'd take them to the house," she told me, "an' put them in water in mother's old pewter dish, to dress up the dinner table . . ."

Did I imagine that the Shopgirl's hand trembled as it pressed the violets tight against her face?

"They remind me of home," she said.

OH, well, he was only a flower-seller on the crowded corner of a street. Only a flower-seller with a meager tray of the blossoms that grow wild, in the springtime, under country skies. Only a flower-seller with an appealing voice, and hands that were quite blue from the cold. . . . One may see just such flower-sellers anywhere in the city—in March!

A NEW QUEEN OF SHEBA. The rule of Lidj Jeassu, the grandson of Menelik of Abyssinia, was short and turbulent. The fact that he was deposed and succeeded by a daughter of Menelik was mentioned in the Christian Herald some months ago. The new empress, Zanditu, was not, however, to have plain sailing. Adherents of the deposed prince under the leadership of a powerful chief, marched against the capital in an effort to reverse the deposing incident. The first battle resulted in the complete annihilation of the army of the empress. Another army was gathered and after a fight in which rifles were finally discarded and the troops of both sides fought with scimeters and spears in ancient fashion, the loyal army was finally victorious and returned to the capital for a grand review. It is now reported that the new empress has received the formal submission of all the chiefs of Abyssinia. The trouble is said to have been caused by the young emperor having come under Turkish influence which offended the Christian population, but having fought it out it is to be presumed that Abyssinia is thoroughly Christian again.

Mitchell SIXES

The $1150 Model

Another John W. Bate Value

This year Mitchell Junior—with 120-inch wheelbase—shows another result of factory efficiency. Its size, its power, its beauty and equipment offer amazing value.

Its very purpose is to serve efficiency. It is for men who want a 5-passenger car with ample room and power. But who don't want to pay for 7-passenger room and power.

It is for men who want, in a smaller Six, all the Mitchell extra values. But note that it has 40-horsepower. And from hub to hub it measures 120 inches.

Both 100% Over-Strength

Both sizes in Mitchells are built to the standard of 100 per cent over-strength. That's twice our former standard. Both are built for lifetime cars—for at least 200,000 miles.

Over 440 parts are built of toughened steel. The safety parts are all oversize. We use a wealth of Chrome-Vanadium. We test our gears for 50,000 pounds per tooth.

You will find no other car under $2000 built anywhere near like the Mitchells.

$4,000,000 in Extras

The Mitchells have extras which, on this year's output, cost about $4,000,000.

There are 31 distinct features—like a power tire pump—which nearly all cars omit.

We have this year added 24 per cent to the cost of finish, upholstery and trimming. This comes from savings in our new body plant, which saves us hundreds of thousands of dollars.

See these extras. You are bound to want them in the car you buy to keep.

Marvels of Efficiency

The Mitchells show you what factory efficiency can accomplish in motor car building. They are built by John W. Bate, the great efficiency engineer. They are built in a factory which he erected and equipped—a 45-acre plant. All the extra values are due to his savings. He has cut our factory cost in two. You will not find like values in any other fine car. Let your Mitchell dealer prove that.

HOLEPROOF HOSIERY

THIS is one difference between Holeproof Hosiery and common hose—Holeproofs do not accumulate in the darning basket.

Though worn and washed repeatedly they will need no darning for months; they will seem like new — smooth, shapely, snug and comfortable.

There is no other method, apparently, of producing fine-spun hose that wear like these.

Questions and Answers

J. M., Newark, N. J. What is the meaning of "the Kingdom of heaven cometh not with observation"? Are we not to wait and watch for it?

You do not have to wait for the coming of the Kingdom. It is here now. Jesus our King planted it in the hearts of men (Luke 17 : 21). It is in the heart of every one of his followers today. It is a Kingdom both in heaven and on earth. John the Evangelist saw it in his vision coming down out of heaven. Here, though existent and necessarily imperfect, it is the type of the perfection which will be attained when the King in person comes to reign. Even now he is with us, ruling in the hearts and lives of his faithful ones, for he has said, "I am with you alway." It is the highest joy of the true believer to know the great truth that Jesus is King; that he rules as Sovereign in an uncounted multitude of lives and that his followers are to be found in every land under the sun, winning others to his service. They know, too, that the Kingdom has no sectarian boundaries, and that King Jesus has many faithful subjects, even outside of all churches, who are serving him well. They know also that there will come a time—it may be long delayed, even until the King himself returns—when all boundaries and limitations will disappear and his followers will be "one flock with one shepherd." John in the vision of the Kingdom relates that he saw "no temple therein." Churches, which are doing such good service today, will then no longer be divided, but will merge in one, and the whole Kingdom will be given over to loyal, loving, universal service.

J. E. R., Cincinnati, Ohio. We are familiar with Moody's famous sermon, "Three Steps to Salvation," and we believe that if the advice it gives were taken it would bring joy and assurance to many who are "weak" Christians because of lack of courage to take the "three steps." The steps are, first, believe with the heart; next, confess Christ with the lips before men; and third, be open and unashamed of it. A timid, hesitating, doubtful confession is next to none at all, and carries no force with it. The believer should definitely fix his status by letting others know just where he stands. A noted evangelist once told us that until he made it a duty to confess Christ at every fitting opportunity, he had no idea there were so many "silent" believers. He met on his travels many men and women who thanked him personally for illustrating a duty the performance of which they had neglected, and which they then and there promised to fulfil in future. Those who fail to acknowledge Christ before men not only curtail the influence they might exert in winning others, but they miss the great joy that always comes to the soul that has declared its loving and loyal allegiance.

B. H. T., Cincinnati, Ohio. The phrase "heap coals of fire on his head," found in Romans 12 : 20, has been taken in two senses, namely: First—as a means of aggravating the sense of guilt on the part of the person affected, and making his punishment greater. Second—that by returning good for evil we may expect at length to subdue and overcome the evil in our enemy's heart—as burning coals consume all that is inflammable—thus bringing to pass his shame and repentance. The latter is unquestionably the right meaning, as, if we are to overcome evil with good, it is not intended that we should aggravate, but rather subdue by our kindliness and generosity, and the evidence of our forgiveness. That this is the sense is evident from the whole context of the verses from 17 to 21.

H. S. F., Lakeside, Calif. The Christian view of giving to the Lord's work is that all should give according as they have been prospered; not grudingly but gladly, as both a privilege and a duty. There are many good people who hold to the tithing system, giving a full tenth of the income, and who find a blessing in so doing.

J. L., Berwyn, Ill. The passage in John 19 : 14, referring to the preparation for the Passover, implies that the two preceding Fridays were "high days," on which the people by solemn ceremony made preparation for the day of the paschal feast.

L. B., Walkerville, Mich. There are many points in connection with prophecy that no human being should attempt to unravel. Diligent study of God's Word, the prophecies included, is to be commended; but we have seen so many abject failures on the part of those who assumed to be authoritative interpreters of the prophecies, that we are satisfied that such attempts, however well meant, are certain to come to nought.

M. J. H., Nazareth, Pa. There is nothing in Scripture to justify prayers for the dead, and it is not a custom in Protestant churches.

W. J. L., Lanark, Ill. Did the Roman Catholic Church have a continuous existence from the days of the apostles, or did it spring from the apostolic church?

In apostolic days and long afterward, there was but one Christian Church. It spread to various countries—Egypt, Greece, Asia Minor, Rome, and to some other parts of southern Europe. As early as A. D. 180–190, or nearly two centuries after the birth of Christ, the Church of Rome was endeavoring to establish a supreme power. Some of the bishops of the Christian Church favored Rome, while others opposed the setting up of an episcopate with world-wide power, and clung to the old church as founded in apostolic times. Waite, in his "History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200," says: "It was during the sixth period that the foundations of the great ecclesiastical power [Rome] were laid. Yet," he adds, "for more than one hundred years after the foundation of the Church of Rome, there is no trace of its jurisdiction over other churches, outside of the Italian provinces." That there was a line of bishops in Rome is undisputed, but there is nothing in historical evidence to show that they exercised supreme jurisdiction. Serapion, Bishop of Antioch, in 190 A. D., was still engaged in the unification of the church. McClintock and Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia is authority for the statement that "as far as is known, Bishop Siricius, in the fourth century, was the first to use the word 'Pope' as a title."

G. F. S., Cowansville, Pa. P. P. Bliss's song, "Let the Lower Lights Be Burning," is said to have been inspired by the gleaming of a beacon light through a storm at sea, and of the smaller lights along the shore as the ship approached harbor. To Bliss's mind came the words of Matt. 5 : 16—"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

Reader, New York. Doubtless the meetings to be held by Evangelist Sunday will be very largely attended, and many will be unable to get in. By all means you should take your young son if possible, assuming that he is of an age to understand such addresses. We are reminded of a story that is told about a boy named Paul, who wanted to hear Evangelist Moody when he was preaching in Chicago in the heyday of his great popularity. Paul tried to get a ticket, but failed; and he hung around the entrance to the big building, puzzled to know how he might get in. A big, strong man was passing and looked at the boy. "Do you want to go to the meeting?" he asked. "Yes, but I can't get in," said Paul. "Sam Jones told me to hear Moody preach if I ever got a chance, and now I can't get in." "You take hold of my coat-tail," said the big man, "and I'll get you in." Young Paul took a tight hold of the coat-tail, and the big man plowed ahead through the crowd, with the little fellow hanging on behind. Right up the aisle he went and clean up to the platform, with the boy still tightly attached. It was a great surprise to Paul when he found that he had been hanging on to Moody's coat-tail! Now that boy is Rev. Paul Rader, the present pastor of the Moody Church in Chicago, and one of the finest evangelists in the country. So you see that if a boy wants to go to meeting, it is a good thing to help him, even if he has to go in on somebody's coat-tail.

Several Readers. Dr. Gray's articles on "Mountain Peaks of Prophecy" will appear in due time, and we ask the patient indulgence of our readers pending their preparation.

H. F. C., Suring, Wis.: The whole amusement question is one to be largely decided by the individual conscience. Any well-balanced mind must recognize that there are amusements which are pernicious and others that are elevating. The love of good music is a commendable thing when rightly fostered, and there are few elements in our social life that give more genuine satisfaction. There are people, however, who take the narrow view that to be a Christian one must cultivate a gloomy habit of mind, and frown down every species of entertainment, good or bad. We distinctly draw the line at vicious amusements. There are enough of the other class to satisfy all tastes. There is a wide difference between a vulgar burlesque and a sublime opera or a fine concert, at which not only splendid voices but the best productions of the great masters of song are reproduced with wonderful skill and beauty.

A Wisconsin reader sends us the brief outline of the career of a youth who, born in poverty, left school at thirteen, reached Northern Canada at sixteen with a total capital of ten dollars, worked for ten years as a hired man, was converted at twenty-three, borrowed enough to enter the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, worked his way through, taking extra studies, got his diploma at twenty-nine, and is now preaching on a home mission field with three churches and two missions in Wisconsin. Next fall he goes to college to complete his education. It is a case in which grit, grace and gumption have won out against unusual difficulties, and it should stimulate other young aspirants to increased efforts to make the best of their own lives. We occasionally have rather despondent letters from those who are struggling to get an education. Let them take courage from this remarkable illustration. What you seek is attainable, if you will only work for it.

J. T. Van P., Long Beach, Calif. Your pastor has the right idea in organizing prayer circles for a world-wide revival of Christianity. It is what is needed everywhere, at home as well as abroad. There never will be peace or happiness in the world until the divine leadership is recognized, and the doctrines taught by the Son of God are put into practice. We would like to hear of such circles being formed everywhere.

G. D. D., Hampton, N. H. Your interesting letter greatly appreciated. We congratulate you on your ripe old age, your clear views, and your kindly enthusiasm.

A. D., Loma, Colo. "Reverend," applied to ministers, is a title of courtesy and not one specially conferred by any college or institution of learning. It is as though one should say "pastor," or "shepherd," or "spiritual leader."

H. J. S., Owego, N. Y. What you should have is the Geodetic Survey map, showing all roads and altitudes. Each map covers from one to several townships. Write United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, Washington, D. C., for the map covering your section. It is furnished at cost.

M. A. B., Des Arc, Ark. Please explain John 3 : 5.

Some expositors of this passage have held that the birth of water and Spirit can only refer to Christian baptism; others have denied it. The safest exposition is one which follows closely the evangelist's own statement; and in doing so we find that what he meant was not so much a reference to physical baptism as to a union of the physical with the higher spiritual baptism. Christ meant to convey here the meaning that whereas the physical baptism was a symbol and sign of regeneration, there was more required, namely, the engendering of the influence of the Holy Spirit, to make the baptism completely efficacious.

M. J. C., Milford, Mich. Do you not attribute too much power to greed and graft? Are not the things attained through them questionable and perishable possessions? Honesty is, as it always has been, the best policy, viewed from any angle. It insures far more of the real treasures of life than any other policy. Did you ever read "The Vicar of Wakefield"? There was a scamp who always was cheating his honest neighbor; but the scamp died in debtor's prison, never having prospered, while the honest man, though often cheated, was prosperous and happy. It is not mere fiction, but a page from the book of human life; and there are many pages like it.

J. G. S., Atlantic, Iowa. It is generally held among churches that a basement or other part of the church building, suitable for social and educational purposes of a wholesome and uplifting order, is not only proper but very desirable. There is nothing in it inconsistent with church work, and it is generally found to be a great aid. It brings the church into closer contact with the public, particularly the young people. We have never known of its being a failure, so long as it is kept subsidiary to the purpose of the church, and the Gospel message is held up as the main thing.

Some time ago the Mail-Bag published a communication from a reader in Panaca, Nevada, which stated that the town of Pioche, with a mining population of some 600, and many ranches round about, had practically no church and no pastor and needed both. This week we have a letter from the Right Rev. George C. Hunting, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Nevada, which gives a different view of the situation at Pioche. The bishop writes: "Pioche has two churches, one Roman Catholic and one a union church. The Roman priest comes to Pioche once a month for a Sunday and services; and a priest of the Episcopal Church is there two Sundays each month, having three services on each, and is in town several week-days a month for pastoral work. The Methodist minister comes occasionally. A Sunday school is conducted every Sunday morning, and it has a majority of all the children in town on its roll. The matter of baptisms is carefully looked after, the Holy Communion is regularly celebrated, the Gospel is preached, the children taught, those in trouble comforted, and the needy helped; and my judgment is that 'S' of Panaca could find many places which need the services of a minister more than Pioche. Further: the population is about 250, and there are no ranches scattered around." From all of which it seems clear that the writer of the original letter on the subject had not been correctly informed and probably erred through overzeal. We take pleasure in giving the bishop's statement as a matter of simple justice to all concerned.

A number of responses have been received from our readers in reply to the question of B. S., Winsted, Conn., printed in a recent issue, namely: "What is the greatest thing to look forward to in 1917?" The replies are given below:

Reader, Fairfield, Vt., writes: "The divine command is 'Search the Scriptures.' This will be the greatest thing to look forward to. The Scriptures will be searched as never before. The year 1917 will witness the fulfilment of Dan. 12 : 4, 'Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased'—not the knowledge of man, but the knowledge of God, who he is, what he is, where he is."

Mrs. S. W. C., Keene, N. H "People can see that it is sin that has brought about this unfavorable condition of affairs, and which continues it; and it behooves all who are old enough to be responsible to examine ourselves and try to live up to our highest privileges, turning from all forms of sin to righteous living, using the Bible instruction as our guide."

M. L. B., Worcester, Mass. "The greatest thing to look forward to would be the answer to the prayer of the Christian Herald of January 17, 1917, namely, the righting of the world's wrongs, the healing of the world's sorrows, the cleansing of the world's sin, the bringing of the world's wanderers to the feet of God. To this I would add, a world-wide revival of 'the old-time religion' in all its power."

Mrs. M. T., Greensboro, N. C. "I am led to believe a more earnest and universal preparedness to meet our God is the thing most to be desired."

L. D. R., Grand Rapids, Mich. "The event which, to all Christians, should be the constant and all-absorbing thought and anxiety is the coming of our Lord. We may pray and look forward for world peace, but, according to the Word, individuals and nations will be engaged in wars while the 'prince of this world' is in power. When the King comes, and not until then, will we have peace."

E. L. C., Alamo, Calif. "It is the strangest thing to me that every Christian does not see that the greatest thing that can possibly happen to this world is the Second Coming of Christ."

Miss A. T., Urbana, Ill. "I think the greatest thing to look forward to in 1917 would be the universal recognition of the divine sovereignty."

J. P. C., Lane, Idaho. "One of the greatest things would be the end of the European War, and the bringing about of peace on earth and good will toward men all over the world."

J. A. D., Plevna, Kan. "To give America nation-wide prohibition, so that people will get God in their minds instead of a whisky bottle."

F. W. P., Hartford, Conn. "Andrew was so inspired that he hastened to bring his brother Simon, afterward Peter, to the Light of the World. Pray that Christians may realize this great truth, namely: the only Jesus to whom brethren and sisters may now be brought is the manifest Jesus incarnated in the individual life. There is a holy of holies within the citadel of each personality, and if this is God-infilled there will be no dark place therein, but so much of life and light will be reflected therefrom that those within its influence shall no more walk in darkness, but in and toward the light. Let us look forward to this fruition, devoutly to be hoped and prayed for."

A. T., Denver, Colo. "I expect the war to end this year, and whichever side wins, I think the Jews will gain more religious and political liberty, and there will be a great rush to the Holy Land and a vast work of colonization and building in the Greater Palestine, which means most of Mesopotamia. I look at the Saviour's prophecy in Matt. 24 : 14—'This Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come.' Many millions in China and India and Africa and South America have never either heard or read the Gospel."

Mrs. P. H. D., Miami, Fla. "The greatest thing to be desired for 1917 is that all people may come to know God more fully."

Dr. W. E. L., Wellington, S. C. "The greatest thing to look forward to in 1917, in my humble opinion, is that the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage may be abolished from the face of the earth. Is it not the greatest evil we have to contend with, the devil's best friend, and God's worst enemy?"

W. H. S., Leonardville, Kan. "The proposition of lasting peace has first place in the minds of all. A square deal for all who labor must be a part of the permanent peace monument. Permanent peace must include the overthrow of monopoly of the means of production. No agreement between nations, under the present rules of society, will gain lasting peace."

J. B. A., Clarkson, Ga.; Mrs. M. J. W., Brooklyn, N. Y.; Rev. L. J. C., Bangor, Me.; L. M. van M., Dade City, Fla., and several others hold that the great thing to be desired is the Second Coming of our Lord.

Our Master Cutlers Grind the Guesswork Out of Razor Buying

Every GENCO Razor is hand forged, hand ground, scientifically hardened and tempered in our factory. We don't claim that razors just as good haven't come from abroad. But we do claim that GENCO Razors are uniformly better than the best of the foreign blades, because the even quality of our razor steel and our methods of making insure a uniformity in the finished razor that no foreign manufacturer has ever equalled. The GENCO trademark on the tang of every GENCO blade is the self shaver's and barber's guide to a definite standard of quality, no matter when or where he buys the razor.

KY-AN-IZE

White Enamel

The beautiful, sanitary whiteness of fine enameled woodwork and furniture that women love is best obtained by using Kyanize White Enamel.

This popular American-made white enamel imparts a soft, velvety coat to wood, metal or plaster—inside or outside the house—that endures.

Kyanize renews and keeps new everything it touches. Wear, weather and wet seem powerless to mar its porcelain-like beauty. Soap and water are good for it. It is the whitest, most durable and most satisfactory white enamel made.

This is the Sign of the Kyanize Dealer

USE KYANIZE FLOOR FINISH for all floors, interior woodwork and furniture. It is waterproof — easily applied — dries hard with a beautiful, durable gloss that brings out the natural grain and beauty of the wood.

If there is no Kyanize Dealer in your locality send us your Dealer's name and 10 cents for postage—and we will send you a trial can (White Enamel or any color of Kyanize Floor Finish.) and a brush to apply it. Don't fail to mention color you want.

Jesus the Way, the Truth and the Life

International Sunday School Lesson for March 25
A Review Lesson

John's Picture of the Christ

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

MOST of us are teaching others the Gospel according to John; the rest are studying it ourselves. It is always a problem to plan a good review, but when properly conducted it helps to keep the landmarks in sight and to summarize progress. This week many of us will read the first half of the Gospel right through at a sitting and ask ourselves what the author's plan was. He is presenting his Jesus, the Light and the Life of men, in order that men may believe. Various incidents of the life of Christ are used, and furnish the basis for John's comment and interpretation. Christ is all in all to him, and he wishes to show Christ's many-sidedness, spiritual power and divinity. So he shows

I. Jesus at Work

(1) Getting Disciples. Men of various temperaments and abilities, in whom he sees the ambassadors of the coming Kingdom. Today as then he can use all sorts and conditions of men if they are only sincere and teachable.

(2) Purging the Temple. There are wrongs to be remedied, even in the Church of God. Jesus is fearless, direct, a Reformer who will not tolerate abuses, a Minister who refuses to countenance bad customs.

(3) Instructing the Wise. Telling the high councilor the things that have hindered truth; not hesitating to set forth the most searching questions of the soul.

(4) Helping the Ignorant. The poor woman of Samaria was low and common and perplexed, but he led her gently to the sublime and plain requirements of God.

(5) Healing Bodies and Minds. Jesus cared for the sick boy and the old cripple. He also cared for the distracted father and led him to the faith of the Kingdom, and put the man of Bethesda on his guard against sin.

(6) Feeding the Hungry. Physically out of compassion for their condition, and spiritually from the same motive. He not only saves sick and crippled, but knows how to keep all strong and well.

(7) Feeding the Slaves of Sin. Christ comes to the world with a great emancipation proclamation from the Father, with the good news of the "right to become children of God," a message of freedom in the truth.

II. The "I Ams" of Jesus

LET us set the class to work locating the striking teachings that begin "I am." Let us list that roll of mighty affirmations ourselves. Jesus at work accomplished what he did because of what he was. Long before, God had revealed himself to Moses as Jehovah, the Living One, the great I AM of the universe. Jesus too comes with mighty realities, overwhelming certainties, in the face of all the waverings and the needs of the world. He comes to make up our deficiencies, to supplement our shortcomings, to build us in his own glorious likeness.

If teaching others get them to make a list of these from memory. Then locate the verses. Then ask for the needs that they meet. Note how positive they are, how constructive, how gentle and free from fault-finding. Search for others.

I am the Light of the World.—The World's Darkness.

I am the Bread of Life.—Our Hunger and Weakness.

I am the Way.—Man's Waywardness.

I am the Good Shepherd.—Our Need of Care and Guidance.

I am the Door.—Insecurity and Homelessness.

I am the Resurrection.—Our Mortality and Bereavements.

III. Meditation on the Golden Text

RIGHT here let me commend to you the reading of Thomas à Kempis's book, the "Imitation of Christ." I do not know of anything better to put one en rapport with the Holy Spirit, particularly if you come to the time of prayer or worship disturbed and vexed with cares. This saint of long ago has a way of turning over the sayings of the Lord in his mind and getting varied gleams of light as from a crystal. Of course you will not always exactly agree with him. Remember he lived in a monastery all his life and was a fifteenth century Catholic in creed. But he always goes straight to Jesus, and seems to hear his voice, speaking as here, for example:

"Follow me; I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Without the Way, there is no going; without the Truth, there is no knowing; without the Life, there is no living.

"I am the Way which thou must follow, the Truth which thou must believe, the Life which thou must hope for. I am the Way inviolable, the Truth infallible, and the Life interminable. I am the Way most straight, the Truth most high, the true Life, the blessed Life, the eternal Life.

"If thou abide in my Way, thou shalt know the Truth, and the Truth shall make thee free, and thou shalt lay hold on eternal Life.

"If thou wilt enter into Life, keep the commandments. If thou wilt know the Truth, believe me."

The Way of Christ

THE earliest designation of Christianity was "the Way," as we see in Acts 9:2, 22:4, 24:14 and other places. In II Peter it is called "the Way of Righteousness" and "the Way of Truth." So you see our religion was from the first a practical thing, a way of living upon a higher plane. Salvation was not thought of as an incident in life but as a continuous experience of the Christian. Christ became the Companion of the journey through the world, and these early Christians were good for the long, steady march of life. Any one can "be good" for a sprint, but it is a new Way indeed when it becomes possible for a man to feel, "For me to live is Christ." We need to gain anew the fresh, simple vision implied by the Indian converts in their expression, following the Jesus Road. Dr. Sheldon rendered a real service when he called our attention to following Jesus in the every-day emergencies of life in his much-discussed book "In His Steps; or, What Would Jesus Do?" There is bound to be some difference of opinion as to what Jesus would do in some cases. But, on the whole, this would be a more beautiful world if all the professed followers of the Christ would strive earnestly to walk in his ways.

We come to Christ in various ways, but after we reach him he becomes The Way Home to God. When the Pilgrim entered the Wicket Gate the way stretched plain before him. The New Testament affords a higher road than the Old, but the same command of loyal obedience, "This is the Way, walk ye in it."

Christ the Truth

THE Truth about what? About the soul and its Maker. For there are many strange misrepresentations of both in human teaching. The Greeks believed in gods many and sinful and capricious. The savages dread cruel and demonic spirits. The modern materialist denies both God and soul. Now there have been disputes about the divinity of Christ, but the bigger and more inclusive question is the Christlikeness of God, the Almighty Ruler of the Universe. Is there a God, and is he like Jesus? Men refuse to believe it still. Some men have told me that it is too good to be true—this message of a loving almighty Power that cares with Father-heart for every soul. But it is gloriously the Truth back of all truth. And with this tidings that God is love comes the corollary that by his grace we shall enter immortal fellowship with him in the working out of his divine will. God is good, man is his child—this is the truth revealed in Jesus.

We have seen in our study how Jesus also revealed to Nicodemus the direct movement of God's spirit on man, without respect of persons. Jesus tells also the Truth of soul's relation to soul in the great conception of the Kingdom of God, in which all become brothers, bound in a new relationship of respect and service for each other.

Christ the Life

JOHN gripped the message of Life that rang through the teaching of the Master: "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." John begins his Gospel by stating, "In him was life; and the life was the light of men." Jesus came to impart life and to teach men how to live. He gives a new quality to life that lifts it up above mere existence to the plane of the infinite." "I give unto them eternal life."

We rightly use the expression "the Christian life." For Christianity is a life. There are things to be, things to do, as well as things to know. The church, the classroom and the altar are not all. Ours is an active religion, "Go and do likewise." We can't sit and sing our souls away to everlasting bliss. Jesus heals the sick—that they may live more. He saves the sinner—to live better. We are not to lean on Jesus like weaklings, but to march on victoriously in his strength. He is the Bread of Life that makes us strong and energetic, not crutches to rest on. A witty evangelist says, "Jesus never called himself the bed of life, but the Bread." In other words, Christians are not to lie down upon their faith, but to be full-armored, thoroughly furnished unto all good works, soldiers of the future, stewards of the grace of God, servants of the King.

Sunday School Methods

By Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Plan Missionary Tours

ONE of the new ways of making missions real to children and young people is the plan of taking them on imaginary tours to foreign fields. So fascinating and successful is the method that it bids fair to become the popular way of making missions real in the Sunday school.

For instance, the Sunday School Department of the Presbyterian Board of Missions has planned an eight weeks' tour of Latin America, starting Inauguration Day, 1917, and returning Sunday, April 22.

In the Bushwick Avenue M. E. Bible School of Brooklyn, a unique missionary tour around the world is now being carried out in the Intermediate Department. The real objective was a visit by the Department classes to see Miss Ruth Brown, a former scholar in the school, and now a missionary at Nanking, China. The journey is made from New York eastward. Each class selects its auto for the journey, cutting out a car from some advertisement. On this car is placed the number of the class.

A large map of the world hangs in front of the department. The cars are pinned about New York for the start. If the cars have 100 per cent. in attendance they move on to the countries in regular order:

The suggestion is that ten minutes be given to the subject each Sunday in the classes and from the platform. One thing is sure: our neighbors to the south will seem more like real neighbors to the children and young people after this course is completed.

The Missionary Education Department of the Baptist Board of Foreign Missions, New York, is planning to take their Sunday schools to Japan, to show the scholars the wonders of that land. Each Sunday, the Sunday schools have a brief lesson on Japan, graded to the departments and illustrated by charts.

The interest on the part of the classes in this novel plan is intense, and missions and mission fields will seem a bit closer to these young people because of the trip.

Complete Your Home

Your home is not complete without these modern building necessities. Designed to protect the good looks of your home and grounds from the careless coal man—to provide for the most sanitary method of garbage disposal, and for the safest and cleanest delivery of your milk and packages.

Majestic

not only make every home complete, but they save work and steps for every housewife, making up for their small cost in a very short time.

Majestic Coal Chute keeps your house, lawns and grounds clean, because every piece of coal falls into the bin. The door locks open automatically, protecting the building above the opening just where the damage always occurs. Absolutely burglar-proof. Easily installed in old buildings or built into new ones.

Majestic Underground Garbage Receiver protects the health of your family because it keeps your garbage buried. Sanitary, emits no odors and keeps the contents safe from dogs, vermin and flies. Always convenient, never unsightly.

Majestic Package Receiver is placed in the kitchen wall for receiving milk bottles and packages from the outside, insuring them against theft and keeping them clean and in sanitary condition.

Majestic Duplex Heating System for homes, stores, etc., is used in thousands of residences, stores, banks and offices. Not only does the Majestic Duplex System supply warm air, but it draws the cold air from the floors to the furnace. The warm air is discharged through the large front face of the register and the cold air is taken in at both ends. The Duplex Register is made like a seat, and is insulated with heavy asbestos millboard. Can be used as an auxiliary table, counter or seat, and merchandise can be placed on top without fear of damage.

Other Majestic Specialties

The Majestic line is complete, including Coal Chutes, Underground and Built-in Garbage Receivers, Milk and Package Receivers, Rubbish Burners, Duplex One-Register Store-Heating Systems, Metal Plant Boxes, Pipe and Pipeless Furnaces, etc.

These are completely described and illustrated in our new catalog. Send for your copy today.

A Message to Cæsar

ever seen the great wicker image? The fires? Hast heard the cries of the sacrifice?"

The Roman held silence and the prince went on: "I never saw one, but an old man told me. They build an image of green osiers and put the sacrifice inside, weaving up the doorway. They kindle two fires near it, not near enough to burn the green wood, but so near that the sacrifice is slowly killed." With a curious catch in his voice he added, "That is the way I shall serve the gods."

The Roman understood at last, but did not believe. "Impossible! Thy father will never consent. In anger he might smite thee, but he would never allow such a thing to be done to thee, his own son."

"My father is very angry and will not be himself. They will see that he has too much wine." Caradoc spoke a little bitterly, adding as though making excuse, "My father will not be master in this village tomorrow. My uncle Modred, as chief of the Druids, will be master, with hundreds of Druids to do his will. My father could not save me now."

"If thou wouldst take the priest's robe thou wouldst be safe. Take it for a while, till I can bring thy matters to Cæsar. Take it to save thy life!"

"Wouldst thou, a Roman, ask me to swear falsely to save my life?"

Even in the dark the Roman felt the eyes of Caradoc upon him and flushed. How many times in after years, surrounded by Oriental pomp and Oriental intrigue, finding by sad experience that even a Christian bishop might not be above falsehood, how many times he wished for one man who would not forswear himself! He had no answer.

After quite a pause the prince said, "Wilt thou take my message to Cæsar?"

"Certainly I will. But is there no way of escape? Canst thou not flee? Could not the guard be persuaded to let thee go?"

The Roman spoke more loudly than he realized. The guard sprang into the hut, crying, "Where is my prince?" Groping, he found the feet of Caradoc, and kissing them said, "My prince, go! I myself will go with thee."

"Thou wouldst soon be missed. They would easily follow and take us."

"Then I will stay and keep guard. If any inquire I will say thou sleepest. Thou wilt go far before day."

"Whither shall I go? The priests in any town will know and seize me."

"Go to the nearest Roman house and appeal to Cæsar," said the Roman.

"What Roman would dare to hide or help a Christian? Thou knowest the imperial edicts."

Again a silence, broken by the sobs of the guard.

The prince spoke wearily. "Guynol, go back to thy post, lest some one miss thee. Roman, go thou to thy rest, and forget not my message to Cæsar."

Kissing the hand of the prince and wetting it with his tears, the guard withdrew.

"When" — the Roman hesitated — "when will they question thee again?"

"There is a sacred mistletoe on the oak under which I found thee. They cut it tomorrow. I think they will do that first."

"Then it will be toward noon that they will come for thee?"

"I think so."

Warmly embracing the prince, giving him the kiss of peace on both cheeks and forehead, and bidding him keep up hope, the Roman also withdrew from the hut and followed the servant Malchus toward the king's house.

MEN were busily working, clearing away where the feast had been. Malchus pointed to a group who were not clearing away but building. They had fastened stout green poles in the ground and were weaving green osiers in and out. The poles were bent and tied in a grotesque outline.

"What is it?" The Roman felt a thrill of fear in his heart.

"That is for the sacrifice to the gods. O Roman, save my prince!" and Malchus knelt and clasped his knees.

Boy as he was, the Roman bent over

Laugh like a baby— YOURSELF!

I suppose every man thinks his business makes people happy.

But I wonder if any other one individual ever brought pleasure to as many folks as did my father, Gerhard Mennen—by his invention of Talcum Powder.

Think of it—millions and millions and millions of cheery, chuckling babies—just because MENNEN.

Did it ever occur to you that one way to keep your own skin as soft and fresh as baby's—is to treat it the same way? And that the same thing that turns his whining fretfulness into coos and gurgles of content, might go part of the way, at least, with his big brothers and sisters—even with you?

Well,—try it.

Begin with hands and face. Douse them with Mennen's after you wash them and see how easy your hands and face feel!

Then try it all over. Yes—I'm an enthusiast. But you will be, too, when you've tried it.

There are hundreds of brands of talcum powder nowadays. One or two are possibly as good as Mennen's.

But why take chances—when it's so easy to say "Mennen's" and be sure.

the kneeling man and said, "I will." Authority spoke in voice and manner. He turned toward the king's house by way of the main street. The guards admitted them without question and soon he stood again in the sleeping-room of the prince. Turning to the servant, he asked, "Lovest thou thy prince?"

"Domine! thou knowest that I love him!"

"Fearest thou the forest?"

"To save my prince? I fear nothing!"

"Bring me tablets."

Quickly Malchus found writing material. Quickly the Roman wrote, folded, and pressed upon the wax with his ring.

"Take this to Cæsar at Eboracum. See that thou let it not out of thy hand save to Cæsar's own. Speed thy best. When thou comest to a Roman house show thy message and demand a horse to Cæsar."

"I can take a horse here, domine."

"Do so. Take this." And he handed Malchus the ring with which he had sealed the message. "If thou meetest a Roman guard show the ring and command them to come here. Now go, and Apollo give thee speed." The servant kissed his hand and went.

The Roman flung himself upon a couch to think, but he was more tired than he knew. "Jesus Christus, if thou be God, speed that man," he murmured as his wearied eyelids closed.

WHEN the Roman left the king's presence, the old Druid and the visiting kings were coming in. They talked together of the interests common to their peoples. The good wine that King Llewellyn loved too well circulated freely. The kings became hilarious and then maudlin.

The old Druid slipped away from the revelers. Outside he paused to watch the busy workmen in the square. Observing Gryffyth busy about the sacrificial image, the old man drew him aside and said, "It ill beseems thee to take charge of that work. Almost it seems that thou art glad of thy cousin's danger."

Gryffyth, facing his father with a mocking smile, but speaking loudly enough for the workmen to hear, said: "I am grieved for my cousin Caradoc. We must make this so fearful that my royal cousin will be driven back to his fathers' gods." Moving a little farther from the workmen and speaking more quietly, he went on: "These men must be made to think so; but, between thee and me, why should I not be glad of his fall, since it puts in my hands the scepter of Britain?" After studying his father's face a moment, he added: "Almost I believe thou art sorry!"

The old priest gazed sternly on the young man and spoke slowly as if weighing his words: "I am sorry! Thou art my son. I cannot help a natural partiality for my own, but—Caradoc would have made a better king than thou."

Hot passion flamed in the younger man's face. "This saying thou shalt rue when the hand of Gryffyth holds the scepter of Llewellyn! Draw back this night if thou wilt. Let the reviler of the gods live. My time will come."

The stern old face did not change. "I shall not draw back. Thy cousin shall serve the gods as—"

"As what?" sharply.

"As priest or as sacrifice," finished the older man with the same mournful sternness.

"Now thou speakest as my father!"

"And thou, if thou shouldst turn Christian, thou shalt serve the Holy Ones in the same way." There was no mistaking the old man's sincerity, and before his cold determination the passion of the younger faded, and he trembled.

How fared the boy prince in his lonely hut? Death is terrible to all. How much more so to the young! And such a death, the awful long-drawn agony of it! Could he, only a boy, endure it? If he lay prostrate on the floor praying to be allowed to live, or at least to be permitted some quicker death, if the tears wet his cheek and his whole heart cried out in agony, the guard knew it not. If in answer to his cry of desperate need angels from Heaven ministered unto him, the guard saw them not. The mystery of those hours of darkness the

Recipes showing how

Royal Baking Powder Saves Eggs

In recipes calling for the use of eggs, fewer eggs can be used and excellent results and healthful, appetizing food obtained by using an additional quantity of Royal Baking Powder, about a teaspoon, for each egg omitted, thereby reducing the cost. This applies equally well to nearly all baked foods and the following recipes are given as practical examples:

A new and economical way to make a fine Sponge Cake

SPONGE CAKE

1 cup sugar
½ cup water
3 eggs
2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
1 cup flour
1 teaspoon salt
⅛ cup cold water
1 teaspoon flavoring

The old method called for 6 eggs, and no baking powder

DIRECTIONS:—Boil sugar and water until syrup spins a thread and add to the stiffly beaten whites of eggs, beating until the mixture is cold. Sift together three times, the flour, salt and baking powder; beat yolks of eggs until thick; add a little at a time flour mixture and egg yolks alternately to white of egg mixture, stirring after each addition. Add ⅛ cup cold water and flavoring. Mix lightly and bake in moderate oven about one hour.

Nutritious, as well as economical.

Just as good as mother used to make

DOUGHNUTS

3 tablespoons shortening
1 cup sugar
1 egg
1 cup milk
1 teaspoon nutmeg
6 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
1 teaspoon salt
3 cups flour

Makes 50 doughnuts

The old method called for 3 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Cream the shortening, add sugar and well beaten egg. Add alternately with the milk, the flour, baking powder, nutmeg and salt which have been sifted together, add more flour if necessary to make the dough stiff enough to roll. Roll out on floured board to ¼ inch thickness. Cut out and fry in deep hot fat, which should be hot enough to brown a piece of bread in 60 seconds. When cooked, drain on unglazed paper and sprinkle with powdered sugar.

Easily made, appetizing and keeps well.

EGGLESS, MILKLESS, BUTTERLESS CAKE

1 cup brown sugar
1¼ cups water
1 cup seeded raisins
2 ounces citron
1 teaspoon nutmeg
⅓ cup shortening
1 teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon salt
2 cups flour
5 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder

The old method (Fruit Cake) called for 2 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Put the first eight ingredients into saucepan and boil three minutes. When cool, add the flour and baking powder which have been sifted together, mix well. Bake in moderate oven in loaf pan (round tin with hole in center is best) for 35 or 40 minutes. Cover with white icing.

CORN BREAD

1¾ cups corn meal
¼ cup flour
4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
1 teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon sugar (if desired)
2 tablespoons shortening
1⅓ cups sweet milk

The old method called for 2 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Sift the dry ingredients into bowl; add milk and melted shortening, beat well, and pour into well greased pan or muffin tins and bake in hot oven about 25 minutes.

Made with White Layer Cake requires only 2 eggs for both

GOLD CAKE

3 tablespoons shortening
¾ cup sugar
yolks of 2 eggs
½ cup milk
1½ cups flour
3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
1 teaspoon flavoring

Makes 2 small loaf cakes about 11 ounces each

The old method called for 5 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Cream shortening; add sugar gradually, and beaten yolks of eggs and flavoring; beat well; add alternately with the milk the flour sifted with baking powder. Bake in moderate oven 35 to 45 minutes. Spread with white icing.

Delicious Waffles, a breakfast treat that is unexcelled

WAFFLES

1½ cups flour
2 tablespoons corn meal
1 teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon sugar
3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
2 cups milk
1 egg
2 tablespoons shortening

The old method called for 3 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Sift flour, corn meal, sugar, salt and baking powder together into bowl; add milk and melted shortening. Beat in yolk of egg and fold in well beaten white. Bake on hot waffle iron lightly greased.

BILL

By ARTHUR K. AKERS

BILL hadn't done it. He had done a great many things in his scarred lifetime, but not this. Bill's trouble was to get himself believed. It had been fourteen or fifteen years since any one had really believed him. Naturally he had grown not to expect it. But this was different. It was important—very important. It had to do with Bill's being strapped in a chair and having the life jerked out of him by an electric current. No one had seemed to take much interest in keeping Bill out of that chair—that is, no one but a gaunt old woman and Bill himself. Sentiment appeared to be the other way. Bill had never realized what an abandoned villain he was until he heard the prosecuting attorney giving the jury his biography. As the matter was presented to them, he had never done a kind deed or had a good thought in all his thirty-five evil years. Such slight cracks as appeared in the evidence against him were skilfully filled in with a handful of his general record. And the jury was busy. It was corn-planting time: they wanted to get back home. Any one could look at Bill and see that his removal would be a patriotic thing for a jury to bring about. So they went through the form of going out for deliberation. Very soon they came back. The verdict was as expected—murder, first degree. The sentence, the chair.

Bill didn't appeal. Appeals are expensive. Yet one was made later by the woman in the case. She was his mother, and her interest seemed to surpass even that of Bill himself. She went to the governor, and the newspapers referred to her visit editorially and with disgust. They said the chief executive should not be subjected to such harrowing scenes. No man could give proper attention to his gubernatorial duties after his nerves had been wrung by having a gaunt gray-haired woman hugging his knees, on the floor, begging between great awkward sobs for a worthless son's worthless life. "Billie" she called him. It appeared that this man had once been a baby, her baby, and she had found much of good in him. Later there had been evil also, but never all ill. And he had not done this thing. Proof she could not find, but she knew he had not. Pressed for some shred of evidence, she flung in his face this: Billie had told her he did not do it! He had even said he was not there at all. He was in Olympia at the time. He knew, because he was in the penitentiary out there on the very day the murder was committed three thousand miles east of him. True, the prison records did not show this: Bill's mind was not of the best; he used many names, and he could not recall the exact one under which he had served the state of Washington. So the governor denied the appeal.

Later Bill wrote the governor a letter. In it he told the truth. But the governor's secretary could not read Bill's scrawl, and the letter went into the waste-basket with its tale untold.

SO it came about that this was the important night for Bill—the last before he sat in the chair. The gaunt woman was still appealing. She had taken the case even higher than the governor. In a vague way Bill knew this, but he didn't pin much faith on her influence in that quarter. It was too late to think of such things now. And this was a time for doing, not for sniveling prayers, thought Bill dumbly. The governor had gone west to the coast, would be sleeping soundly, untroubled by gray-haired women, when Bill sat down for the last time.

Here entered two bells into the life of Bill. One was in the church across the street from his prison, and in each winter dawn he heard it ringing, three times three; three times three. In the morning, he reflected now, when it rang so it would be the signal for that leaping, tearing current, and the sweat gathered cold on him. The other was a little bell three thousand miles away, and he had never heard it. It, too, on occasion, rang three times three.

THREE hours after the sun rose on the Atlantic seaboard it would be just appearing on the western coast. It was because of this fact that a pale unshaven man, with a Salvation Army cap set incongruously upon the close-cropped head of a recently released convict, stormed a hotel clerk in Seattle. He said that he must see the visiting governor from the east in his room on the twelfth floor, quick. Over all protests that it was four o'clock in the morning, that the governor would see no one at that hour, that a name must be given first, rose the deadly insistence of the Salvationer. In the end he went up.

PING! ping! ping! Ping! ping! ping! Ping! ping! ping! rang the little bell that Bill had never heard. It was in an all-night telegraph office in Seattle, and a sleepy clerk glanced dully at the big clock on the wall—four A. M.

"Hey, you!" he yelled at a frowsy messenger snoring on a bench behind him. The boy sat up slowly, yawning, grimacing, rubbing his leaden lids. Again the bell, three times three, above the buzzing and clicking of the call-register.

"Three thirty-three—Imperial Hotel! Get a move on!" barked the clerk.

"Aw, whatcher wakin' me up fer?" grumbled the boy; "callin' at four in de mornin'! Some soak wants ter send out fer bail, I guess. Me rates'll be high at dis hour."

He wheeled on up the street, protesting.

Seven minutes later a young gray cyclone shot down the street. Bang! went the bicycle on the curb! Bang! went the door. The whirlwind burst in. His lungs worked like an overloaded pump. He thrust a telegram and a ten-dollar bill into the clerk's hands.

"What's your rush?" demanded that personage irritably. "Is he cablin' Mamie not to hurry home from Honolulu, as he's been kept late at the office?"

"Naw!" panted the boy. "Guv'nor—Rush it! Quick! Hurry!—Goin' 'lectrocute—a guy—in twenty minutes—east—if we don't get it dere—by seven-t'irty. Check it! I'll take it—to de op'ratin' room!"

"I'll tube it up," returned the suddenly galvanized clerk. "You shoot up the elevator quick—tell the chief what's what."

Ten floors above, the chief waited only for the import of the messenger's gasped-out story.

"Got Chicago, Charley?" he shouted to an operator.

"Not now—busted east of Helena," was the languid response.

"Then San Fran! Quick!"

"His power's off. Waiting on it now."

The boy got into the game. "Den do somethin' else, you big stiff!" he shrilled. "De guv'nor's plumb nutty over at de Imperial. Dere's just eighteen minutes left before dey shoots de juice into a guy out east! He'll come back and ha'nt you forty years if you don't get de message t'rough in time!"

"Don't you worry, son," the chief threw over his shoulder as he broke into a trot for a distant table.

ACROSS the nation the other bell, the one in the church, began to ring. Bill heard it. It came to him as a very curious and unbelievable thing that he should not hear it again. "Sure, it'll ring tomorrow," he explained to himself. "Yes, but you won't be here," came inexorably from some very clear-headed person within him. "The bell will be here, but you won't."

> Seedtape affords earlier germination, stronger plant life and better results than seeds planted in the old way.
> D. FINLAYSON, F. L. S.
> Director The Seed Testing Laboratory, London, England

To be assured of a better garden this year, plant with Pakro Seedtape—not because of what we claim it to be, but because of what others have proved it to be.

E. J. Kyle, Dean of the Agricultural College of Texas, tells of results obtained from Pakro Seedtape at the college—"All the Seedtape planted did exceptionally well. The plants made a splendid appearance and the stand was especially good."

George Foster, Springdale, Ohio, tried Pakro Seedtape in his garden. "It came up better than any other seeds I planted," he remarks. Similar expressions of opinion have been received from experts and amateurs all over the country.

Judge for yourself how remarkably sensible and simple the idea is.

Pakro Seedtape consists of seeds selected with the utmost care by experts from the very best of prize-winning strains; they are put in a thin paper tape, spaced exactly the correct distance apart. No thinning out is necessary. Stunted, slow-growing plants, due to overcrowding in planting the seeds, are avoided. The paper absorbs and holds the moisture, and thus produces a quicker and higher percentage of germination. It is more economical to use because only a sufficient number of seeds are planted—with loose seeds there is a great deal of waste. Since you can plant a whole row at once, there is a great saving of time and labor.

Of course this appeals to you as the most outstanding improvement in planting discovered in many years—and facts prove that this is absolutely true.

Use Pakro Seedtape in your garden this year, and you have the assurance of thousands who have tried it that you will have a more successful garden than ever before. And here are the experiences of some of these thousands:

"I never had a better garden with an experience of 35 years." L. C. Arensberg, M.D., East Millsboro, Pa.

"I find that Seedtape grows quicker than any other seed with far less trouble to plant." Miss Ethel Bowman, Troy, Ohio.

"The same amount of seed goes twice as far as other kinds." Mrs. William Behringer, Ann Arbor, Mich.

"Results from Pakro Seedtape came up to my most sanguine expectations." R. J. Chapman, Houston, Texas.

"Without exception, my garden this year—planted with Pakro Seedtape—was the best I ever had. Germination and final results were all that could be desired." H. Holbrooke, Hood River, Oregon.

"Have had remarkable experience in planting Pakro Seedtape. They germinated in an exceptionally quick way and the plants appeared above the ground in absolutely regular order, not one missing in the several rows. I am a Horticulturist and Rancher of some little experience." F. A. Koenig, South Paris, Maine.

"We obtained a remarkable crop from our planting of Pakro Seedtape." Jos. Keenan, Cazenovia, N. Y.

Pakro Seedtape comes in 30 varieties of Vegetables, and 18 varieties of Flowers, and by carefully following the directions printed on each box, your garden will prove a delight and a surprise. Get some from your dealer today.

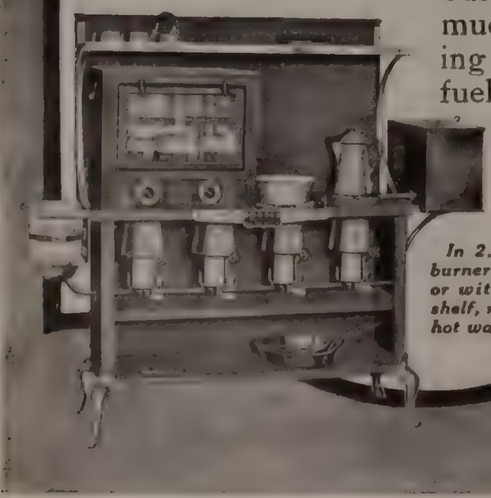
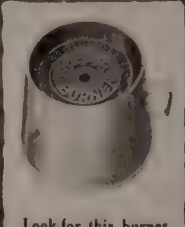
BOSS OIL-AIR STOVE

Cooking in the hot, summer days is easy and comfortable when you use the Boss Oil-Air Stove. All of the hot, blue flame is concentrated on the pots and pans, cooking quickly but not heating the kitchen. The Oil-Air burner burns 1000 times as much air as oil—paying for the stove in fuel saved.



In 2, 3, 4 or 5-burner sizes, with or without high shelf, reservoir or hot water heater.



Look for this burner—marked "Oil-Air" on top.

Then they were at the door. They had difficulty in making him understand what they had come for. It was incredible. It was a mistake, a dream. It would pass as all the other dreams of this moment had passed before. But the gray-faced men in the gray light only took hold of him and led him away, dazed, resisting feebly, beating the air with disconnected protestations. Then they were in the Room with the Chair.

DOWN in the city the gaunt woman rose from the night on her knees. Far off a bell rang, three times three; and she knew it was the Time. Her face was strangely serene. Somehow, from somewhere, to her soul had come a sort of wireless message of assurance, such as is sometimes called faith.

UP from Seattle to Vancouver flashed a spark, a flickering of tiny current, dynamo-driven through the dark, the forests, the rivers—life in a copper thread that was life for Bill, sitting down across the land in his last chair.

In Vancouver, at the end of the message, a sharp snapping explanation—running—the purr of a pole-changer driving the news up, up, up to the roof of the world, over the Canadian Rockies; then dropping away, a spark in the night, across Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba; clattering through the repeaters at Winnipeg, meeting the dawn at Port Arthur, on through the mists of Ontario, freeing itself at length through a chattering sounder at Montreal. Four minutes from the Pacific to the Saint Lawrence! but the journey not yet done. Three minutes lost raising New York, for it was at dawn and the traffic tides were low; then a new race up-state against the minute-hand on the clocks. And again the life of Bill was in the pocket of a boy, bending over his handle bars, in his ears the exhortation to ride for a man's life. A mile—five minutes—left.

In the Room the last strap was adjusted. It was cold, cold. The state took no thought of comfort for men who went in that room. The electrician straightened up and walked noiselessly to the switch. Something in Bill counted his steps as though it were measuring. The man's hand went up to the switch, his gaze fastened on the warden, who stood, watch in hand, waiting. Relentlessly the sun swung up out of the east. The second-hand entered the last minute before the official sunrise. The gray-faced men looked expectantly at the thing strapped in the chair. The warden raised his hand. When it fell—

But there came the sound of feet in the stone coridor, running madly. The door burst open. A paper waved aloft in a deputy's hand.

A MONTH later the door opened in the room above the roofs. The gaunt woman looked up.

"Billie!"

"'Lo, ma."

He hung his hat awkwardly on the back of a chair and sat down in silence. The woman eyed him hungrily. He was not lovely to look upon, but he was her son. Bill sought to change her scrutiny.

"Gee, dat was a nutty guy out in Seattle," he said at last. "What'd he want to go an' snitch on hisself fer, when in thirty minutes more dey'd ha' croaked me f'r his job?"

But his mother's reply only embarrassed him the more. "It was not the man in Seattle, Billie," she answered him; "it was the Lord God."

THE Department of Missionary Education of the Northern Baptist Convention was ten years old on January 1, 1917. It was organized on the principle that "missions are not two, but one," and its business has been the promotion of the study of all missions, home and foreign. The society expects during 1917 to bring the number of mission study classes to 1,000, to secure definite missionary instruction in 5,000 Sunday schools, and to register 2,000 Baptists at the summer conferences.

The anxious man and the worrying woman are carrying heavy mortgages upon tomorrow.

Says
© E. & F.
"...the nerves can actually take hold of it!"

Dr. C. W. Saleeby, the widely quoted authority on eugenics, physiology, etc.

YOUR doctor will tell you this: Broken-down nerve tissues require not a stimulant, but a builder, like organic phosphorus. To get this essential food actually to the nerves—that has been the problem. And now the well-known medical authority, Dr. C. W. Saleeby, of London, says:

> "Sanatogen is a specially adapted food that has solved the problem of giving phosphorus in such a way that the nervous system can actually take hold of it."

That is one feature of Sanatogen; the other and equally important mission is to build up blood and tissue with albumen or protein. As Prof. C. von Noorden, of Vienna, another international authority, says:

> "Sanatogen is an excellent albuminous preparation of especial value in anaemia and general debility."

Strengthening the nerves, building up the starved cells—that is Sanatogen's mission, splendidly fulfilled during eighteen years' successful use in every civilized land, as the written testimony of over 21,000 physicians convincingly proves.

You who are nervous, run-down or anaemic, cannot afford to ignore the help that Sanatogen offers.

Shall I Put My Money Into Foreign Missions? (Conquest Meeting)

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Luke 12 : 22-34

IN the past hundred years a great many people have invested their money and some have invested their lives in Foreign Missions. It is rare that a missionary or a large giver to missions is found to declare it a bad bargain. Perhaps the greatest result of foreign missions is the comity and union of effort that has crowned denominationalism on mission fields. The redemption of Korea, the conversion of China to Western learning, the practical elimination of cannibalism, and the beginning of the end of caste in India are other results that indicate the wisdom of the investment.

In 1910, the last date in which complete figures are available, there were in mission lands 3,447,790 baptized Christians and 6,837,736 adherents in 18,964 churches, with 28,957 Sunday schools; and the contributions of native Christians reached $3,246,717. The total number of missionaries was 21,307 and of native workers 103,066; and 2,729 schools, colleges and universities with over 1,500,000 pupils, 1,653 hospitals and dispensaries treating over 7,500,000 cases in a year, 551 orphanages, child asylums and rescue homes with 34,194 inmates, were a part of the missionary enterprise and, with the body of native Christians, made up the tangible returns on the missionary investment. There can be no measuring the joy and spiritual satisfaction of the givers of the funds in having a share in the evangelization of the world.

An important part of the work of the missionaries is the saving and training of orphans. The cost of teaching, clothing and feeding an orphan in China averages $20 a year. Suppose he enters the orphanage at one year and is graduated and ready to support himself at twenty-one. That means $400; and if some Christian in America has invested this $400, and if, as happens oftener than not, this orphan becomes a leader for Christ among his people, it is certainly a good investment. It costs about $1,000 to raise a boy in America. A native worker may be supported for $50 a year, and the poorest paid ministers in America get over $500. Native workers are a good investment.

Do you want, by the use of your money, to advance the Kingdom of Christ? If you do, you cannot invest it better than in Foreign Missions.

The Saloon the Foe of Society

Christian Endeavor Topic. Isa. 59 : 1-8

THE open saloon cannot exist and be square. To live, it must foster illicit drinking and every vice that encourages excess. To keep on living, it must have a steady stream of new recruits, and the recruits are the boys and girls that we went to school with, that we have grown up with. The saloon cares nothing for the results of our drinking. It sells drink for cash, and, if we give it the cash, what we get with our drink is not its concern. If we get crazy mad and commit murder, the saloon will throw sawdust over the blood-stains and go on making more murderers. If we go home penniless to a starving family, thrown out in the street for unpaid rent, the saloon goes right on taking the last pennies of other men just like us. If we finally lose the last position we are capable of filling, and wobble in through the swinging doors of this "poor man's club," we shall be shooed away from the free lunch counter and thrown out the side door. When a criminal is wanted, the police always search first in the saloons. When a riot is on, or expected, the authorities always close the saloons. The saloon breaks every law made to govern it, and its traffic is concerned in nearly all the breaking of other laws. That marks it an enemy of society.

Drink is the enemy of virtue, the destroyer of efficiency in hand and brain, the foe of the home and the curse of childhood. Dr. William Shaw has said: "Drunkenness is a disease. To cure it, kill the germ. It cannot be regulated."

If Your Brakes Grab or Slip—

Learn how leading car-makers guard against it

Your life depends on the efficiency of your brake lining. Grabbing or slipping brakes menace your safety.

In traffic, on hills, in an emergency, your brakes must work promptly and smoothly.

Realizing the importance of good brake lining, 22 leading car manufacturers and 10 leading axle makers select for their cars and axles the brake lining that won't grab or slip—Thermoid Brake Lining.

These cars use Thermoid Brake Lining:

Pierce Arrow
Peerless
Marmon
Haynes
Studebaker
Kissel (cars, trucks)
Autocar
Briscoe
Pathfinder
Cadillac
Cole
Apperson
Premier
Chalmers
White (cars, trucks)
Auburn
Service Truck
Metz
Hudson
Lexington-Howard
Rauch & Lang
Lippard-Stewart Motor Truck

These axles use Thermoid Brake Lining:

Timken-Detroit
Columbia
Peru
Sheldon
Torbensen
Russell
Empire
Hess
Celfor
American

Why experts select Thermoid Brake Lining

These car makers and their engineers select Thermoid Brake Lining because they find, by scientific tests, that it gives consistently efficient SERVICE. They find its "co-efficient of friction" is ideal for a brake lining.

This means its surface is so made that brakes equipped with Thermoid Brake Lining cannot grab or slip.

Three tests that prove Thermoid Brake Lining's worth

Thermoid Brake Lining proves its superiority in passing all three drastic tests by which brake lining efficiency is determined.

1. Co-efficient of friction test.
2. Absorption test—Tests show that Thermoid Brake Lining does not absorb water, gasoline or oil.
3. Durability Test.

Scientific construction of Thermoid Brake Lining

The reason Thermoid Brake Lining has the ideal co-efficient of friction, is impervious to moisture, and is durable, lies in its scientific construction. In its process of manufacture, it has three exclusive features:

1. It has 50% more material than any woven brake lining

This means longer service - better service. Thermoid is 50% heavier than any woven brake lining on the market. That is why it is better fitted to stand the responsibilities placed on it.

2. It is Grapnalized

Grapnalizing is an exclusive process that makes Thermoid impervious to all moisture and foreign matter, such as gasoline, oil, water, dust, etc. No other brake lining is Grapnalized, or can be. That is why ordinary brake lining goes to pieces rapidly.

3. It is hydraulic compressed

Powerful hydraulic presses compress Thermoid into a solid mass. This makes it far tougher and stronger than woven lining. It makes the surface ideal for brake lining; it can't grab and it can't slip. The "co-efficient of friction" is just right.

Specify Thermoid

When you reline your brakes, specify the brake lining the experts specify Thermoid. Jobbers, garages and dealers will be glad to supply you. It costs about the same as inferior brake linings.
Remember, your life depends on the efficiency of your brakes, and the efficiency of your brakes depends on your brake lining. Be sure your brakes are lined with Thermoid Brake Lining.
Our guarantee—
Thermoid will make good or WE WILL.

The Biggest Convenience for the Home

Wickless DETROIT VAPOR STOVES "Work Like Gas" Odorless

Burn Oil, Gasoline or Distillate

HERE is city gas convenience and speed; city gas intensity of heat; city gas safety; a fuel saving of one-fourth over city gas, over other oil stoves, and over coal and wood:

Detroit Vapor Stoves are wickless, ringless, call for no repairs or replacements, and will outlast any other liquid fuel stoves.

The secret of the Detroit Vapor Stove is a wonderful burner, of heavy grey annealed iron, weighing 6½ pounds. This becomes glowing red and yields a hot blue flame directly under the cooking utensil. There is no wick, no asbestos rings, nothing to char, warp, burn out, or be replaced. The kettle goes on as soon as the match is struck. Costs less than one cent an hour per burner.

Using either oil, gasoline or distillate this is the safest stove. It works with the low grades of fuel. The valves are of bronze, with non-rusting points and cannot leak. The handles lock automatically.

The stove is handsome in appearance, fully equal to a gas stove. It has a durable baked enamel finish that does away with blacking, and needs only a cloth for cleaning.

Made in many styles.

Some dealer in your town sells Detroit Vapor Stoves. Ask him for a demonstration. Also fill out and mail coupon for our free stove book No. C.H. 2 showing latest styles and sizes selling for $15. and up. Latin America's Need—the Bible

By CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

IN these days, when our papers and periodicals are filled with the reports of trade commissions to the Latin republics, and the cause of commerce seems to constitute our chief interest in the "other America," I would plead for the Bible among these eighty millions of people, whose need of the teachings of this Book is appalling.

I have been traveling almost constantly for five months among the Latin-American republics, and in conversation with many hundreds of business men, both foreign and native, I have met with a remarkably uniform reply to inquiry concerning the character of the business men in these countries. It has run somewhat as follows: "They are usually highly intelligent; when engaged in business for themselves they are often effective; but when they are servants of the government or of large corporations their integrity is frequently defective; they lack business conscience, self-control and the power of persistent endeavor. For the most part the men of the higher class have ceased to be influenced in their action by the ideas and ideals of the Catholic Church, and they have no other system of moral idealism to take its place."

It is tragic to realize that there is to be found in the vast sweep of territory from the Rio Grande to the Straits of Magellan comparatively only a handful of men and women who have ever even read in their own language the life and the teachings of Jesus as recorded in the Gospels.

RECENTLY in the city of Buenos Aires a friend of mine was bidding bon voyage to an Argentine student about to sail for study in Europe. The student had in his hand a copy of one of the books of Victor Hugo, which he told my friend he read each night before retiring, for its moral stimulus. Asked if he had used the Bible for such help, he replied that he had never opened one in all his life.

It would be difficult to find university students in South America who take any great interest in religion. They have connected religion with the Catholic Church in its authoritative expression, which they conceive to be a foe to modern scientific investigation; and, like the students of Egypt who have turned their back on Mohammedanism, they have turned to agnosticism and rationalism.

Even in the ancient University of Cuzco, high up among the snowy peaks of the Andes, where the Roman Church holds the Indians in a grip of steel, I found the students hostile to this church, and in some cases breaking out in riots against it. The rector of this old university is said to walk in the religious processions of the state church on feast days, but, as I learned from private conversation with him, the principles of religion are absolutely prohibited even of expression in this seat of learning.

A short time ago, when there was a threatened riot, led by the priests, against the Cuzco missionaries, the students of the university sent word that if there was any trouble they would defend the missionaries. This was not because the collegians were Protestants, but because of their hatred of the Catholic Church.

A prominent professor in the University of La Plata in Argentina said not long ago that he was devoting all the spare time from his teaching to "drive out from his country her two chief foes—socialism and religion." The influence of this disregard for religion and of any experimental personal use of the Bible is being felt widely throughout the countries, and many of the thoughtful men are seeing the dangers.

ONE of the Argentine newspapers has taken upon itself to acquaint its constituents with the Bible and has been printing portions of the Scripture without comment and without giving the source of the quotation. The lamentable ignorance of the Bible among the people generally has been evidenced by a large number of letters which the editor has been receiving from men who have read these quotations and admired them, but to whom they were utterly unfamiliar. The editor told of one man, who, judging from his letter, was a city dweller and a man of education, who asked from what book these quotations were taken and where it would be possible to obtain a copy.

Not long ago we came across a quotation from a writer in a Peruvian journal, who, deploring the state of morals existing among the men who had ceased to be deeply influenced by the church said: "That which cannot be cured and which foreshadows death, is moral failure. And this is the evil of this country. . . . We breathe a fetid atmosphere and are not sickened. The life of the country is poisoned, and the country needs life purification. In the state in which we are, the passing of the years does not change men; it only accentuates the evil. A purging and a struggle are absolutely necessary."

ONE scarcely realizes, until he comes into personal contact with South American institutions and people, the difference of traditional ideals with which North and South America were founded. While through our parks and commons in New England we find statues of the early Pilgrim Father with a staff in his hand and the Bible under his arm, here in these republics we find in the parks the mailed warrior with lance and sword, the emblem of the Spanish adventurer who first came to drive out the Indian from his possessions, to loot his gold and to place upon the country and its inheritance the stamp of his ruthless ambitions.

THESE republics have been, from their beginning, and even before, in the grip of the Catholic Church, which has held that it is not safe or advisable to place the Bible in the hands of the people. They have fought the colporteur and the missionary along this line, saying that the Bible translations they were presenting were incorrect. Even the priests in certain instances have a very inadequate idea of the teachings of the Bible, their chief acquaintance with it being in Latin, which in many cases is not understood by them. I have been through many monasteries in South America and have seen in the center of the chapels the great Latin Bibles printed in huge letters so that the priests sitting around the edges of the room could read the words which they recite together in their religious exercises; yet, as one informed me, the meaning of these words was often sealed from the minds of these ecclesiastics, and the service was largely a matter of rote and mumbled words.

It seems strange to one familiar with the widespread Bible movement in the North American colleges on going through the scores of higher institutions in Latin America, which in many cases have modern equipment and are doing good work along twentieth century lines, never to find students banding themselves together voluntarily for Bible study, or cultivating habits of personal acquaintance with this great literature.

The average man of the United States may not know that each year there are 10,000 students in our colleges who are reported as following habits of daily personal Bible study and that three or four times that number are meeting weekly in classes for the study of the Christian Scriptures—all upon their own initiative, and because they have experienced in their own lives and character the value of such study. Yet this silent but pervasive leaven going out into the public life and business of a great nation is having a far-reaching effect. It is this influence and effect which is conspicuous by its absence in South America.

In many avenues of life one witnesses the lack of moral standards and the

After Years Of Service
TIRE-DOH
Repairs
Never Leak~Never Loosen

© A. A. S. Co., 1917

Long after the tire has outlived its usefulness, a Tire-Doh repair is still firm and air tight—no loose edges—not even the slightest leak. It retains its original elasticity—does not deteriorate like highly vulcanized rubber but actually improves with age—like a good violin. This is proved by seven years' tests.

For Biggest Blowouts or Tiniest Punctures TIRE-DOH Reduces Repair Bills Adds Life to Tires

Tire-Doh is not a tire filler. It's a secret compound that becomes a permanent part of the rubber. It will stretch with the tube to 3½ times its own length—if necessary—and never loosen a bit. Tire-Doh will repair perfectly any inner tube puncture or blowout—be it pin size or arm length.

Tire-Doh used regularly to fill up casing cuts and sand blisters will prevent blowouts and add thousands of miles to life of casings.

Works Where Other Methods Fail—Needs No Heat Nor Tools

Where ordinary patches prove incompetent, Tire-Doh is just as effective as in easy jobs. Torn-out valve stems that vulcanizers can't mend are simple repairs for Tire-Doh. It requires no tools but your fingers—no heat to burn or overcure your tube, to crack the rubber and cause leaks.

TIRE-DOH
TIRE-DOH

Wonderful Household Uses, Too!

Anything made of rubber can be repaired with Tire-Doh—rubbers, rubber boots, rubber gloves, coats, hot water bags, etc. Makes excellent electrical insulation. Tire-Doh-izing means economizing.

50c and $1.00—10,000 Dealers

750,000 autoists, motorcyclists and housewives now use Tire-Doh. Many buy two outfits at a time, one for the car and one for the home. Try it today—don't delay.

A Quarter Century of

Ingersoll WATCHES

IT was in 1892—the Columbian Anniversary Year—that Robt. H. Ingersoll & Bro. put out the first Ingersoll watch. It was pretty large, and bulky in appearance—but it kept good time.

The twenty-five years that followed have been wonderful years in the world's history. The telephone, the automobile, the incandescent light, the phonograph, have come into their own in that period; the wireless telegraph, the X-ray, and radium have been discovered and utilized.

What Ingersoll Has Done

In the manufacture of watches Robt. H. Ingersoll & Bro. have kept pace with this wonderful progress. Instead of one model, they now make eighteen models of Ingersoll watches. Instead of being bulky, these modern Ingersolls are thin and handsome. Unceasing experiment and improvement have made the Ingersoll a marvel of accuracy, simplicity of mechanism, and ability to stand rough use. And the tremendous volume of the Ingersoll business has kept the price of the watches down in spite of the steady gain in quality.

Radium-lighted Watches

Most interesting of all are the "Radiolites"—the new Ingersolls that show time in the dark. The hands and figures of Ingersoll Radiolite watches are made of a new self-luminous substance containing genuine radium, so that they glow brilliantly in the dark, and keep their brilliancy unimpaired for ten years or more.

The "Radiolite" Strap Watch has received wide publicity because of its use in the present war. Worn on the wrist, it is splendid not only for soldiers, but for motorists, campers and sportsmen, boy scouts, and all active men and boys; as well as for women. And the Radiolite Two-in-One, to stand on desk or table, or to carry in the pocket, has proven a boon in the household.

Low-priced Jewel Watches

Ingersoll jeweled watches furnish another interesting chapter in watch history. The Reliance—the first seven-jewel watch to sell for anything like its price—is a beautiful piece of workmanship—thin, accurate and handsome. It comes in snap case, dust-proof screw case, and in gold-filled case. The Waterbury—a new watch with a good old name—with four jewels, is slightly smaller, accurate and sturdy. It comes in "Radiolite" and plain dial models.

Old Friends

And the many other Ingersolls—the familiar Triumph, Junior and Eclipse, and the Midget, for women—have filled many needs for many types of people. A visit to the dealer's will give you a splendid idea of the many kinds of usefulness developed in the Ingersoll line. For the Ingersoll idea today is

"An Ingersoll for Everyone—and for Every Use."

ROBT. H. INGERSOLL & BRO., New York, Chicago, San Francisco

absence of the very ideals which the Bible is preeminently fitted to give a nation. In talking with a Brazilian concerning the gambling vice of the nation, I found that, although he was a highly respectable gentleman, he had absolutely no conscience concerning this matter for the people at large. "The lotteries and gambling are absolutely necessary for the Latin people," said he. On all sides one hears the complaint, when the question is asked concerning the great needs of the youth of the country: "Our youth are as capable as the young men in any nation, but they lack character."

IN observing this somewhat darkened picture of religious life in the Latin republics, which seems to many of the most astute observers to be due to the absence of that moral fiber and personal consciousness of God which it has been the privilege and the power of the Bible to instil among all peoples wherever it has had its sway, one must not forget the really great work of the Bible societies which have been at work for years in these countries, and also the valuable services of the Christian missionary.

One needs to travel in foreign lands, both east and west and north and south, to appreciate the far-reaching work of the Bible colporteur. Throughout the states of South America he has been a pioneer of light and progress, and has suffered many persecutions at the hand of the dominant church in his attempt to scatter the seeds of the Gospel among people from whom it has hitherto been withheld. One finds here the two great Bible Societies, the American and the British and Foreign organizations, which have translated the Bible in several versions into both Spanish and Portuguese, and have published portions of the Scriptures in several of the Indian languages. These translations, which have often been of single books of the Bible, have usually been sold for small sums, because of the fact that people appreciate more highly things for which they pay; but in addition, these Bible societies have been at great yearly expense to furnish Bibles to the missionaries for distribution and in various ways where openings have been found.

We have talked with colporteurs and Bible missionaries who have spent many years of their lives in traveling through the unfrequented sections, and have paved the way for the establishing of mission stations. One of these colporteurs has written his experiences in the out-of-the-way parts of Brazil, which reveal at once the obstacles which bigotry has placed in the path, and also the interest and eagerness of the people to learn something of the Book of books.

To adapt translations of the Bible to these various constituencies is no small task, and when it is realized that the Bible Societies have issued portions of the Scriptures in as many as thirteen different languages for these native tribes of Latin America, our respect grows for the great work which these bodies have been accomplishing. Many missionaries will tell the traveler that churches in general do not fully appreciate what has been done. Bishop Mitchinson, after visiting Barbados, spoke in a public address of the "absolute ingratitude of the Church of England as a body" to those Bible organizations which were serving them at every turn in the South American missionary field. This work is absolutely fundamental, and it is receiving the united cooperation of missionaries in this field.

THE missionaries in their excellent schools, where the Bible is taught in the curriculum; through such bodies as the new Theological Seminary recently established in Santiago by a union of denominations; as well as by their devoted preaching and Bible reading, are assisting greatly in making the Bible known to Latin America. Such laws as those recently enacted in Peru for religious liberty make a special opening for Bible promotion in that country, while the excellent practical work of the Young Men's Christian Association, in which the Bible is the central plank in the platform, is having a wide influence.

There is still a tremendous need. This need is particularly among the educated classes, who as yet have not been reached to any great extent by Protestant Christianity. These classes are influenced by Latin Europe far more deeply than by North America. As a rule their literature is French, and they demand literary style and attractiveness of presentation in any literary helps, text-books or tracts which are destined to influence them. There is a lamentable dearth of Christian literature generally in South America. Books that will assist in the elucidation and interpretation of the Bible and Christianity are sorely needed. These books must compete with the Roman system of thought and theology, which is the product of many of the greatest intellects of the past.

ONE of the most encouraging interviews which I have held along this line was with the eminent Brazilian diplomat, journalist and philanthropist, Dr. José Carlos Rodrigues, who is preparing a two-volume work on Protestant Christianity, to be published in Portuguese. Dr. Rodrigues, who has the universal respect and honor of his people, has been in the United States recently for months of investigation and study, gathering books on the Bible and Christianity, from which he is securing light and information for his task. I said to him as I saw in his library rows of volumes on the life of Christ by Protestant authors:

"But you are a Roman Catholic. What point of view are you giving in this important treatise?"

He answered: "Of course I was born and reared as a Catholic. But my sympathy is almost entirely with the Protestant point of view, and my greatest ambition is to acquaint my countrymen with the knowledge of the great Christian ethic which was lived and taught by Jesus Christ."

It is in such books, where the effort is taken out of the realm of controversy, and where the emphasis is placed upon the great constructive truths of Christianity, that much of the hope of making the Bible real for Latin Americans rests today.

It is our firm belief that the truth of the Bible, once clearly stated and lodged in the mind of any people, will vindicate itself against error. He who would help South America religiously today must needs realize that the path lies not along the line of rabid criticisms of the Catholic Church, which the Latin American still holds nominally as the church of his nation, but by intelligence and Christian love revealing to the men of these republics the unexampled inspiration and moral profit derived from following the teaching of the great Founder of Christianity.

What Has Lead To Do With Paint?

Nearly all paints contain some white lead. The more white lead, the better the paint. Pure white lead (thinned with pure linseed oil) is the best paint of all. It will not scale nor crack. It affords true weather-proof protection for your house, barn, fence or other property.

White lead is corroded metallic lead—nothing else. Any adulteration, any mixing in of other pigments, lessens its painting value.

Dutch Boy White Lead is pure white lead ground to a convenient paste form in pure linseed oil. Thinned with a further quantity of linseed oil, it becomes paint, pure and simple, and can be colored to any shade or tint.

Skilled painters will tell you a Dutch Boy White Lead job looks best and lasts longest. That's paint economy.

For Handsome Inside Decoration

On the inside walls of your home or office, use Dutch Boy White Lead thinned with a good flatting oil. It will give a soft, rich, velvety effect without any painty gloss, and will insure durability and washability that can be obtained in no other way.

Dutch Boy Linseed Oil

Only the purest linseed oil will give proper painting results. So, for your protection, we market linseed oil under the Dutch Boy trade mark, thus making it possible for you to get linseed oil that you know is pure.

Paint Protection for Metal

For protection against rust, paint with Dutch Boy Red Lead—pure red lead ground to paste form in linseed oil. It is as unequalled for metal painting as Dutch Boy White Lead is for other painting.

before you have any more painting done. With this data you will have information for doing or directing your painting knowingly—whether painting woodwork or iron, inside or out-of-doors. It is a code of tactics in your fight against destructive time and weather. It is helping armies of property holders. Let it help you, too.

Are You Always Sure of Your Solder?

Dutch Boy solders never vary. From the No. 111 (the finest you can buy) to the No. 888, wiping grade, they are always uniform.

There's a Dutch Boy solder for every purpose. Let us tell you which particular variety is equal to the solder you now use or which will give you equal or better satisfaction for less money. Buy that solder by number. It never varies a hair's breadth in its composition. Good results with it now insure good results always.

We believe a trial of Dutch Boy solder will also show you a distinct money-saving.

When Is Babbitt Metal Not Babbitt?

True Babbitt metal is an alloy of tin and other metals, invented by Isaac Babbitt many years ago—just that one formula, nothing else. But the factory world has come to refer to all bearing metals as "babbitts"—especially the high-grade ones—although technically incorrect. There are some bearing metals which are higher grade even than the original "babbitt."

What grade of bearing metal ("babbitt") do you use? Have you tried Dutch Boy Phoenix metal? It is the strongest, toughest, surest bearing metal that can be made. If you want to be sure of the quality of your bearings for rapid, heavy work, Dutch Boy Phoenix is the metal to use.

Dutch Boy bearing metals are made in all grades—for all kinds of work. It is probable that you can buy, for less money than you are now paying, a Dutch Boy bearing metal equal to the metal you are using; or probably you can buy a better metal for the same price—if you look for the Dutch Boy on the ingot.

Whether you buy babbitt, solder or paint materials, the Dutch Boy is an absolute assurance of uniformity, reliability and maximum value per dollar.

Why the Average American Dies at Forty-three

"He Feeds His Stomach with Tasty Junk," says E. E. Rittenhouse of Equitable Life

By R. W. LOCKWOOD

President of the Corrective Eating Society

THE presidents of life insurance companies with perhaps twenty billion dollars insurance on the lives of Americans, recently met in convention at the Hotel Astor in New York, and in their discussion brought out some of the reasons why the average American dies at about forty-three years of age.

According to the press reports, Mr. E. E. Rittenhouse, Commissioner of Public Service and Conservation of the Equitable Life Assurance Society, said: "The average American would not think of mixing bricks or scrap iron or gravel with the fuel for his furnace, yet he feeds his stomach with all sorts of tasty junk, much of which cannot be fully digested . . . he is seriously over-straining his heart, arteries, kidneys, nerves and digestion, as the rapidly increasing death rate shows."

This statement from such an authoritative source—from a man who makes it his business to study both vital statistics and the causes behind them — sounds a warning which should be heeded by every man and woman.

Indeed, there is no longer a doubt among intelligent people that many of the foods and combinations of foods which we are most accustomed to eat are the direct cause of much sickness.

Yet how few of us heed the early warnings of illness, such as acid-stomach, fermentation, or constipation. I venture to say that nine out of ten persons suffer to a greater or lesser extent from one or more of these three symptoms, which are in many cases the forerunners of more serious sickness.

Stomach medicines and laxatives are plentiful, but of what avail are they? The only thing that a stomach medicine can do is to temporarily neutralize the extra amount of acid in the stomach, because it is stronger than the acid. And this injures the stomach, usually bringing the acid back worse than it was before. A laxative is just as bad, if not a little worse; not only is its effect temporary, but all laxatives are habit-forming and are required in ever-increasing doses.

If neglected, a simple case of acid-stomach may lead in a short time to fermentation, with gas, and constipation. The fermenting food forms poisons which are absorbed into the blood, causing auto-intoxication, nervousness, mental depression, and a host of other unpleasant symptoms.

Is it any wonder that the officers of large insurance companies sound a warning against the evils of wrong eating?

* * * * * *

But just as wrong eating is the cause of 90 per cent. of common illnesses, so will correct eating create and maintain both bodily vigor and mental energy. And by right eating I do not mean freak foods—I mean just good every-day foods properly combined. In fact, to eat correctly, or follow a course of Corrective Eating it is not at all necessary to upset your table.

Eugene Christian, the well-known food specialist, has proved the efficacy of Corrective Eating in thousands of cases. Entirely without the use of drugs or medicines, men and women suffering from almost every conceivable non-organic ailment have been returned to health and vigor by following his simple directions in regard to their eating.

* * * * * *

In a recent talk with Eugene Christian he told me of several interesting cases which had recently come under his care. One was that of a woman prominent in Woman Suffrage work in New York City. She had come to him with stomach and intestinal fermentation and gas, auto-intoxication, mental depression and anemia, vertigo, and threatened heart failure. She was very much overweight when she commenced, but reduced her weight thirty-seven pounds during the treatment. He showed me a letter she had written him afterward, in which she said:

"I am sure you will be gratified to hear that I continue to improve—it seems sometimes that I must have been made over, and it is difficult to remember that less than eight months ago I was a feeble old woman depending upon daily doses of strychnia for what little strength I had. When I came under your treatment, I weighed one hundred and ninety-seven pounds, was hardly able to walk, and was subject to most serious heart attacks upon the slightest exertion. And now I am so well, so strong, that my family and friends maintain that it is a miracle which has restored me to strength and vigor of life—certainly in my case the cure is most remarkable because of my sixty-seven years."

Another was a well-known minister who had been out of his pulpit for twenty-two months, unable to preach or conduct the simplest service. He was about twenty-five pounds under-weight, anemic, nervous, had superacidity, and could not assimilate his food; and his heart action was very irregular. He had gradually declined for two years although treated by one of New York's leading physicians. Three months after he placed himself under Eugene Christian's care, he preached the first sermon he had been able to preach in nearly two years. This was over three years ago.

He has gained about twenty-five pounds in weight and since has not missed a day from his arduous clerical work. He has steadily gained in strength and vitality and is to-day healthy and athletic.

* * * * * *

But Eugene Christian's own case is perhaps the most interesting of all, for it shows how he discovered the beginnings of the methods which he has since pursued so successfully with others—methods of selecting and proportioning one's meals so as to overcome conditions brought about by wrong eating.

Twenty years ago he was at death's door; for several years previous he had suffered all the agonies of acute stomach and intestinal troubles, until his doctors—among them some of the most noted specialists in the country—gave him up to die. As a last resort, he commenced to study the food question himself. As a result of what he learned, he succeeded in literally eating his way back to health without drugs or medicines of any kind and in a remarkably short space of time.

Eugene Christian is to-day nearly sixty years old—or shall I say young? For he has more vitality, more ginger, more physical endurance than most youngsters in their teens. During the past fifteen years he has not had even so much as a cold.

* * * * * *

Since the remarkable success of Eugene Christian has become known, people have sought his advice in such rapidly increasing numbers that he has found it necessary to put his methods in printed form. He has written a series of 24 Little Lessons which tell you exactly what to eat for health, strength and efficiency.

These lessons contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon, and dinner, including corrective menus for almost every condition of health and sickness from infancy to old age, for all occupations, climates, and seasons.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with this great food specialist, because every point is so thoroughly covered and so clearly explained that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will help to produce the increased physical and mental energy which you are seeking the day you receive the lessons. And you are quite likely to feel some results after your very first balanced meal.

If you would like to examine these "24 Little Lessons in Corrective Eating," simply write the Corrective Eating Society, Inc., Dept. 343, 460 Fourth Avenue, New York City. It is not necessary to enclose any money with your request. Merely ask to have the lessons mailed for five days' trial with the understanding that you will either send the small price asked, $3, or remail the books.

The New Housekeeping

PERHAPS you remember the old nursery rhyme about Sophia Anne, with "a soul above her frying-pan," who, when her mother to cook began, "took to her heels and away she ran."

A certain other rebellious daughter with a soul miles above her frying-pan, whom I chance to know, brought these lines to mind. But in this case I did not blame Sophia. Her mother was one of those housekeepers who, with a sort of grim determination to do or die, clung to the notion that easy work means work half done; just as our Puritan forefathers argued that if one naturally found pleasure in doing a thing it must be wrong.

Consequently this particular Sophia Anne, having never known anything but the back-breaking, headaching side of it, grew up to hate the very name of housework with all the vigor of her young soul. When the day arrived that she not only "took to her heels" but ran away to a new home of her own, protesting that she was done forever with the drudgery of pots and pans, the sympathy of neighbors went out to that trusting bridegroom who shared her dream that the work-a-day world ended at their boxwood hedge and heaven commenced on the other side of the garden gate.

And the day of sweet revenge on her critical family and friends came one Sunday when, having already invited a visiting clergyman and his wife, her own minister and that good man's wife, and two neighbors home to dine in her servantless house, she not only sat through the church service to the end, but, on arriving home, served a delectable meal from soup to coffee on schedule time. A few similar dinner parties on other occasions, and it began to be rumored about town that "little Mrs. F—— could give her mother a few points on housekeeping."

AND so she not only could but did. For that estimable woman came to find herself in much the same position with regard to the new housekeeping and its labor, time and cost saving devices as the old gentleman who, despite a long and bitter opposition to automobiles, finally bought one for himself, the only explanation being that things had reached a point where he must either ride inside of or be run over by one, and so he preferred the former course.

Clearly the situation with the American housewife, young or old, today, is that she must either drive with the new rein of efficiency or be hopelessly driven by her work. There is no alternative and no middle course. Tools and methods that sufficed for her mother are no longer good enough for any intelligent woman who does her own housework, for the reason that changed times have brought about changed conditions in the home no less than in the business world.

There are infinitely more demands upon a woman's time and upon her vitality than in the good old days when the cook stayed for twenty years and the mistress of the house could herself, when she so chose, potter over some trivial kitchen task for an hour or more because no better way was known—and because no bigger things were to be done. But not so in this progressive age, when we crowd into one day the work of three a generation back! And the woman who needlessly squanders her strength and fritters away her time over the petty things of housekeeping when she might be saving herself for the larger duties of home-making, is not doing her full duty by either her family or herself. So let us see where some of these differences lie.

UNDER the old régime the kitchen fire had to be "kept up" for two hours on a summer day in order to roast a piece of beef. Under the new order of things that same piece of beef need only be started over a flame fire, then popped into a simple, inexpensive fireless cooker, together with vegetables and dessert, and it will literally "cook itself," and, moreover, wait an indefinite time without spoiling till you were ready to serve it. Not only is it possible to cook our meats, or leave the breakfast cereal to cook over night, and do all the simpler forms of cookery with this silent servant who works so economically and well while we sleep, or rest, or go about our other business, but in the best fireless cookers it is possible to do all of one's baking as well; and this, mind you, at a minimum of cost, with almost no trouble at all, and to the queen's taste! Moreover, under the slow, even temperature of the magic cook-stove it is possible to prepare many cheap cuts of meat which are known to be highly nutritious but which are not palatable when cooked by ordinary means, in the ordinary ways in habitual use.

The farmer who never rejoices at his neighbor's mistakes is on the highway to Heaven.

No man ever made a crop by finding fault with the way the other man held his plow.

Indeed, we seem to be living in an age of vacuum wonders! It is the same vacuum principle of the "fireless" that has now been carried over to the making of frozen foods and has given us that much-discussed ice-cream freezer which requires neither cranking nor turning, produces the ice-cream in thirty minutes, with only one filling of ice, and keeps it hard for eight hours if you wish. Is there anything nowadays that the auto-picnicker can not have when even ice-cream can be included with the lunch basket and frozen en route? And this, remember, is not a new fad, but a practical, economical labor-saver, which has come to stay. With the air full of complaints on the high cost of living it is a bit comforting to think that dainty ices and wholesome frozen puddings need no longer be classed as luxuries, but rather listed with those dishes which are "easy to serve on a moment's notice," and that we may now have our best dessert—so long reserved for company and party occasions—as often as we please.

Again we wonder how long will women patiently—or, sometimes stupidly—continue to put their strength into lifting heavy pots and kettles when aluminum wares and the fascinating new glass utensils are within easy reach of all who stop to count more than the first costs.

Of course there are hundreds of women who know nothing of these things because they, like Sophia's mother, are too "set in their ways" to be interested; too indifferent to even their welfare to take a little trouble to investigate up-to-date appliances. And again, it is a case of "penny wise but pound foolish," arguing that this or that can not be afforded when a little inquiry would prove that in the end it would mean a saving of money as well as of time and health. You would think by this time that some sort of kitchen cabinet, for example, would be in every well-ordered home; yet there are scores of women who walk unnecessary miles each year, crossing and recrossing their steps in kitchens with pantries everywhere except in the one right place. An ingenious architect figures that in getting the 1,095 meals of the year a housekeeper travels some 200 miles, if the distance from the range to the dining table be only twenty-five feet. In most country houses it is of course much more. When, however, a working center can be arranged so that the work-table is within easy reach of both the supply closet and the range, then even a large, old-fashioned kitchen may be turned into a very comfortable and convenient place. And so the kitchen cabinets, boon of the small kitchenette, come also to the rescue of the kitchen that is too big. With combined pantry and work-table the housewife finds all utensils and staple supplies for ordinary cooking right at hand and has only to use her head to save her heels.

Yet, despite all that has been said and done to disprove that old disgraceful adage that "woman's work is never done," thousands of uncomplaining tired mothers are still slaving away in out-of-date kitchens where tools and arrangement combine to make work needlessly hard. Some of these women grow old before their time; others suffer a nervous breakdown; and others merely lose that wholesome stimulus of work done under right conditions in the right way—but that is half the joy of life. How is it in your home? Are paltry dollars saved while out of her limited strength a wife, or sister, or mother pays the price?

A Private Word with All Procrastinators

Containing a Bit of Friendly Warning and a Thought of the Future

ARE you thinking of entering the Second Bible Picture Study—"later on"?

Are you saving the pictures regularly, and talking of getting your "Pearls from the Bible" and Answer Book—"very soon"?

Are you letting the days flit by, with the vague notion that you will get your Outfit later, and, by concentrating your efforts within the space of a few evenings, submit a winning set of verses?

Are you saying, "Yes, the Study is delightful and helpful, too, and I'll get around to competing in due course—but there is plenty of time"?

Stop and think!

THOSE who competed in the First Bible Picture Study KNOW that a leisurely consideration of the pictures and verses brought out the utmost pleasure of the competition.

There IS plenty of time to compete, of course; but delay is never wise, and in the end it breeds carelessness, which is the child of haste.

Can you give your best thought to the beauties of the verses, to the significance of the pictures, to the selection of the most appropriate verses, if you lack calm, quiet moments in which to ponder and reflect?

Can you WIN, if you delay to the last moment, when others are not delaying?

Delightful Recreation

A more pleasant way to spend your idle moments now and then than in the Second Bible Picture Study can hardly be imagined. A series of interesting pictures will be published, representing Bible scenes or Bible truths. You are invited to supply fitting Bible verses for the pictures, making your selections from a limited list of verses. $5,628.00 in 1,000 cash rewards will be given those submitting the best lists of verses, but these financial prizes are simply extra incentives—the real rewards are in the educative and spiritually satisfying qualities of the home competition. Can you afford to delay your entrance into this inspiring way of realizing Bible beauties anew?

Our South American Missions

Epworth League Topic for March 25.
Isa. 60 : 1–5, 15, 18.

THE leader of this meeting should have the League Mission Study Book, "South American Neighbors," by Bishop Stuntz. It is a readable, fascinating story that will clear up misapprehensions and give a thorough basis for an understanding of the great problems, economic as well as religious, which missions to South America must help to solve.

South America is thinly peopled. The Spanish and Portuguese governments, which divided South America between themselves in 1494, made little effort to attract immigration of their own people and denied admission to peoples of other lands. The lands were administered as crown colonies. Large land grants were made to court favorites. There was little opportunity for individual enterprise, even if the continent had been open to enterprising men. It was only after the Latin republic had thrown off the rule of Spain and Portugal that South America threw open her doors to the immigration of the world. But revolutions and epidemics decimated the populations, and the continuance of the great land holdings, which are just being broken up, prevented the close settling of the country, so that even now South America, with an area of 7,276,000 square miles as against North America's 8,559,999, has a population of only about 50,000,000. Yet she has millions of acres of soil as rich as the world knows, and mines whose richness passes belief, and waterways reaching to the heart of the continent, and opportunities almost unmeasured. Yet perhaps the greatest opportunity is the opportunity to preach the Gospel.

The first Protestant settlement in South America was a colony of members of the French Reformed Church, led to Brazil in 1555 by Villegagnon. The first missionary representing Protestantism was James Thomson, a Scotchman, who went to Argentina in 1818 as a pioneer of popular education, establishing what were known as Lancastrian schools, which met with immediate success.

In 1836 the Methodist Episcopal Church sent Daniel P. Kidder to Brazil. Captain Allen F. Gardiner began work in Patagonia in 1841. The Southern Baptist Convention sent Rev. W. B. Bagby to Brazil in 1881 and Rev. Z. C. Taylor in 1882. The Presbyterian Church sent David Trumbull to Chile in 1846. W. Barbrooke Grubb went in 1889 to the Indian tribes of the South American jungle. These are the men who laid the foundations of South American Protestantism, and who, with the active cooperation of the liberal elements in Spanish America, fought the battle of religious liberty through to its climax in the favorable action of Peru in 1915.

Now the continent is open, but the laborers are few. In all South America there are only 320 ordained missionaries, one to about 156,000 of the population, as against one to 622 in North America.

Religiously South America is fast becoming agnostic. Morally her life is corrupt to the core. She needs the open Bible and the pure Gospel. This is only part of the story. Get Bishop Stuntz's book and have it all.

Also read the article, "The Bible in Latin America," on pages 315 and 316 of this issue of the Christian Herald.

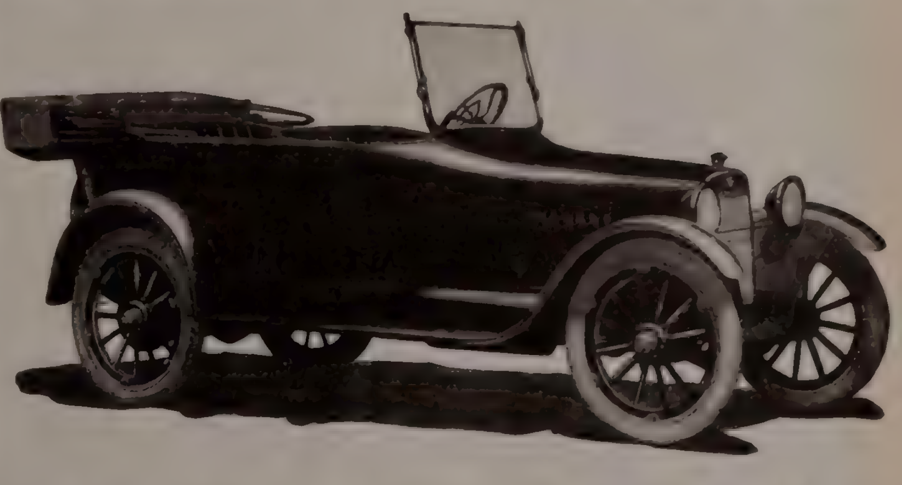
A Correction

IN our issue of February 7 was published an advertisement of the J. H. Parker Co., entitled "Snug Comfort for Tired Feet." In this advertisement it was announced that the price of arctic socks was 25 cents. This was a mistake on the part of the printer. The price should have been 35 cents. It is clearly due our advertiser that we make this explanation to our readers, as many of our friends must have taken advantage of the 25 cent rate for an article which is obviously worth much more.

SAXON "SIX"



A Car Whose Quality Lifts It Above The Level of Its Price

Though priced at $865, Saxon "Six" has forced — actually compelled — people to think of it in the terms of costly cars.

Such a situation is unprecedented. No other car we know of has ever accomplished this feat.

Can you think of any car in any other price class whose superiority is as distinct and pronounced as that of Saxon "Six" among cars costing less than $1200?

The answer of course is in the motor — the famous Saxon "Six" high-speed motor.

Its performance today is probably as nearly perfect as has ever been attained.

In high-gear work, in pulling power, in smoothness, in flexibility, Saxon "Six" gives a performance that seems incredible in a car from the less-than-$1200 class.

Saxon "Six" is $865; "Six" Sedan, $1250; "Four" Roadster, $495; f. o. b. Detroit. Canadian prices: "Six" Touring Car, $1175; "Six" Sedan, $1675; "Four" Roadster, $665. Price of special export models, "Six," $915; "Four," $495; f. o. b. Detroit. (951)

Paint Without Oil

Remarkable Discovery That Cuts Down the Cost of Paint Seventy-Five Per Cent.

A Free Trial Package is Mailed to Everyone Who Writes.

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of Adams, N. Y., has discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He calls it Powdrpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is required is cold water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof, sanitary and durable for outside or inside painting. It is the cement principle applied to paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and looks like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

Write to Mr. A. L. Rice, Manufacturer, 107 North Street, Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a free trial package, also color card and full information showing you how you can save a good many dollars. Write today.

QUAKER
PUFFED
WHEAT

The Good Things Some Boys Get

In homes that serve Puffed Wheat and Rice, boys carry the grains at play.

Sometimes they are simply salted—sometimes doused with melted butter. And these bubble-like grains, toasted, flavory, crisp and flaky, form real food confections.

Those Boys Say This:

Boys with Puffed Grains always treat other boys. And they say something like this:

"Why, we have Puffed Grains every day in our house. I get a dish every morning.

"I get them sometimes for supper, in a bowl of milk. Sister uses them in candy making. And I get them like this after school.

"Sometimes it is Puffed Wheat, sometimes Puffed Rice, and sometimes it is Corn Puffs. But one is as good as another."

Children who get Puffed Grains talk about them. And children who don't, envy the rest.

For these are the foods that taste like nuts. That are airy and thin and flimsy. And that seem like confections served by the dishful.

Children who don't get Puffed Grains get nothing else that's like them. There is no other way to make whole grains into such inviting morsels.

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice and Corn Puffs
Each 15c Except in Far West

The purpose of puffing, by Prof. Anderson's process, is to make whole grains wholly digestible. By terrific heat and shooting from guns, every food cell is exploded.

What cooking does in a partial way, this process does completely. Thus every element is made available, and every atom feeds.

People need whole-grain foods. But they need them so the whole grain will digest. Puffed Wheat and Rice supply them. So every dainty tidbit forms a perfect food. Let children eat all they will.

Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

SHALL we intercede with God for another? Is not intercessory prayer presumption? Can the will of God be thwarted and the plan of God changed by our petition? These questions come to us frequently. The answer lies in the Word of God. In the first place, it is not God's will to punish for sin; it is his will to be merciful. The sin cries for its rightful recompense, but the avenging hand is most often not that of an angry Father but of outraged nature. Natural law is God's law, to be sure, and who sins against nature, his offense is against God; but nature is a tyrant who demands expiation, while God is a Father of love who only awaits the prayer of faith to exercise mercy.

Abraham was an intercessor. The sins of Sodom and Gomorrah were grievous. They cried unto the Lord, not for vengeance but for recompense. There was no repentance in Sodom; the men of the city even mobbed the house of Lot, seeking to misuse angels of God, to them only men, who were his guests. Such utter wickedness called for complete destruction. Yet God withheld his hand at the prayer of Abraham, and agreed to spare the city if only fifty among its people should prove to be righteous. Abraham had asked almost beyond his faith, for he knew it was a wicked city; and so he prayed again, and God said: "If I find there forty and five, I will not destroy it." But, still hanging on to God, pressing his supplications yet further, Abraham at last had God's promise that only ten righteous persons should be enough to stand between the city and destruction. The Word says expressly that God has no pleasure in the destruction of the wicked, and Jesus told of the joy in heaven over one sinner that repented. We who are intercessors make ourselves the vehicles of God's mercy. We do not change his plan, we make it operative. Let us therefore approach the throne of grace with assurance, and let us pray with full faith, for our God hears and answers prayer.

A mother comes to the Prayer League asking prayer that the Spirit of God may prevail over her husband's hard-heartedness, and that he may be saved. He is a hard man; he drives his children and refuses them natural relaxation, derides their mother's faith, and curses and abuses them all. Yet should they finally be forced to leave him, he would be unable to work his farm. A revival service is about to open in the church, and this mother pleads with the members of the League to intercede that this hard man may be saved, the children held to the home and the church, and their home blessed with Christian love.

An interesting report comes from the Memphis Noon Prayer Meeting, which has now been meeting daily since January 19, 1914, in the Central Baptist Church. The third anniversary was celebrated by a meeting inspired by notable addresses and glorified by fervent testimonies to the power of God. Some thanked God for healing, some for salvation from ruinous habits, some for sons restored, and some for added opportunities for service.

A local branch of the Prayer League with fourteen members has been organized in the Y. M. C. A. at Dayton, Ohio.

A few weeks ago M. A. asked prayers for a young man in prison. If M. A. will send the proper address another young man, a member of the Prayer League, will take pleasure in writing a bright and cheery letter to this prisoner.

A member of the League tells of the healing, through concerted prayer of a group of friends, of a minister's wife who was greatly afflicted.

Miss M. K. writes that though born a cripple, without the full use of one limb, she has been cured through the power of prayer. An operation and certain exercises and mechanical appliances

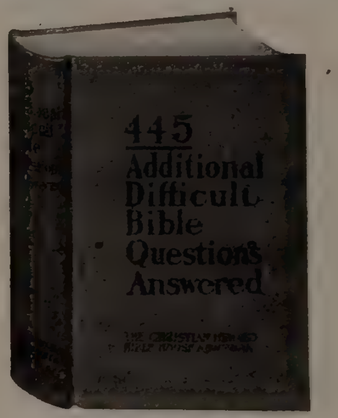
445 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED



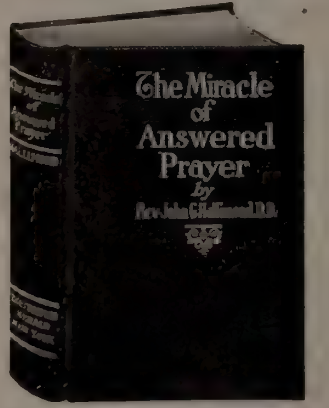
WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible.

We will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

THE MIRACLE OF ANSWERED PRAYER



By Rev. John G. Hallimond, D.D.

THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

This book contains authenticated instances, not ancient, but happening in our own time—now—of answered prayers. There is hardly a conceivable situation in human experience which is not included in this wonderful book.

We will send a copy of "The Miracle of Answered Prayer," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35.

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00.

("pray for the upbuilding of the Lutheran Church at Tekamah, Neb., for the reconsecration of indifferent members, and that many outsiders may come into the church, and that we may secure a pastor who will be the means of building up the church"); Rev. S. R., Campbelleport, Wis. (that souls may be saved and that God may bless his work as minister); Mrs. H. J. A., Cochran, Ga. ("that we may have a resident pastor and a great revival"); E. G., Cumberland Gap, Tenn. ("that a superintendent may be sent to our Sunday school, and more teachers").

Three parents ask prayer that their sons' minds, Mrs. M. E. A. that baby's mind, may be strengthened; Mrs. J. D. B. that husband's, Mrs. J. R. S. that mother's mind may be restored; eleven friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves, friends or relatives.

Mrs. M. W. A. asks prayer that twins', Miss R. R. that pastor's, sight may be restored; six friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for friends, relatives or themselves.

Thirty-seven friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Nine parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; two wives, their husbands; eight others ask that other relatives or friends may be delivered from this habit.

E. B. C. asks prayer that a son may be saved and return home to his mother; thirty-six parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twenty wives, their husbands; fifty-five, other relatives or friends.

Sixteen readers ask prayer for special blessing for others.

Seventy-eight ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including Mrs. E. M. S., that a mother may be cured of cancer; fifty-nine friends ask prayer for healing for themselves, including Mrs. H. S. K., that health may be restored without an operation; eleven friends, for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Forty-seven friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Fifty-eight friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including G. H. that the United States may remain at peace with all nations, and that the nations now in war may come to speedy terms of peace.

The book "The Miracle of Answered Prayer"—a record of many wonderful experiences largely in connection with the work of the Prayer League—is now ready and can be procured through the Christian Herald. The author is Dr. John G. Hallimond and the book will be found a valuable spiritual help to members of the League.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

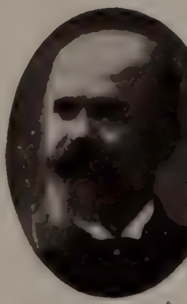
PEPSIN CHEWING GUM



Many Illnesses can be traced to Indigestion

It is the lack of a sufficient quantity of the gastric juices of the mouth that causes many cases of indigestion.

Improperly digested food, as everyone knows, interferes seriously with the functions of all the vital organs, and frequently leads to serious illnesses.

The chewing of Beeman's Pepsin Gum, into which I have put pure chicle and pepsin in nicely balanced proportions, releases the gastric juices of the mouth which make up largely for what was lacking when the food causing the indigestion was eaten.

A Message to Cæsar

prince never told. The morning dawned on a face of settled peace.

THE midnight messenger took horse and rode very quietly until out of hearing, then fiercely. Miles of forest and swamp were passed. He avoided two or three small villages, and passed more than one Roman villa. These last seemed unusually alert for the time of night. He caught a glimpse of men who seemed to be searching the forest, and as he went on heard more often cries of one to another in the distance.

A party of mounted men had drawn up in a glade beside the path. One of them spoke, "Excellency, we have ridden far since sunset."

"As ye will," the leader replied. "We may as well rest until daylight."

The leader was a little past middle age. His strong and kindly face wore a look of great anxiety. At the sound of hoofs he started forward, but caught himself, muttering: "Not he. His horse came back alone."

His followers stopped the passing horseman, who at once showed a letter, displaying the seal, and crying, "Make way! A message to Cæsar! Make way!"

At sight of the seal one said, or rather shouted, "His seal! A message from him!"

The leader stepped forward and grasped the letter. The bearer clung to it, saying, "He who gave me this said I must not let it out of my hands save into the hands of Cæsar."

The leader smiled, "I open Cæsar's letters," and broke the seal. All stood waiting. It took but a moment to read. "How far to this village?"

"The moon was rising when I left it."

Turning to those with him and pointing to the sky the leader said, "Rest until that star goes behind the trees." To the messenger, "Rest thou also. Thou shalt guide me to this village by the quickest way."

"Excellency, my letter to Cæsar!"

"Cæsar will have thy letter." And again the brief smile relieved the anxiety in his face. Taking the messenger aside, he questioned in low tones. Food was brought, and he commanded Malchus to eat, but himself took nothing. The star had hardly reached the tree-tops when he gave the signal to ride on.

THE broad light of day filled the little room when the Roman awoke. Some one had thrown a warm blanket over him. Drawing it closer, he would have slept again. A hand caught his, and a slave begged, "Domine, save my prince."

The events of the previous day and night came back to him with a rush, and he sat up. Tears were on his hand.

"They are bringing my prince out to sacrifice."

"Now?"

"Yea, domine. He is in the street now."

Beside the Roman lay his own garments freshly cleaned, but he took them not.

At the upper end of the open space or square, where the royal table had stood the night before, rose the great wicker image, grotesque, terrible, with the wood and kindlings piled on either side ready for the torch. A little way in front of its open door stood a group of men.

As the Roman approached them, he heard the voice of Gryffyth saying sadly, "I am very sorry; but thou heardst the word of my royal uncle that Caradoc should serve the Blessed Gods this morning." The voice was sad, apologetic.

"The king meant only that he must become a priest." The speaker was one of the most powerful of the chiefs that owned the sway of Llewellyn.

"Thou knowest that my uncle was very angry and swore by the Blessed Isles."

"Surely ye will not do more than question him until the king awakes?"

"What need to wait?" said the old Druid. "Ye all heard the king swear by the most sacred oath of our religion that Caradoc should serve the gods this morning. If he will take the Druid's oath and robe, I shall be glad indeed. If not, he must serve the gods in the only other way. The oath must be kept."

A stir among the crowd. A whisper: "He comes!"

"Hold! I will not stand by and see my king's son murdered by you priests!"

"Black Murdoc"—the old Druid's voice was like a steel blade—"knowest what thou sayest? Shall thy right arm shrivel? Shall thy son lie dead when thou returnest to thine house? Shall the vengeance of the unsleeping gods follow thee and thine?"

Before the old Druid the proud chief seemed to shrink visibly. Completely cowed, he waited in silence. The Roman realized that, as Caradoc had foretold, the king was not master this morning.

Now the prince appeared, walking calmly between his guards. At a sign they drew back a step, leaving him face to face with his uncle Modred, the chief Druid.

"Caradoc, prince of Britain, wilt thou this day take the solemn oath of the most holy priesthood? Speak and say that thou wilt this day serve the gods of thy fathers!" The tone of the old Druid was gentle, almost pleading.

"I cannot serve thy gods. I am a Christian."

At a sign the guards, themselves Druids, led the prince to the image and placed him in the open doorway, facing out.

Again the old priest questioned him.

The prince gazed over the throng and replied clearly, "Thy gods are not gods, but devils. I serve the Lord Christ only."

The priest drew back. The men lifted the door to its place.

The Roman boy sprang forward, "Sir priest, King Llewellyn last night appointed me to see Prince Caradoc and have speech with him this morning."

"To what end?"

"That I might persuade him to serve the gods of his fathers."

The old priest waved back the men with the door. "Thou hast thy opportunity, Roman."

The Roman turned to Caradoc.

"Yield thee for the moment, O my friend! Live for the sake of thy people!" And the Roman gripped the hand of the prince.

"I wanted to show my people how a Christian boy can die."

The Roman stepped back with a gesture of despair and fled to the king's house.

The old Druid again came near, and the pleading note was in his voice: "Caradoc, my brother's son, give up this folly and consent to serve the gods this day."

"I belong to the Lord Christ, and him only will I serve."

"Look well! Can thy Christ save thee from the fire?"

"The Christ whom I serve is able to deliver even from the fire. I will not serve thy gods."

With a gesture oddly like that of the Roman the Druid stepped back. The men replaced the door.

Then arose that Christian hymn which had thrilled the listening thousands in the Circus Maximus. The triumphant refrain, "Christus regnat," sounded out but once, for at the command of the old priest the Druids took up a sacrificial chant, accompanied with clang of cymbal and beat of drum.

THE chant ceased. In the hush, the song of birds in the forest came plainly to the ear. The sunlight fair and beautiful streamed over forest and village, over the gathered throng and the men waiting with lighted torches, over the dreadful image within which the victim knelt in silent prayer. The men lacing in the door worked all too slowly for the patience of the young priest Gryffyth. He bent to give some direction, and found himself brushed aside by what might have been the very genius of the empire. Roman from the shining helmet to the sandaled feet, one hand lifted in gesture of command, the sunlight bringing into bold relief the purple border of the toga, he spoke a single word in the language of all-conquering Rome:

"Veto!"

The workmen shrank back from the

HAYNES

"America's Greatest 'Light Twelve'"

"Light Six" Roadster: $1725

"Light Twelve" Roadster: $2225

The Prettiest Roadster in America

"Six-footers" find spacious havens for lengthy limbs in this, the roomiest of four-passenger roadsters. The broad aisleway between the comfortable club-chairs in front relieves stouter folks of all inconvenience.

Note, by the seating dimensions in inches given above, that the prettiest of roadsters is likewise the roomiest!

A chummy roadster—yet not over-chummy. Built upon a seven-passenger touring chassis of 127-in. wheelbase.

Deep, yielding upholstery. Big, comfortable rolls over the backs and sides, supported by thin, flat springs.

All late mechanical improvements. And yet, in power-plant and principal structure, basically the same as Haynes cars which over 15,000 motorists during the past three years, have driven in excess of 100,000,000 miles.

Carrying spaces beneath all seats. A large rear compartment for suitcases. Demountable tops (extra).

Lowest cost per mile on "gas," oil, tires and repairs, of any comparable cars. Owners' records prove it. Long life a certainty. A model which will never grow passé.

Demand for Haynes cars always exceeds the supply. Early inspection, and prompt ordering, urgently recommended!

door. The crowd stood amazed. Gryffyth was the first to recover himself. "Fools! What are you afraid of? This is only that Roman boy. Seize him."

The old priest started forward. "Down with the Roman!" All his long-pent hate for Rome gleamed in his eyes. One of the visiting kings caught his arm, and pointing toward the Roman said something about the purple; ending, "Have a care what thou doest!"

The old Druid shook him off angrily. "I care not what he is. He has interfered with a sacrifice to the holy gods. Were he Cæsar's self, he should die. Down with him, my sons."

The Druids surged toward the Roman. "Come on," he cried. "I will show you how a Roman can fight!" His toga slipped to the ground, revealing the shining armor of a legionary. Before the sword and pilum the unarmed priests drew back. Beyond a doubt they could overpower him with a rush. Equally beyond a doubt those who came first would fare to the Blessed Isles. One waited for another.

Taking advantage of this lull in the attack, the Roman cut away the half-fastened door. Drawing a second sword from the folds of the toga, he passed it to Caradoc, saying, "Thou wouldst not fight for thyself; fight for me." Authority spoke in voice and action.

"Who art thou?" asked the prince.

"I am——"

Perhaps Caradoc heard, for he seized the sword and saluted as to his commander; but the shout of the Druids filled all other ears as the man came back with bow and arrows.

Quickly a narrow lane was made through the mob. At one end stood the boys, side by side. The Roman had passed his shield to the unarmored prince and wound his toga around his own left arm as a substitute. At the other end of the lane the archer took his place, fitting the arrow to the string. The visiting king who had warned the chief Druid touched the archer's arm and muttered a command. The latter, heedless of the curses of the Druids, put up his weapons and followed his chief from the place.

Other weapons were soon brought, and this time given into the hands of Gryffyth, the Druid. Slowly, carefully, he fitted the arrow to its place. Swiftly he lifted the bow and pulled the arrow to the head. Straight for the unguarded face of the Roman flew the shaft, only to fall back blunted from the nimble shield in the hand of Caradoc.

"Twice now thou hast saved my life," said the Roman.

Again the arrow was on the string, but the old priest spoke to the archer, who came forward, taking his stand only ten paces from the boys.

Suddenly the Roman cried out.

THE Roman horsemen, as they rode through the gate, from the height of their saddles looked over the mob filling street and square and saw the dreadful wicker image, and in front of it, standing at bay, the young Roman.

But Gryffyth was again placing the arrow on the string.

Clear, sharp, stinging the air, came the Roman bugle-call to charge. With drawn swords the horsemen dashed forward.

GRYFFYTH lowered his shaft and glanced around him. Surrounded by the crowd, he saw only their startled faces. Turning his hate-filled eyes upon the prince, he again lifted the bow and drew the arrow to its head. A Roman sword broke both shaft and skull.

With a cry, "Constantine!" the leader, heedless of the mob, sprang from his saddle and clasped the Roman boy in his arms. Then, holding him at arm's length, "My son! And safe!"

Caradoc saluted Cæsar.

Constantius Chlorus had the reputation of a just and gentle ruler, but, like many another patient man, his wrath when aroused was terrible. The Druids now felt its force.

Soon after the imperial edict granted protection to Christians. Caradoc, by the premature death of King Llewellyn, became the first Christian King on the island, and lived to see the ancient eagle give place to the Christian labarum as the symbol of imperial power.

The Wicked John Goode in Book Form

60 cents

Postpaid in the U. S.

THE tremendous interest taken in "The Wicked John Goode" in serial form, and the popularity of the man himself as an evangelist representing the Bowery Mission, has impelled us to republish the story of "The Wicked John Goode" in book form.

Truly it is an astonishing narrative. A plain unvarnished tale, with a glory that demonstrates anew the redemptive and transforming power of Christ.

John Goode was everything that was evil, a drunkard, a jailbird and a thief. Today he is one of the leaders of the famous Bowery Mission.

This story of his redemption is ablaze with the light of the Cross—a final and perfect answer to every "doubting Thomas" who cries for proof.

Thomas Mott Osborne, former warden of Sing Sing, has written a foreword for the book. He states as follows:

> John Goode at the age of ten was an "incorrigible"; so he tells us. But was he? Suppose he had found in one of the institutions to which he was sent an intelligent system, which would have stimulated his sense of honor and his capacity to bear responsibility, as well as a superintendent who was a sympathetic teacher; can one doubt that the inherent strength and goodness of the man, which at last has seized upon him and now dominates him, would have emerged then? Are we to suppose that the sacred fire cannot be kindled in these men until the soul has been smirched? Perhaps if I had not seen young boys as incorrigible as John Goode ever was at the age of ten, turned by humane and sensible treatment into good and useful citizens I should think otherwise; but having beheld with my own eyes the gradual but complete reformation of many such youthful delinquents, long before I saw the same thing among the adult prisoners of Auburn and Sing Sing, I know that there was no reason for John Goode's early failure to reform except the stupid maladministration of the institutions which received him bad and made him worse. It is only another case where "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn."

J. G. Hallimond, President of the Bowery Mission, says of John Goode:—

> I have been in the most intimate touch with John Goode for the last five years. I have watched with increasing delight the development of his character since the day he first entered the Bowery Mission. I have seen him in action on the spiritual battlefield, and know something of the fierce conflicts he has been engaged in with the invisible powers of darkness. I have seen him with his back to the wall struggling with the most relentless and implacable spiritual foes, and, thank God, I have seen him conquer.
> Accustomed as I am to the wonderful manifestations of divine grace as seen in the transformation of character, I have never known anything more amazing than the change in this man. Five years ago he was not far removed from a ferocious wild beast. The animal in his nature not only predominated; there was little except the animal in him. And now there is not a gentler, more kindly, or more affectionate human being in the wide world than he. His mental transformation is equally marvelous. He has a big brain as well as a big body, and whereas both were formerly given over to hard materialistic occupations they now grasp and revel in everything that is sweet and true and beautiful and of good report. He is one of the most interesting men I know, and is, I believe, destined to be a tremendous power for good amongst his fellows.

"The Wicked John Goode" is being published for the book trade at $1.00. The Christian Herald has arranged for a special popular edition for Christian Herald subscribers, and the complete story, with the foreword by Thomas Mott Osborne, and an epilogue by Rev. J. G. Hallimond, President of the Bowery Mission, will be sent to any address in the United States for 60c postpaid.

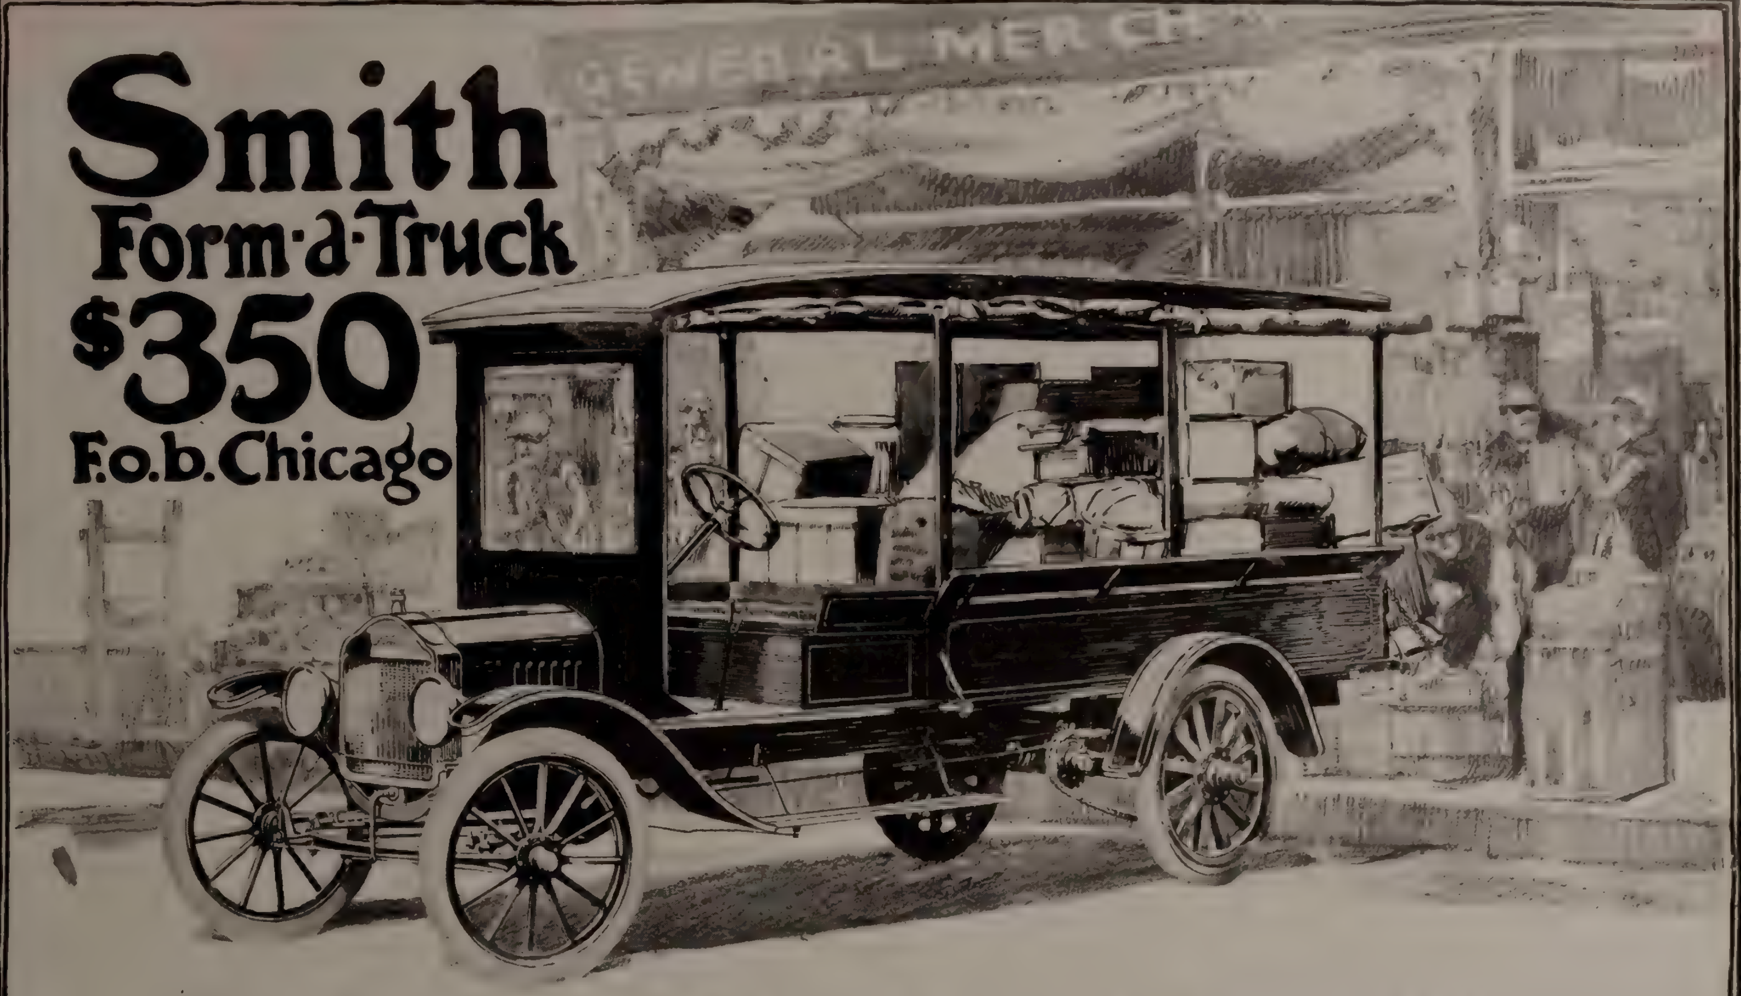
Smith Form-a-Truck $350 F.o.b. Chicago



You Can Save Sixty Cents Out of Every Dollar You Are Now Paying for Horse-Drawn Delivery

STORES all over the country are replacing wasteful horse-drawn delivery with Smith Form-a-Truck—increasing their radius of delivery two to three times—doing the work with half the equipment necessary when they used horses, and at a ton-mile cost of less than 8c. 13,500 Smith Form-a-Trucks are already in service, every one cutting hauling costs—every one increasing business radius—adding to the satisfaction of customers and to the profits of users. You can put Smith Form-a-Truck equipment in your own service, saving money from the day you start with this new, thoroughly tried, motor-driven delivery.

Built for Economy

Smith Form-a-Truck is built for hauling and delivery economy. It is a real one-ton delivery vehicle of high average speed, tremendous service and remarkably low cost for operation and upkeep. The first Smith Form-a-Truck ever used has covered 22,000 miles, hauling an average load of 2050 pounds, and cost but $8 for repairs. This Smith Form-a-Truck is in use by a general merchant in Oregon.

Choose Your Own Power Plant

Smith Form-a-Truck combines with any Ford, Maxwell, Dodge Brothers, Buick, Chevrolet or Overland car to form a fully guaranteed, permanently built one-ton truck. The conversion takes but a few hours. Any two men can do it. Loading platform can be had in 9-ft. to 12-ft. size.

A Real Truck Construction

Smith Form-a-Truck utilizes proved power plants to do truck work. All the load is carried on the Smith Form-a-Truck. You get a real engineering construction to meet motor delivery requirements, and you get the low price made possible by an enormous production of the power plant you use and of Smith Form-a-Truck itself. You cannot buy motors more adapted to truck service than those you can use with Smith Form-a-Truck—you cannot duplicate the service value of Smith Form-a-Truck in any type of truck construction at anywhere near the price.

In Use Everywhere

Smith Form-a-Truck has demonstrated its adaptability to every line of hauling and delivery. It is in use in over 500 lines of business in all parts of the country. In your own line of work we have hundreds of users whose service records will instantly prove to you wonderful economy, wonderful service, big satisfaction.

Get Smith Form-a-Trucks Now

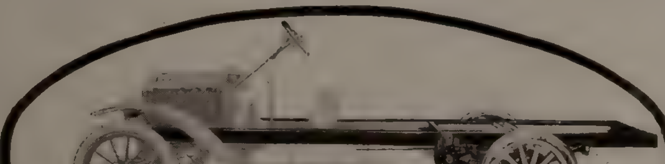
Materials for over 30,000 Smith Form-a-Trucks are in our warehouses ready to be made into one Smith Form-a-Truck every four minutes. Future demands have been anticipated a year in advance. We can fill your order on the date specified.

Eliminate Wasteful Horses Now

Horses cost you for feed, stabling, veterinary charges, whether they are working or not. They are slow—an excessive burden of expense. Smith Form-a-Truck eliminates all the wasteful expense of horses—puts money back into your profits that you are now wasting in extravagantly high hauling costs.

Be the First to Save Money in Your Delivery

Be the first to save money in delivery—to build up real profits in your locality. Do it through your most wasteful department—delivery. Do it with Smith Form-a-Truck. It has already proved itself the most economical delivery in every part of the country. Send coupon today. It will bring you real information from our expert delivery engineering department.



The heavy illustration shows the Smith Form-a-Truck attachment, which carries 90 per cent of the load, bolted to the power plant with a vise-like grip.

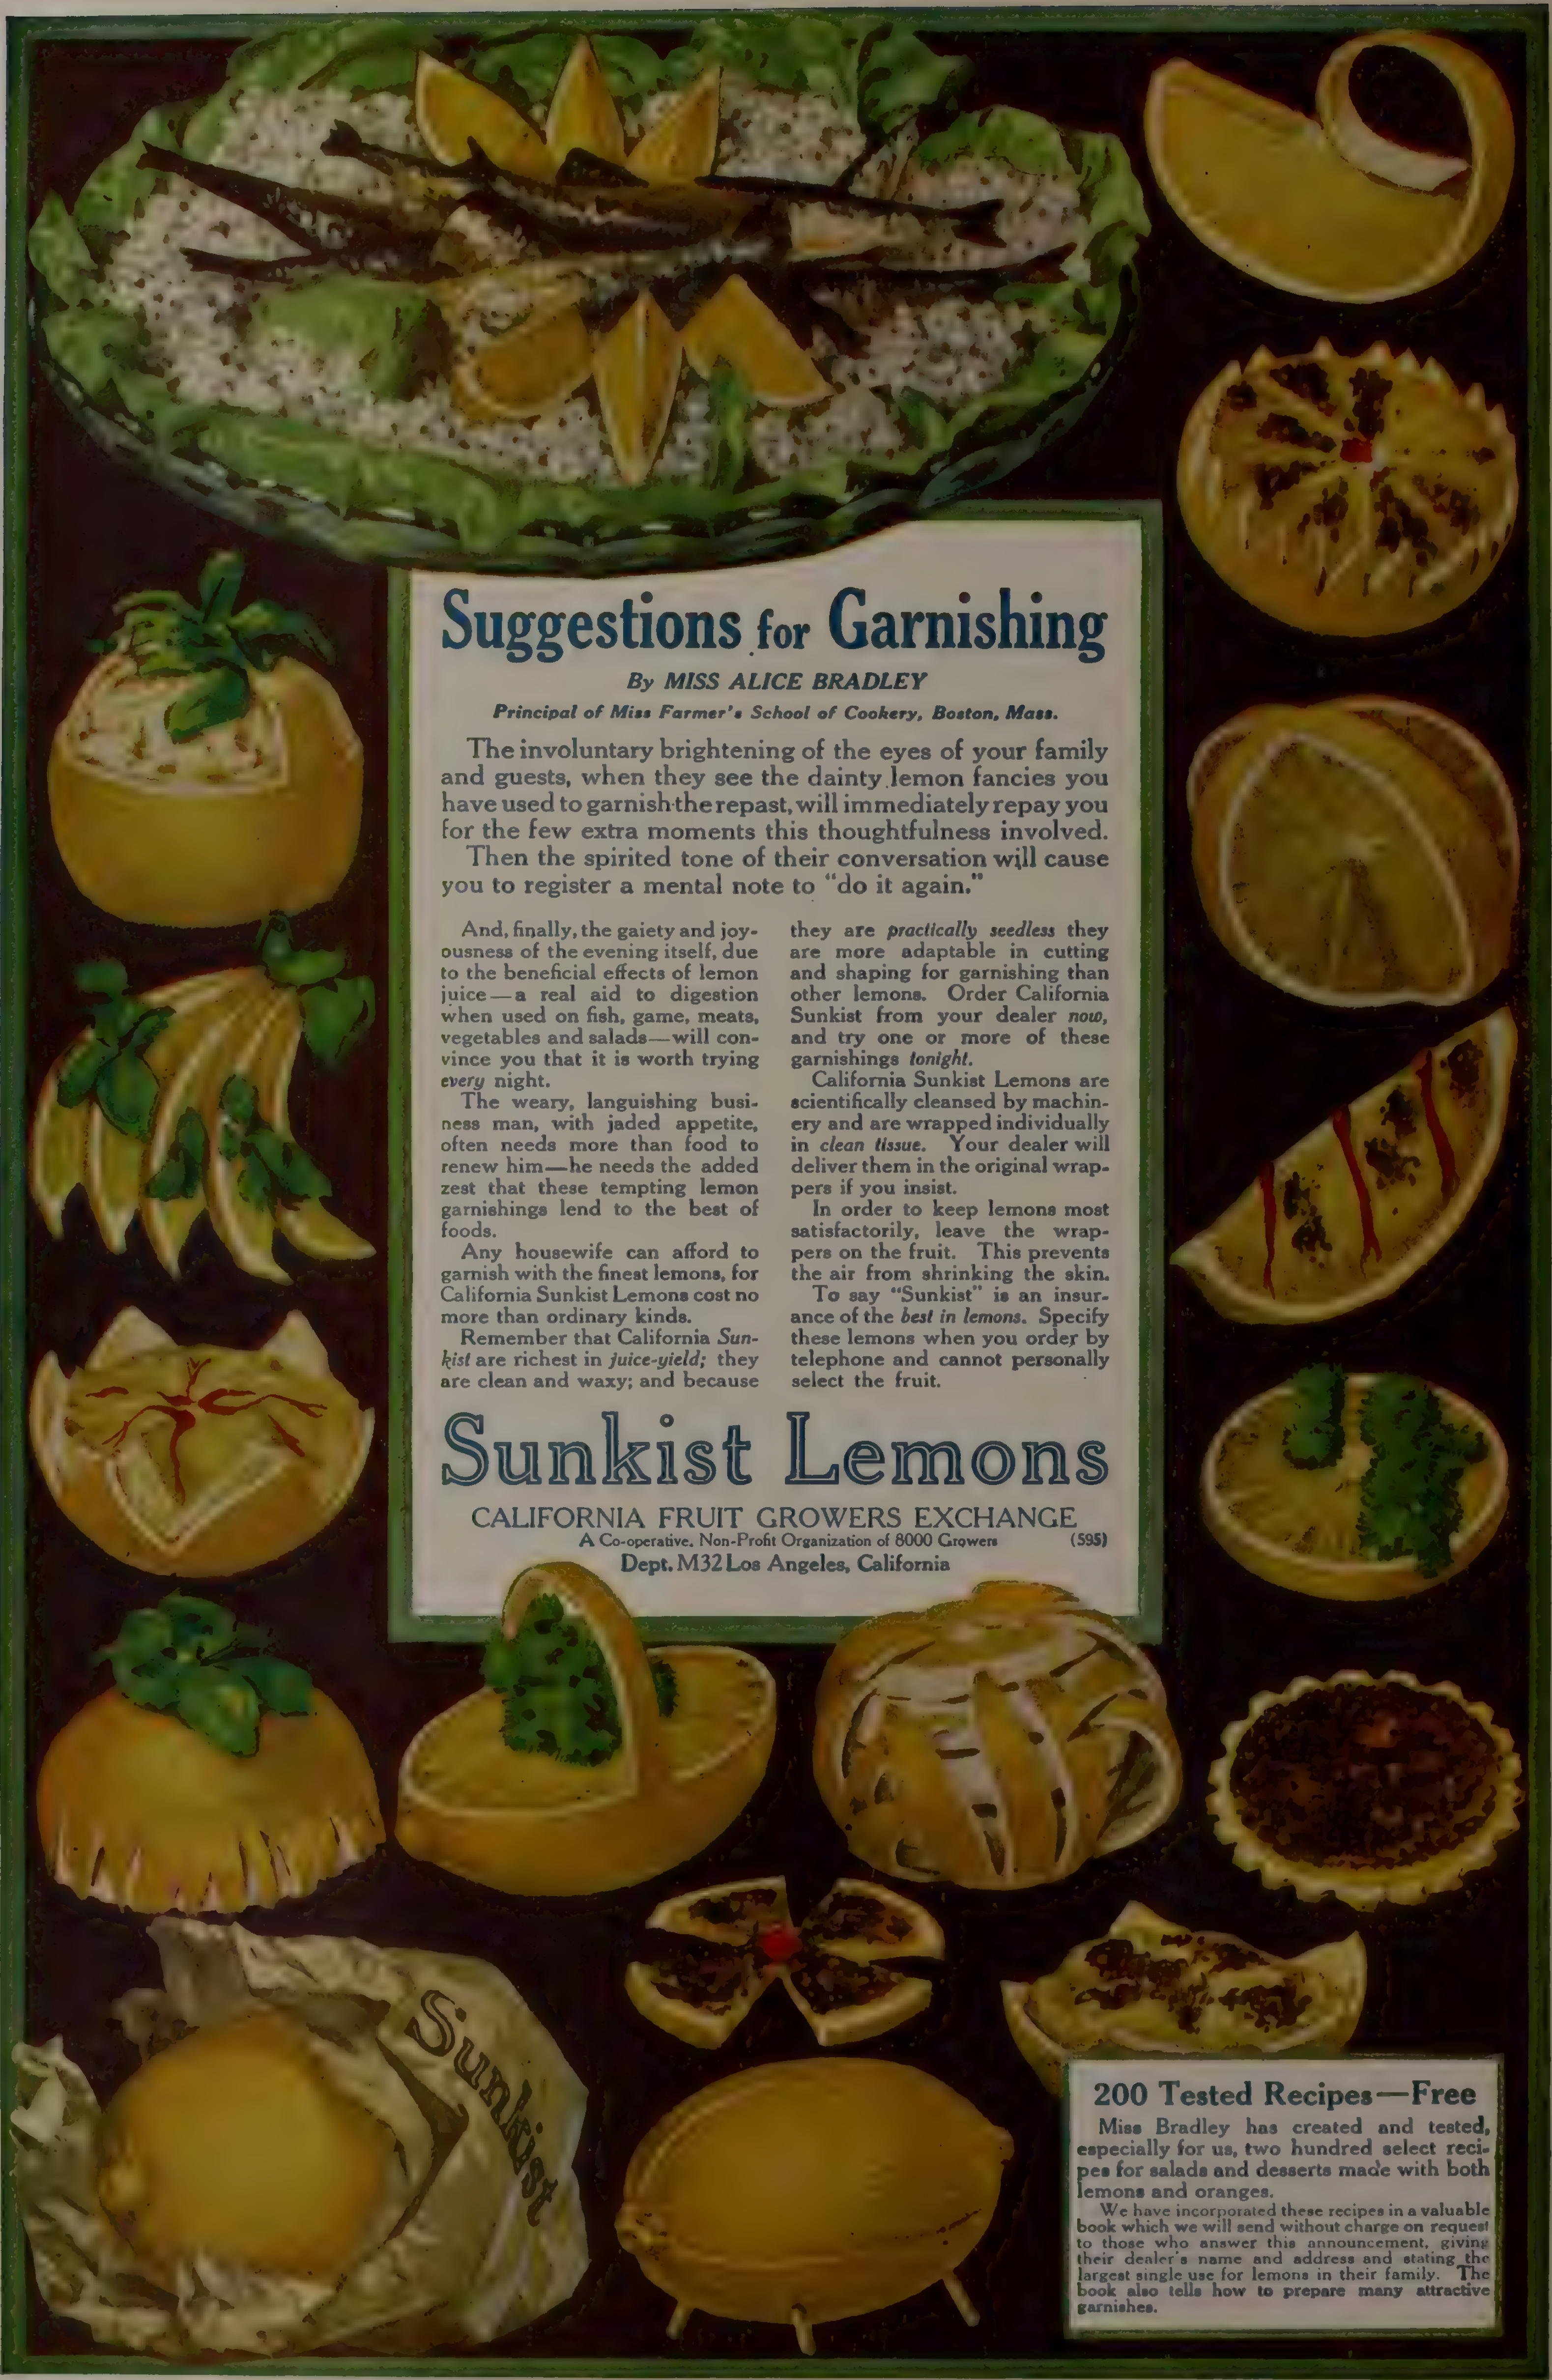
LET NOT YOUR HEART BE TROUBLED



Suggestions for Garnishing

By MISS ALICE BRADLEY

Principal of Miss Farmer's School of Cookery, Boston, Mass.

The involuntary brightening of the eyes of your family and guests, when they see the dainty lemon fancies you have used to garnish the repast, will immediately repay you for the few extra moments this thoughtfulness involved.

Then the spirited tone of their conversation will cause you to register a mental note to "do it again."

And, finally, the gaiety and joyousness of the evening itself, due to the beneficial effects of lemon juice—a real aid to digestion when used on fish, game, meats, vegetables and salads—will convince you that it is worth trying every night.

The weary, languishing business man, with jaded appetite, often needs more than food to renew him—he needs the added zest that these tempting lemon garnishings lend to the best of foods.

Any housewife can afford to garnish with the finest lemons, for California Sunkist Lemons cost no more than ordinary kinds.

Remember that California Sunkist are richest in juice-yield; they are clean and waxy; and because they are practically seedless they are more adaptable in cutting and shaping for garnishing than other lemons. Order California Sunkist from your dealer now, and try one or more of these garnishings tonight.

California Sunkist Lemons are scientifically cleansed by machinery and are wrapped individually in clean tissue. Your dealer will deliver them in the original wrappers if you insist.

In order to keep lemons most satisfactorily, leave the wrappers on the fruit. This prevents the air from shrinking the skin.

To say "Sunkist" is an insurance of the best in lemons. Specify these lemons when you order by telephone and cannot personally select the fruit.

200 Tested Recipes—Free

Miss Bradley has created and tested, especially for us, two hundred select recipes for salads and desserts made with both lemons and oranges.

We have incorporated these recipes in a valuable book which we will send without charge on request to those who answer this announcement, giving their dealer's name and address and stating the largest single use for lemons in their family. The book also tells how to prepare many attractive garnishes.

Russian prisoners, big fellows from every part of Russia, being marched away to the prison camp, where the work of the Gospel Committee brings spiritual liberty

THE HOUR for which RUSSIA HAS BEEN WAITING

BY PASTOR WILLIAM FETLER

THIS is a great hour for Russia, one of the greatest she has ever known. And I cannot but express my profound gratitude to the American Christian people for what they are doing and for what they are undertaking to do for my poor country.

I speak as a representative of 180,000,000 people, the largest white nation on the earth, and a nation inclined for God and for religion as no other nation ever has been. Hungry and thirsty for the Bread and Water of Life, and yet nobody to give them! When our first converts would give the Water of Life, thirty and forty years ago, they were forbidden, and great lines of prisoners were sent to Siberia and Transcaucasia as exiles. That was the answer of priest and civil authority to the attempt to evangelize the Russian people.

Now, in God's providence, things are changed. In these war prison camps we have the opportunity to do what preachers of the Gospel have not been able to do. The hour of Russia, after a thousand years, has come. If this hour shall be passed by, on account of some spiritual lethargy, or some degree of inability to follow the opportunity God has sent, I do not doubt that, before many decades are past, the spiritual state of France after Robespierre will be the state of the Russian people. God has given us the opportunity. I do not need to bring argument after argument to prove that.

Now let me tell you why my heart is so full, and how God has been answering that prayer I prayed when I was led, with my poor wife by my side, to the prison — to the first station on the way to Siberia. "Lord," I asked, "what does it mean? Why am I stopped from proclaiming the riches of Christ? What does it mean?" I could not understand then, but when the Lord gave me these war prisoners, I knew.

It was in Sweden, on my way to America, after my liberation, that the vision of opportunity to preach the Gospel of Christ to the prisoners by means of the printed page came to me; and there I found consecrated men ready to help. Among the first in America, after I had reached this country, to see the tremendous opportunity were the editors of the Christian Herald, and already thousands of dollars have come in response to the articles it has published.

A few sentences here and there from a report fresh from the field show the awful need: and if these do not convince us that all we can do, and all the force and all the power, and all the sympathy ought to go into this opportunity, well, no poor words of mine could convince!

Postcards are being received continually, praying for tracts, for Bibles, for hymnbooks. We get card after card bringing these requests, and they rejoice us and we wish we could answer them. On a very good type of official document from a Russian officer in some prison is mentioned a list of five poor soldiers' donations of one mark each of thank-offering for tracts received. They get so little money, and yet they are putting away a mark, not for bread to eat, but for the Bread of Life. Others have written to us that they would be willing to give away their last penny in order to get a Bible.

A war prisoner writes to the chairman of our Field Committee in Germany: "The achievement of the Scripture you sent is a masterpiece; each one illumines the way of God with men from a different point of view, and all of them show the way to Jesus. I have given away these tracts to my fellow war-prisoners, and I find that every one wants to get something; all the Scriptures I have received from you are read always."

A brother who is working among the war prisoners says: "Among the other brethren—the believers in the war prison camps—are two Russian preachers. They have worked faithfully, and the work has not been in vain. Already thirty to forty soldiers have come into the living faith; and among the new converts there is such a spirit of prayer! Almost all pray in a whisper while one prays audibly. The prayers are so hearty that I, though unable to understand their language, was quite gripped by that spirit. At the end, after the prayer-meeting, the Russian war prisoners came to me, and heartily took me by the hand, asking me that I should come soon again, and then asking me to see if I could get for them a Russian Bible." (Almost every card we receive begs for a Bible.) "Most of the people have never had a Bible in their hands; and they said I must bring twenty Bibles, and they would be willing to pay for them."

Every one of our meetings practically is a prayer-meeting. Prayers are going up from everywhere in Russia; God is opening countless prayer-meetings throughout the country.

Another written message: "God gave us grace that I, through your gifts of love for the poor war prisoners, have been able to win many a heart." Here is a touching word: "They have very scanty food; some of them have to work rather hard sometimes; yet they are willing to pay for the Bibles. Every day I am surrounded and pressed by men all wanting a Book. I have given away fifty Testaments."

Another: "We have read all these tracts. Others have so fallen in love with these tracts that at every time of meeting me they say, 'Have you received some other booklet?'"

Another writes of a church in the camp: "And now a remarkable thing has happened. We all know the name 'church.' We know of the apostolic churches. But here is a church springing up among those camps such as the world has never seen, a church of the war prisoners' camps. And the church in the camp here, praise the Lord, is growing quite large. We have 120 members already in that church; and the Spirit of God works further and further." The German government has given them a barrack for a church, and they come together, and are taught to be an evangelical people. And these men will go back—a hundred and twenty men from a hundred and twenty different places—and each one become the nucleus of the church in his own part of the country. This man ends his letter: "I have, within the last fourteen days, gained five new souls."

Another says: "We, your brethren in grace, have received your parcel with spiritual books quite safely. We have received them as manna from heaven for our souls, and for them we thank you all who have helped in this work." He goes on to speak of the church in the camp, and says: "Already, in another place, the same thing is happening, and to the meetings come more than two hundred people, who all have a desire after the Word of God." He asks for hymnbooks and Bibles.

"The Lord be praised," writes another, "for all he has done for us in these camps so wonderfully. The converts of the war prisoners are passionate to lead others to grace, to show to the poor dying souls the way of salvation."

It is the particular characteristic of our Russian converts that they want at once to bring some one else to Christ. Somebody asked me, "Mr. Fetler, how many members have you in your church?" I told him we had six hundred. And he asked, "How many evangelists?" My answer was, "Six hundred evangelists." That is the reason why thousands of people have been saved in the last ten years in various parts of Russia; not perhaps joined the churches—we do not always insist on that—but have seen the way of salvation. And each of these prisoners means something for the Lord Jesus Christ.

One says: "Our military authorities have shown us much consideration. Not a thing that I was asking to be permitted to do for the sake of the war prisoners was refused to me." It is God's work. God has spoken to the German authorities to help evangelize the people.

We are asked for Polish, Ruthenian, and Finnish tracts. The great thing now is to reach these people. When I remember during these few years of my labor in Russia the hunger of the souls, my heart fails. If I could get money to evangelize these two millions of prisoners by selling my right hand, I would sell it.

There are people in these prison camps who will change Russia if they are evangelized. Russia has been waiting for evangelists for a thousand years. I ask you, believers, for your help. I ask for your cooperation with the work of the Gospel Committee, which is a work of love and self-sacrifice. In Russia we are not allowed to print the Bible. We are put in prison as much for printing a Bible as for preaching. When the Lord calls me back to Russia after the war—I am banished only till the war is over—I shall have to go to prison for four months, and then be released.

These prisoners in the camp at Ohrdruf in Thuringia help the secretary of the "Christian Home," Mr. Descher (seated in the center), in the work of distributing the Word of God among their fellows

John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress was published in the Russian language years ago, and the greatest Russian poet who ever lived, Pushkin, wrote a poem as introduction to this book in its first edition in Russia. I have sent this Russian book to Germany to the Field Committee, and by photographic process we hope to get 100,000 copies to put into the hands of the two million prisoners, and make this a household book throughout the empire when the men go back.

I plead in the name of him who was crucified for us all, in the name of him, the Good Shepherd, who said, "I have also sheep of another fold, and I would bring them in." And I ask you, as he looks into your heart and into mine, that we may reply to him, each one of us, "Lord, we will go with you, we will seek the lost sheep of Russia together, we will evangelize them, we will do all we can." I do not ask a gift that is not a gift of self-sacrifice. And I am sure that the Holy Spirit, who alone can bring blessing to these messages, would make to grow up out of them some blessed seed, so that thousands may come to rejoice in the result.

I know those Russian homes. I remember the villages, and the unhappy men and women, and the children without Sunday schools. It is not simply the war prisoners. Those men have wives; they have children. They have been bad husbands; they have beaten their wives in their drunkenness, and ill-treated their children in their profligacy. But when they go back to their villages, converted men; when the villagers gather round them and beg to hear all the wonderful things they have seen; when they get up to tell about them, it will not be only about the great bridges and the wonderful houses and palaces, and the railways they have seen about which they will talk, but they will bring out the little Gospel of John, or the Pilgrim's Progress, or a sermon by Moody, and they will tell what this new, wonderful knowledge means, this gift of American Christians, and they will say, "Wives, nevermore will we beat you and ill-treat you; children, no more shall you have to flee from your fathers. We are changed men, thanks to the gift of the American Christian friends."

[Pastor Fetler's eloquent letter gives a realistic glimpse of the operations of the "Gospel Committee for Work among War Prisoners" in the great military prison camps of Europe. It is a work that deserves the most generous support, and one that we commend to our readers with every confidence. All contributions in aid of the War Prisoners' Gospel Fund, sent to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York, will be promptly applied to the advancement of the work in the field.]

Europe's Shifting Alliances

Liable to Sudden and Surprising Changes Today As in the Past

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE air today is full of whispered rumors of approaching changes in the alignment of the two sets of belligerents in the great war, whose armies and navies are now in the death grapple practically in every corner of the world. How much truth or falsehood there is in any particular rumor affecting any specific belligerent is indeed difficult, almost impossible, to say.

Most of the rules affecting human conduct today are derived from and based upon the results of human experience in the past. It would seem to be wise, therefore, to examine the history of the wars of Europe for the past two hundred years or so, in order to see whether the alliances entered into in those wars endured for any great length of time, and whether or not the combatants therein remained enemies for any considerable period.

Starting from the year 1700, we find that up to the outbreak of the present war the nations of Europe have taken up arms fifty-four times altogether on some pretext or other. Taking up the ramifications in this series of wars of the principal nations—England, France, Prussia, Russia and Austria—we arrive at some rather startling and apparently puzzling results. In 1701 to 1713 we find Great Britain in alliance with Austria and Holland, waging the War of the Spanish Succession against France, Spain, Savoy and some of the South German states, and but four years later, 1717, we find France deserting Spain and joining Great Britain and the others to war on Spain, her former ally. Later, however, we find Austria leaving this alliance and joining Spain, while Great Britain, France and Prussia ally themselves to resist this combination. Hardly is this war finished before the War of the Polish Succession (1733) breaks out, wherein Austria and Russia fight France and Sardinia, while two years later Russia and Austria make common cause against Turkey. Several years later (1740-48), however, came the War of the Austrian Succession, which placed France, Spain and Bavaria on the opposite side to Great Britain, France's ally of only a few years before against Spain, Austria, Russia and Hanover. Two years later, the First Silesian War broke out, wherein Prussia and Austria opposed each other. During its continuance Sweden and Russia went to war with the result that three years later the Second Silesian War began, wherein the antagonists in the First Silesian War, Prussia and Austria, became allies.

In 1756, Great Britain and Prussia formed a defensive alliance; and the same year the Seven Years' War began. In this war, these two powers found themselves attacked by Austria, Prussia's ally against Sweden only a few years before; by France, but fifteen years before Great Britain's ally against Spain; by Spain, then France's enemy; and by Saxony, which only ten years before was Prussia's ally against Sweden; also by Russia, which had fought Sweden just fifteen years before; and last of all by Sweden herself.

Omitting several small wars, and coming down to the "War of the Bavarian Succession," for once we find former antagonists still antagonists, since therein Austria fought Prussia; but in the same year, 1779, France fought her late ally, Spain, and one year later the two former allies, England and Holland, went to war.

In 1792, thirteen years afterward, we find the old antagonists, Austria, Prussia and the South German states, uniting with other nations to fight France, and one year later England, Holland and Spain, all recent enemies, entered this combination against France. In 1805, England, which had again gone to war with France in 1803, formed another coalition against France, embracing Russia, Austria and Sweden, and ultimately including Spain and Prussia; but this time the South German states changed sides and cast their lot with France. These combinations endured practically unchanged until the end of the Napoleonic wars, although some of the South German states again changed sides. Though enemies in 1814, in 1821 France and Russia again became allies in the war to free Greece from Turkey.

Passing over the minor wars of the next twenty years, in 1848 came the first Schleswig-Holstein War, wherein Prussia fought Denmark. Sixteen years later came the second war, wherein Austria and Prussia as allies fought the same country (Denmark); but one year later, 1865, these powers fought each other. In the meantime (1848), Austria and Russia fought France over the Roman republic, and in 1853-54 France, England and Turkey fought Russia in the Crimea, and later France and Italy fought Austria in 1859. Then came the gigantic struggle of 1870–71 between France and Germany, and only a few years later, in 1877, Russia fought Turkey, and at the end of that war came almost to war with England, as she did again in 1885 over Turkestan and Afghanistan.

Then comes a period in which the peace is kept by alliances, Germany, Austria and Italy forming one, and France and Russia another, while Great Britain, to counterbalance these in 1902 formed another with Japan. Finally, in 1903, Japan and Russia fought. Today they are allies.

In 1912–13 the Balkan states, hating each other bitterly, formed an alliance against Turkey, and attacked her in the hope that in the spoils won from her they would find a means of composing their own differences, but failed and fought among themselves. Finally the Great War breaks out, and we find Germany and Austria, who have repeatedly fought each other, in alliance with Bulgaria; this latter now against her former ally, Serbia, and with her former enemy, Turkey—against which country Austria, too, had repeatedly fought in the last hundred or so years—on one side, while Great Britain and France, who have fought each other for the last five or six centuries on nearly every possible occasion; Russia, whom France has fought often the past hundred years, and whom England has fought once recently, and nearly fought on two other occasions; Italy, who deserts her Teutonic allies of thirty years and whom France has also fought, and Japan, whom Russia fought only the other day—are allies on the other.

In fact, the only allies in the existing groups which have not fought in comparatively recent years are Germany and Turkey in one group, and Japan, with either Italy, France or England, in the other. Surveying thus on broad lines the field of history for the past two hundred years, it becomes clearly apparent that in spite of all the protestations of eternal duration with which treaties of alliance between nations usually begin, there is nothing resembling permanency in their actual character.

There is only one exception to the rule hereafter deduced from the history of this past two hundred years: Russia and Turkey have always been on opposite sides; but this exception may be taken to be that exception which proves the rule. Which rule, deduced from the multitudinous shiftings of policy and changes of allies which the retrospective view of Europe's Cloture for the Senate. After maintaining the right of unlimited debate for 110 years, the Senate in special session in Washington on March 8 adopted a rule providing for the limiting of debate. The rule provides that two days after notice in writing from sixteen senators, the question of closing debate on any bill shall be settled without debate, and if settled in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote, the bill shall be held before the Senate till its final disposition, each senator being limited to one hour's debate in all upon the bill and all amendments to it. This action by the Senate was taken after a short debate, in which the senators referred to by the President as a "group of wilful men" severely criticized the President for the use of that phrase in describing members of a coordinate branch of the government. Mr. Cummins expressly denied filibustering. The cloture rule was supported by most of the twelve senators who voted against the arming of ships, being adopted by a vote of 76 to 3. The President on March 9 issued a proclamation calling a special session of the Sixty-fifth Congress to meet at noon on the 16th of April, 1917. In a supplementary statement issued from the White House, it was suggested that the special session was called because of necessary legislation carried over from the Sixty-fourth Congress, and because the President was convinced that it was for the best interests of the country to have an early session of Congress for the support he will need in all matters collateral with the defense of the merchant marine. It was declared that an attempt would again be made to pass the bill authorizing the arming of merchant ships, but being assured both by Secretary Lansing and Attorney General Gregory that he had the power, President Wilson on March 9 decided to furnish armament and naval gunners to merchant vessels flying the United States flag. While Congress will no doubt give formal approval to the action of the President, the debates in the latter days of the last session and in the opening days of the special session showed that the nation's representatives were increasingly reluctant to take any action which promised to involve us in the European war.

China Sees Advantage in War. Reports current on March 2 indicated that China would shortly enter the European War against Germany. China's entrance into the conflict was said to hinge upon an agreement with the Allies by which the Boxer indemnities, exceeding $30,000,000 a year, and scheduled to continue until 1940, would be remitted, and China would also be permitted to raise her tariff duties, limited by treaty with the powers to five per cent. on the average prices of 1897, 1898 and 1899. The United States, Japan and Great Britain before the war urged this modification of the treaties, but unanimous consent could not then be obtained. China could aid the Entente Allies by furnishing men to replace soldiers in the industries of the countries at war. The Chinese cabinet on March 4 decided that China should break off relations with Germany, but the president refused to approve the decision of the cabinet, and the premier immediately resigned. The Chinese parliament was reported as virtually unanimous in agreement with the opinion of the cabinet. Later dispatches indicated that the president had yielded to the cabinet, and that the resignation of the premier would be reconsidered. The actual breaking of relations, however, awaited action of the parliament, which had taken no action at this writing.

Trust Appeals Argued. The International Harvester Company on March 1 filed a brief in the United States Supreme Court asking to be judged according to the Rule of Reason rather than the Rule of Size. The company denied that it had the power to drive out competitors or to raise prices, and it declared that its share of the harvester trade had steadily decreased during the ten years since its organization. The argument of the government was made by Attorney General Gregory on March 7; he argued that there was conscious wrongdoing in the formation of the combination; that it was the intent of Congress to prohibit undue concentration of capital and restraint of competition, and that such a "colossal combination" of capital, enjoying preponderant control of an industry, even if "good," was illegal and harmful; and he declared also that unless the clear intent of Congress were carried out, government control, if not actual government ownership, was the logical outcome of these great combinations of capital.

The Sixty-fourth Congress. The Congress that came to an end by legal limitation on March 4 appropriated nearly $1,200,000,000, yet adjourned with bills appropriating another half million still on the calendar of the Senate. The appropriation bills passed are as follows: Agriculture, $25,454,000; Diplomatic and Consular, $5,125,000; District of Columbia, $14,860,000; Fortifications, $51,396,000; Indian, $12,435,000; Legislative, Executive and Judicial, $40,000,000; Naval, $533,000,000; Pensions, $160,000,000; Post Office, $333,000,000; Urgent Deficiency, $4,578,000. Total, $1,179,848,000. The following bills failed to pass: Rivers and Harbors, $35,000,000; Sundry Civil, $138,300,000; Army, $279,000,000; General Deficiency, $62,600,000; Military Academy, $1,348,000. Total, $516,248,000. Congress provided for the payment to Denmark for the West Indies, but the Senate, in spite of the urgent request of the President, failed to ratify the treaty under which Colombia was to have received $15,000,000 for the separation of Panama. Of the Administration's program of legislation only two measures were passed—the Revenue Bill and the measure giving civil government to Porto Rico and citizenship to Porto Ricans. Perhaps the most important enactment of the session was the Immigration Bill, which was passed, vetoed, and passed again over the veto. Among the bills that failed were the bill to supplement the Adamson Law, the bill to enlarge the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Webb Bill to legalize joint foreign selling agencies, or, in other words, trusts for foreign commerce, and conservation legislation, including the bills known as the General Dam Bills and the Water Power Bills. Bills amending the Shipping Act to give the President power to commandeer ships, the Senate's "Spy" Bill, and the bill amending the Federal Reserve Act to increase reserve bank gold holdings and to decrease reserves held by member banks, also died with the Congress. This Congress passed the bill abolishing saloons in the District of Columbia, as well as the law making it a crime to transport liquor in interstate commerce and excluding liquor advertising from the mails.

A Noted Publisher Dies

IN the death of William Bailey Howland, publisher of the Independent, who passed away suddenly in his office in New York on February 27, in his sixty-ninth year, the country loses a distinguished worker in metropolitan journalism. Mr. Howland was born in Ashland, N. Y., in 1849, and was the son of Rev. Harrison O. Howland. He was graduated at Williston Seminary in 1868, and early in life turned his attention to journalism. He founded the Outing Magazine in 1882. In 1900 he established the Outlook with which he was connected until 1913, when he became managing editor of the Independent. At the time of his death he was president of the Independent Corporation, which published the Independent Magazine and the Countryside Magazine, and which had absorbed Harper's Weekly.

Mr. Howland possessed a marked talent for journalism, and much of his success was due to his genius for selecting skilled helpers. He engaged as contributing editor of the Outlook ex-President Roosevelt, of whose policies he was always a stanch supporter.

He was actively interested in many plans for the betterment of humanity. While treasurer of the Society for Italian Immigrants, he received a decoration from the King of Italy for his activities in behalf of these people. He was also connected with many civic and benevolent societies. Among these were the American Civic Association, the American Scenic and Historic Preservation Association, the Commission of the State Reservation at Niagara, the National Institute of Efficiency, the Congregational Home Mission Society, and the Chautauqua Institute. He received the degree of LL.D. from Toronto University in recognition of the leading part he took in the celebration of one hundred years of peace between England and the United States. In all these public activities he showed the sturdy character inherited from his Pilgrim ancestors. His wife and two sons, Karl V. S. Howland, publisher, and Harold J. Howland, associate editor of the Independent, survive him.

The funeral was held on March 1 at Kinderhook, N. Y., and memorial services were held on March 2 at the National Arts Club, attended by members of the various associations and clubs to which Mr. Howland belonged.

Austrian Pledges Reaffirmed. In a long note made public on March 6, the Austro-Hungarian government replied to the American note inquiring as to the position of the Austrian government in regard to unrestricted submarine warfare. The reply expressly reaffirms the pledges given by Austria in the correspondence growing out of the Ancona and Persia cases, but makes the point that legal warning may be given vessels by the prescribing of a certain zone in which navigation will be dangerous, and that it is not therefore necessary to warn individual vessels found in this zone. The note also calls attention to the danger faced by a submarine which attempts to warn an armed merchantman. The note declares that Austria and her allies are fighting for the freedom of the seas, attempting to destroy the preponderance of Britain, but declares also that submarine warfare has been forced upon the Central Powers by the illegal prevention by Great Britain and her allies of the trade of the Central Powers with neutral nations. The note also takes the position that neutrals are not entitled to immunity when on board enemy ships, and the analogy is drawn between sea and land warfare. In land warfare no government would think to protect its citizens who enter deliberately the zone of fire. The note claims that Austrian ships have been sunk by Entente submarines without notice. It declares that the submarine warfare was undertaken solely "to place Great Britain and her allies, who, without an effective blockade over the coast of the Central Powers, seek to prevent the sea traffic of neutrals with these powers, in the same isolation. The step was taken to render them by this pressure more pliable toward a peace which bears in itself a guaranty that is durable."

Planning Reprisals. Washington dispatches of March 7 reported the Shipping Board as planning reprisals to meet certain requirements made by Great Britain of neutral ships. It was reported that neutral ships in British ports which became short of coal were being forced to carry a cargo of coal from Britain to France before the British authorities would supply them with bunker coal for their return trip home. Ships requiring coal at British coaling-stations in the Pacific were also being required to execute the orders of the British Admiralty in return for the privileges granted them. The Board was said to be planning to use President Wilson's proclamation, forbidding the transfer of American ships to foreign registration without its permission, as a weapon against these British practices, and was considering further the prohibition of the admission to foreign registry of any vessels constructed in American shipyards, which yards are now working overtime executing orders for foreign owners. Secretary Daniels was also reported as making arrangements with all the shipyards whereby government work would be given first attention and rushed to completion.

Porto Ricans Citizens. On March 2 President Wilson signed the Porto Rican Bill, which makes residents of Porto Rico American citizens, and which also provides for prohibition in the island, with the provision that a referendum may be taken on the proposition to license saloons. The President on March 1 also signed the Flood Control Bill.

REBEL LEADER CAPTURED. President Menocal of Cuba on March 6 declared that the insurgent movement was making little progress, that the general situation could not be more satisfactory, and that, except for scattered bands of rebels, the Liberals were in force only at Santiago and the surrounding territory, while larger bands elsewhere were being rapidly rounded up. On the 7th General José Miguel Gomez, his entire staff, and over 200 of his troops were captured by government forces. The capture of Gomez was considered a deathblow to the rebellion, since he was recognized as the instigator and brains of the movement. It was announced that General Gomez would be tried by the civil courts. Four hundred American marines were landed at Santiago, Cuba, March 8, to protect foreign property.

AMERICAN LINE FLEET IN PORT. With the arrival of the Finland in New York on February 28 all of the six vessels of the American Line for the first time since the Spanish war were tied up in American waters awaiting armament. It was announced on March 3 that the St. Louis would be the first to be sent to sea after armament was supplied.

COUNT ZEPPELIN DIES. Count Ferdinand von Zeppelin, inventor and perfector of the dirigible balloon to which his name has been given, died of pneumonia at Charlottenberg, March 8. He was born in 1838, began experimenting with airships in 1890, and lost his fortune of $750,000 in the experiments without building an airship that was a success. Finally he sacrificed the last remnants of property held by his family, building Zeppelin No. 3 in which he made six successful flights during the summer and fall of 1907. The government finally came to his aid.

YARROWDALE MEN FREED. Fifty-nine Americans taken to Germany on the steamship Yarrowdale, whose release had been delayed by a quarantine for spotted fever, reached the Swiss border on the evening of March 9 and were taken in charge by the American diplomatic representatives.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. The Baptist Temple, famous among the churches of Brooklyn, was destroyed by fire on the night of March 7 with a loss estimated at $100,000. Before the ruins were cold neighboring churches of all denominations had offered facilities for services to the Temple congregation. . . . The Supreme Court on March 6 declared that the bringing of the English liner Appam by a prize crew from the German raider Moewe into Hampton Roads was a breech of American neutrality, for it held that the Prussian-American treaty did not contemplate the making of the ports of the one signatory of an asylum for naval prizes of the other. . . . A general election is to be held in Australia because of the obstructive tactics of the opposition to the government. . . . The Federal Grand Jury in New York on March 6 returned indictments charging 108 corporations and 64 individuals with violation of the anti-trust act in restraining trade in semi-bituminous coal. It was charged that the price of 22,000,000 tons of West Virginia coal had been manipulated at a net profit of $34,000,000. . . . The deposed boy emperor of China, Hsuan Tung, now twelve years old, is to be educated in the United States. . . . Chandra Hanador Chakraberty, a native of Bengal, and Ernst Sekunna, a German subject, were arrested in New York March 6, charged with conspiring to bring about an invasion of India through Chinese territory and with instigating rebellions throughout Great Britain's Asiatic empire. The conspiracy was said to be widespread. . . . The Federal Trade Commission on March 4 fixed the price of newsprint paper at $2.50 per 100 pounds in carload lots. Higher prices were set for paper in smaller lots and for paper in sheets. Jobbers will be permitted to charge five per cent. on carload lots and twelve and a half to twenty per cent. on less than carload lots. . . . Floods in Tennessee isolated the city of Chattanooga, and it was reported on March 7 that 7,000 persons in the city were homeless as a result of the flood. . . . American Ambassador George W. Guthrie died suddenly at his post at Tokyo, Japan, on March 8, being stricken with apoplexy. . . . President Wilson caught cold at the inauguration and was ordered to bed by his physician, being still under the doctor's orders on March 8.

The War in Europe

THE German retirement before Bapaume ended on a line running just to the west of that city. The English on March 3 advanced for an average of a quarter of a mile over a five-mile front, following it on the next day by a further advance of two-thirds of a mile on a two-mile front. After this latter advance, the fighting on the Somme front returned to the reciprocal artillery and patrol fighting of the days before the German retirement. On March 5 the Germans attacked in force on the Verdun front and succeeded in gaining a footing in the French first line trenches north of Cauriéres Wood, on the right bank of the Meuse to the north of Douaumont. A large part of this gain the Germans were still holding, but not increasing, at last reports, each side, though fighting hard, being apparently unable to gain at the expense of the other.

The French on March 8 recaptured a large part of the salient created in their lines in the Champagne district by the German attack on February 15. The rest of the western front, the Italian front and the whole of the Russian front from Riga to Rumania saw during the week no activity of vital importance.

The war in Asia Minor has, however, suddenly taken on an element of great interest. The British forces advancing from Egypt northward were reported on March 7 as within forty miles of Jerusalem. The forces advancing up the Tigris Valley in pursuit of the Turks retreating from Kut-el-Amara on March 8 had passed Ctesiphon, forty miles from Bagdad, where the Townshend expedition was turned back, and had reached a point eight miles south of Bagdad. The Russian troops in Persia, having captured for the second time in this war the town of Hamadan, were pursuing the Turks southward across the mountains separating Persia from Mesopotamia. Thus from three directions armies of the Entente Allies were closing in on the Turkish forces, which appeared to be unable to make a stand. The cause of this apparent inability was laid by some reports to a shortage of ammunition. The taking of Bagdad by the British troops, reported just as we go to press, is a serious blow to Ottoman prestige, and adds proportionately to the prestige of Britain in Asia.

LAUGHING with FATE

BY CATHERINE COURTLAND

THEIR meal was over. They had finished. The words are simple, but they explain matters. There was one indisputable fact: their meal was over. There is an essential about meals that was lacking. Perhaps, Edisonially speaking, they had had enough; perhaps, dietetically, they had had enough; internally they had not.

"That's your muffin, mother."

"Indeed, it's not."

They watched the muffin instead of each other. It's a pity people don't look more. There must be some psychical reason for these unsatisfying eye-inspections; these fleeting glances between people. For the moment a glance becomes a look; you discover something; and the longer you look the more you discover. Perhaps that is it. Perhaps we see so much that a super-delicacy checks it. And yet it is never a thing you could describe that you see, but it is a thing that endears, a message you catch somehow, somewhere; a message that startles, and haunts, and thrills you.

But these two had a substitute: instead of looking, they felt. It's a pity people don't feel more. Nothing can make two love so much as to suffer together. There is a nice, substantial, cementing element in sorrow. It develops a tender courtesy, an unforced humor, a reckless, pithy humor, near the center of things; a fine ingenuity in encouragements.

The girl was vivacious, without movement. Do you know what I mean? Her body was long, beautifully lined, leisurely; but her mind played, and teased, and laughed at you; her expressions responded instantly to what you said to her; her eyes talked.

She sat silent now and eyed the lone, brown composition before her. There was something incongruous about the sight of it on the great mahogany table. She began humming suddenly.

"Our flour's gone, our money's gone—'dough' we have nix," she chanted aloud to her mother. And they sat there—hungry—and laughed over the fact. There is a type that laughs—and one that loses its mind.

"It seems to me," the girl went on sagely, and longed for a muffin—two muffins—six muffins, "it seems to me that there must be a great Wisdom being cruel to be kind; insisting upon these seasons of abstinence. Perhaps as a safeguard against fatty degeneration—of appreciation, or to renew a weakened palate. A palate must necessarily lose its sensitiveness, its delicacy, become callous, as it were, after years of reporting for an epicurean's delight. Think what an awful job that poor little spot has, mother: classifying, approving, disapproving, distinguishing pâté de foie gras from sweetbread casserole, kidney sauté from beef filet, sauterne from champagne. Why, it's a perfect bundle of nerves! It is only fair that we should let it rest awhile, and live on bread alone."

"Madeline!"

"Ah, tut, mother! If I can't be full of anything else, let me be full of fun."

Her mother smiled at her. There was a peculiarly mischievous quality in their smiles.

"I am glad to have you full of something, dear heart. The nearest approach to food you have is the milk of human kindness."

They separated for the little afternoon duties. Half an hour later the girl came singing up the stairs:

"Another trouble is here, another trouble is here;
They are treading on each other's heels to reach us, dear."

Her mother put down the skirt she was mending, an elegant broadcloth—two years old. She waited. They had acquired this gay way of announcing each new adversity.

"What could have happened in thirty minutes, dear?"

"The postman came."

"Yes?"

The other waited, and then,

"Mr. Merrill writes that his son has returned to the city. He will attend to the stenographic end of his writings."

The woman sat dumb. The girl felt an imperative need to talk, to look the other way, and not to touch her mother. There is something weakening in a loving hand at a crisis. After the crisis you need it—you have got to have it.

"It is a bit unfortunate," Madeline went on, holding tight to her flippancy. "He had only to try me to find me indispensable. Then, too, the remuneration was to have paid the grocery bill. One hasn't very much if one hasn't credit. However, there is no need for very much, with all the hope we have—and this awful supply of nerve."

"Perhaps you will hear from the Board of Education tomorrow."

"Oh, yes, I fully expect to hear from them—tomorrow."

Alone in her room that evening, Madeline took a critical, humorous, impersonal inventory of her wardrobe—and found it wanting.

A New Serial by the Author of "Pollyanna"

Beginning in our First Issue in APRIL

THE ROAD TO UNDERSTANDING

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

THIS delightful story has all the sweetness, inspiration and human appeal of the "Pollyanna" stories, so justly famous, which first appeared in the pages of the Christian Herald.

"The Road to Understanding," like all of Mrs. Porter's stories, is charmingly written, and in the telling she reveals a truly wonderful insight into human nature—especially the feminine side of it.

It is, of course, a Love Story, the best that has ever come from her pen, and with a plot so novel, and so cleverly worked out, that every successive chapter is a revelation of Eleanor Porter's inimitable art as a popular romancist. It might almost be called a problem novel—though it isn't. But we mustn't anticipate, preferring to let our readers find out for themselves all about Helen, what she did, and why, and what happened afterward.

Invite the attention of your friends to this splendid new Serial and urge them to get it in the Christian Herald. They will thank you for it afterward.

DO NOT FAIL TO BEGIN THIS SERIAL
IN THE ISSUE OF APRIL 4.

"Mother!"

"Yes?"

"My best waist is shredding. If the threads will all pull the same way I can hemstitch them beautifully. Anyhow, the blooming thing had me wearing it because it was handsome. That shade of green does make me look so deathly ill."

"I think I can make over that blue one of mine for you, Madeline."

"Yes, that will be a good idea. And have you appear before the public sans raiment. You need something elegant for receiving collectors, mother." She smiled up playfully as her mother appeared in the doorway. "Assume a fortune if you have it not, dearie. People are so delightfully fond of judging by appearances."

"Yes—and so clever at appearing."

"The woman hadn't said very much with her words; but her tone—— The girl put down her sewing and laughed and laughed. Her voice had been so forceful. And then, too, everything is extremely funny when it's a draw whether to laugh or cry.

"Where is my letter from the Board of Education?" she demanded on her return the next evening."

"It isn't."

"Hurrah! I've been scared to death that they would hold me to my promise and tie me to a teacher's chair."

And so they laughed. And the weeks passed.

"These are the last potatoes, Madeline."

"Heaven be praised! I am getting soggy mentally from these vast quantities of potatoes and grits I'm consuming. May I have an apple for dessert?"

"No."

The girl glanced up quickly. "You have got to stop this, mother. The idea of an esthetic woman weeping over potatoes and green apples."

"I am not weeping."

"Certainly not."

She molded a piece of soft bread into a perfect cube. She was painstakingly careful about it.

"Have we any money?"

"Three dollars. But the gas and electric bills must be paid. That leaves seventy cents to last us until June."

"H'm! Including our spring trip'?'

"Yes. And your Easter clothes."

"I am afraid that is going to stint us, mother." She squeezed the little exact mold into a shapeless mass.

"I want a porterhouse steak," she decided. "I want it worse than anything in the world. I have got to have it." And then—irrelevantly:

"I am going to pawn that diamond brooch grandfather gave me."

"I suppose I shall have something to say about that."

"Would you forbid it, mother?"

"Absolutely. I've had an inborn horror of pawnshops. I have almost gone so far as to consider it a moral question." She had been smiling. She grew serious suddenly. "Will you promise me to leave your brooch exactly where it is?"

The girl smiled at the water in her glass. "Yes," she promised.

Her mother received the answer gratefully, with infinite relief. But she was a woman, and they feel; and she was a mother—and they sense.

"Where is your brooch?"

"In Krone's pawnshop."

"Of course you are joking."

The other produced a convincing yellow ticket.

"Here's my verification—this and a delicious roll of filthy lucre. Aren't you proud of me? No? Well, of course not. It was such an easy thing to do—such a jolly thing to do. It takes no nerve at all to walk briskly down a crowded business street, for all the world as though you were on your way to the modiste for a fitting of your new one hundred and sixty dollar gown—make a wild survey for friends—and slip in a crack of a door.

"'Good-morning,' I beamed at the oiled, patois-tongued son of Abraham. 'I want some money.'

"'Yes,' he agreed. 'How much?'

"'Oh,' carelessly, 'forty dollars.'

"'Forty! Hu!' His hands began to move—'We can't.'

"'It is worth many times that amount.'

"'That makes no difference. We can't. Twenty dollar.'

"'I want forty. Examine it.'

"He did. And I hung onto the case with stoical indifference. 'Alright. Forty dollar,' he told me, after a decade or so.

"He moved along the counter to the back of the store. He began counting money. Another man—a human being—placed a pad and pencil for me.

"'Write your name and address, please.'

"I smiled at him.

"'For the Sunday papers?' I asked. And he got it. It was an awful shock. I hadn't supposed that type had soft, receptive tissue for a brain. I thought it was composed literally of cents. But he understood—and smiled—and gave me forty dollars. So here I am, all that money, and an experience to the good."

"To the good?"

"Certainly. Diamonds are a vanity and a weakness anyway."

SHE got through it beautifully, with perfect tone control. But she changed the subject. She had begun to tighten about the throat.

"The fact of so brazenly parading the streets was what bothered me. The sole of my left shoe is about to depart from this world. My skirt is splitting. Heavenly intervention alone saved me from arrest." She laughed. "The police are going to request that I remain indoors."

The forty dollars paid for six little bills, and was gone.

"I found a nickel today," the girl announced gleefully one evening.

Her mother smiled.

"I am afraid that doesn't quite counteract the effect, Madeline. Meyers has put his bill in the hands of an adjusting association. They are to take legal steps if it is not settled by the first."

"I should term it an *un*just association."

Her mother smiled again. Ah, how it hurts to see the lips of a person smile—the eyes ache!

That night the younger woman lay dry-eyed and realized the condition of affairs. That's an unparalleled sensation—realizing one's condition—when it's hopeless. It's unique. Poverty, alone, is an uncomfortable experience. But to have poverty—and pride—and wealthy friends . . .!

She turned over restlessly, and counted the shadows on the wall. She turned again. With one hand she patted the end of her pillow. She turned again.

She awakened suddenly, quietly, as though she had merely closed her eyes for a moment and opened them again. She dressed absently. She had stopped thinking.

"Madeline!"

"Yes?"

"Come down stairs."

She went.

"I have good news for you."

"I don't believe it."

Her mother gave a quick little laughing sob.

"I have just heard from your Uncle Ray. Your Aunt Alice has taken up a new fad—antique furniture. Ray offers me one hundred and fifty dollars for my rosewood set for her birthday."

"That's diplomacy and finance in one, mother. She will be tired of it in six months and give it back to us for Christmas." She patted the balustrade absently, fondly. "And mother, tell him to wire the money—before we starve to death. One hundred and fifty dollars! It's worth eight times as much as it was two years ago." And then, "Merci-

A Nation-wide Revival

THIS is the day of the evangelist. Never has he been in such demand as now, and never has he been more capable of doing real service. Our nation has been stirred to the heart by the great war and the overshadowing religious problems it has presented. Our churches are rousing from their apathy and taking firmer hold of the practical application of the Gospel. In scores of our municipalities a strong campaign is being waged manfully and earnestly against vice and wickedness. It is surely the time of opportunity for the trained spiritual worker to do signal service in the cause of righteousness.

We believe heartily in the evangelist and his task. We know that there are many who still affect to belittle the evangelist, and who have imputed commercial motives to some of the leading workers of that class. But such criticism is the highest kind of compliment. "The devil," says an old proverb, "hates a saint: but he trembles when he sees a sinner at prayer." And the best evidence of the value and utility of evangelistic effort is not merely the wonderful instances of the conversion of such men as John Goode, but rather the fact that, under their ministrations, thousands of the heedless, godless and Christless are awakened and brought under conviction of sin, with the result that they turn right about face and begin the new life. We question whether, in the sight of the Omnipotent, the battle of the evangelists against the forces of sin is not of greater moment to the average community than any other undertaking that invites human cooperation.

All honor to the evangelist! Let not the church hold him too lightly. Rather let it welcome him, with all his warmth and fervor, his passion for souls, his boundless ardor for service. The pastor of today who undervalues the evangelist, or regards him as a disturber of the peace and order of his church, is making a colossal mistake. There are ministers who would shudder at the thought of a pentecostal visitation, and who would be amazed to discover that some soul had been brought under conviction by their own preaching. Religion is not a soothing-syrup, but a soul-arousing fact; indeed, it is the most tremendous fact of our lives.

We are looking forward with hopeful expectation to the coming evangelistic campaign in New York City. Today many thousands are praying that it may produce blessed results, and that multitudes may be won to Christ this spring. If all the forces of prayer throughout this land were to unite in a request for a nation-wide revival during the coming months, and were to look confidently for it, we verily believe that heaven's windows would open and a blessing so full and abundant would come upon us that it would amaze and revivify the whole nation.

Free Speech in the Senate

THE freedom of open debate, which has made the United States Senate "the greatest deliberative body on earth," has again been threatened and again sustained. The very moderate form of cloture to which the Senate has consented is only an empty name conceded to the President—only a bare bone tossed to the yelping jingoes.

From the beginning of this government, the Senate has had unlimited debate. Several times within the Senate itself that rule has been attacked, but it has always withstood. Never before has it been attacked by a President smarting under failure to coerce Congress. Even more than the legislative prerogative of debate has become involved. Congress seems to be expected not only to comply with the presidential behest, but to do so in silence.

The Senate, while making concessions, is doing well in refusing to remove from Congress the last vestige of free, full speech. The House of Representatives, because of its size, was compelled long ago to limit debate. Still remembered is the popular outcry against "Czar" Reed for the further tightening of this rule. In the House, measures secretly framed behind committee doors are rushed through with only the most fragmentary of speeches and without the public knowing what they mean. In the Senate this cannot be done. The Senate has ever been the place for full discussion and deliberate action. There could be no muzzling of a minority. No measure could be passed until every Senator had a chance of speaking once upon it, to say his full mind about it.

To most good things there is, in the course of a century and a quarter, apt to be abuse. But the occasional evil that would be prevented by gagging the Senate is infinitely small in comparison with the great and lasting harm that would be done. It is only at the end of a session that debate can preclude action. The constitutional course of the President is open to him. He can call Congress into special session now, and there would be unlimited time for both debate and action. Once Congress comes together, it will not leave Washington until this whole crisis is passed. And it should be so.

"It is important," said Washington in his Farewell Address, "that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding, in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments, a real despotism. . . . The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern; some of them in our own country, and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them."

The awful war in Europe was precipitated and is kept up because the power to make war was exercised by the heads of governments, in spite of the wishes of the people. The peoples of Europe undeniably yearn for peace today, but the autocratic heads of governments will not let them have it.

This must not become American practice. Public opinion with us must not be suppressed. The people through their Congress must have opportunity to be heard. The war-whoops resounding from Wall Street and the munition factories and screamed in the jingo press must not be permitted to appear as coming from the people. The sovereign people have interests, minds and opinions of their own, securely hedged by the Constitution.

Discussion is the people's truest safeguard. Only autocracy and injustice can suffer from it.

Round About Jerusalem

AS the great war nears its climax in the East, the interest of Bible students throughout the world increases. For many months past, the contending armies have swept the great valleys between the Euphrates and Tigris, successively advancing and receding. At least a portion of the ancient land which Scripture declares to have been the site of Eden, the cradle of the race, has been fought over again and again. Now, the cables bring the news that forces are advancing on Jerusalem from three different directions, the north, the south and the east, and that the hour may not be far distant when the Mohammedans will once more be compelled to defend the Holy City itself. That they are preparing for such an emergency is evident from the news that the railroads connecting Jerusalem with the coast and the interior are to be dismantled, to check the approach of enemy forces.

Meanwhile, students of prophecy are closely following the progress of events in their relation to the revelations of Scripture. Thousands are intently studying those portions that relate to Armageddon, the scene of the conflict described in Rev. 16 : 16. This war has furnished many surprises, and it is among the possibilities that the establishment of a new Jewish state—the dream and hope of the Hebrews ever since the Dispersion—will yet be realized. We are living in days of prophetic fulfilment, and though none can predict the outcome of the present struggle, it is well for all who love the Word to read it diligently and await in patience and hopefulness the final developments, which are in God's hands.

Fathers Will Be Fathers

A KANSAS man complains that since his daughter has taken music lessons, heavily to his expense, she insists upon playing only classical stuff. When he comes home tired and asks for a little tune he gets nothing but musical gymnastics.

The whole feminine end of the family, he thinks, is in a conspiracy to "cultivate" him, and he doesn't want to be cultivated.

It is just like father to make a complaint like that. Father never did take kindly to culture. He sits disconsolate in the draughty kitchen, while daughter's Browning Circle meets in the front room. It is mother's idea entirely that father put on an uncomfortable collar in the evening and hear a symphony concert or a lecture on Borneo or the Elizabethan poets. Father's taste for music stops short at "Shall We Meet Beyond the River?" and he knows nothing about the antipodes or Pre-Raphaelites, and cares less. His art ideas are derived from the illustrated Supplement. He cannot be comfortable in a Louis XVI chair. He cares not a whit for the pottery of the ancient Chaldeans. Shirtsleeves and carpet slippers are his conception of correct evening dress for gentlemen.

There is little progress in cultivating father. There is slight hope that anything permanent can be done for him. When the millenium comes he no doubt will still be found reading his paper, smoking up the window curtains, impeding the advance of culture—and paying the bills.

The Liquor Battle Line

IN the nation's great fight against liquor, the battle-front for the extermination of the saloon exceeds in length even the "far-flung line" of the European conflict. It extends thousands of miles, from the Gulf of Mexico to Canada, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In the great temperance "drive" of the last few months, so many strongholds of the enemy were overwhelmed that ultimate victory is regarded as assured. The next forward movement may give the decisive result which will make the whole continent "dry."

Here is the roll-call of the states as they stand today:

Statutory Prohibition: Arkansas, Alabama, Iowa, South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Mississippi, Georgia, North Carolina, Washington.

Constitutional Prohibition: Maine, Kansas, North Dakota, Oklahoma, West Virginia, Arizona, Colorado, Oregon, Idaho.

States in which Prohibition goes into effect next year: Indiana, Michigan, Montana, Alaska, New Mexico.

One of the greatest stumbling-blocks has been the big cities. In San Francisco the entrenched liquor interests spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in the battle, and that stronghold of the "wets" held out, while practically all the rest of the state gave Prohibition majorities, which, however, were insufficient to counteract the influence of San Francisco. Missouri, also, would doubtless be in the Prohibition column today, but for the overwhelming "wet" vote of St. Louis, which gave 140,900 votes against the abolition of the drink evil in the state. Baltimore was the center of the Maryland fight, and cast a powerful majority against Prohibition, holding the state in the "wet" column. Boston, which has been regarded as a model high license city, was the liquor stronghold which held Massachusetts back from Prohibition. The great "wet" cities have long been and still are the strongest menace to law enforcement, and their influence extends far out into the surrounding districts. Chicago, Milwaukee, Minneapolis and St. Paul proved to be strong "wet" fortresses, and the same may be said in degree of Pittsburg, Cleveland, Cincinnati, New Orleans, Newark, Jersey City, Buffalo, Rochester and Los Angeles. New York City is the strongest of them all.

The great fight of the immediate future will be waged on the big cities, and all the strength of the temperance forces will be needed. But the time is propitious. All over the world the temperance tide is at the flood. In Canada it has swept over whole provinces, and in the United States the successes to date indicate that the liquor power will soon be swept from its last strongholds in the big municipalities.

The Charm in the Smile

A SMILE may be as deep as a well and as wide as a barn door. It may reach clear around and tie in a double bow at the back. But the instant we detect that it is not genuine we detest it. Thereafter, the more there is of it the worse we hate it.

The Volapuk language is nothing new in our age. The smile has always been universal speech. It has ever expressed clearly the simplest, the sweetest, the greatest emotions of the human soul.

Take the smile and its universal significance away from us, and our words would become meaningless, because every one of the human emotions that distinguish man from beast would, like a spring that is walled in, stagnate for want of outlet.

Giggling, of course, is quite another matter. Laughing may be overdone. There is no fool like the one who is cheerful at the wrong time.

The occasional hearty laugh is good, but far better still is the steady sunshine of a smiling heart and face.

Happiness seldom comes as one great moonstone, but rather as a thousand little beads of joy which we string upon the thread of daily duty and opportunity.

Opium Dead and Buried

CHINESE opium, which has been dying for years, will be dead and buried on March 31. Up to the present time the last relic of the opium traffic has been carried on by its importation from India according to a British treaty in 1911. That will cease, and opium, which has killed multitudes, will itself be killed by the Chinese government, and the polluted corpse will be buried amidst the rejoicing and not the mourning of a fourth of the population of the globe. During the three months from September to November last, all the opium plantations of the land were swept away. All trading in the drug was ordered stopped from December, 1916, to March, 1917. All smoking of opium is to cease during the period from March to June, 1917., These were the government orders for the obsequies. A paper says bonfires have been frequent since these orders went into effect, the Chihli Opium Prohibition Bureau at Kalgan conducting one of the most spectacular affairs. A large quantity of opium was gathered together with all the opium-smoking instruments the officials could lay their hands on; invitations were issued, and a delegate from the National Opium Prohibition Union appeared as a witness. The acting president, Mr. An Ming, conducted the ceremonies, which lasted from eight in the morning till one in the afternoon. The civil governor of Chihli, the military governor of Kalgan, the police authorities and citizens from all neighboring sections were among the enthusiastic spectators. And such scenes are being enacted throughout the nation. Opium has been one of the greatest curses of all the centuries, and the crime and scandal of the ages has been that a professedly Christian nation, tempted by a cold love for gold, forced opium on China, as it has forced rum on the weaker races of the world. The people of America, rushing so rapidly toward the national eradication of the drink evil, are in a condition to rejoice with the people of China, who have outstripped us in the complete destruction of opium. God's anger has killed opium, and is killing rum, and is making it easier for him to answer the prayer of his Son: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." (Matt. 6 : 10.)

Saved Praying Amidst Flames

THERE was a fire in a rooming-house in the Harlem district of New York City early the other morning, in which two women were burned to death, a man jumping from a window was killed, and another woman was burned seriously, possibly fatally. In a small storeroom in the center of the top floor the firemen found Miss Nellie Slater, a music teacher, kneeling in prayer beside a trunk. She explained that she fled from her room in the back of the house when she heard the screams of the roomers, and, being unable to descend the stairs, darted into the storeroom. The flames had attacked the rooms on all sides of her retreat, but left the little storeroom unscathed. Those of enthusiastic faith will say that Miss Slater's rescue was a miraculous providence. Others, equally good Christians, will wonder then why God let two of his children, Mrs. Addie Craver and Mrs. Elizabeth Groves, widowed sisters, perish in the flames. The practical lesson of the tragedy is that the top of the red-hot furnace was too close to the wooden floor of the kitchen, and the fatal fire, the result of negligence, was little less than murder. It is likely that Miss Slater put herself in the hands of God for safety, and that she was led to the little storeroom, where the walls of flame were held back from her till the firemen came to get her. When danger and death appear, people instinctively pray. It is well not to wait for emergencies to exercise ourselves in prayer, but to keep in such close touch with Christ that whatever may come, sickness or health, poverty or wealth, death or life, there may be preparation for it. If the rescued music teacher had turned to her Bible she could have greatly appreciated this passage: "When thou walkest through fire, thou shalt not be burned: neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." (Isa. 43 : 2.)

Pension Fund $6,500,000

THE campaign of the Protestant Episcopal Church, begun a year ago, to collect $500,000 as a reserve fund to guarantee pensions to superannuated clergymen, the widows of clergymen, and dependent orphans of deceased clergymen, has just ended with the assurance that more than $6,500,000 has been subscribed. Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts, who has the matter in hand, announced the good news, stating that no spectacular whirlwind campaign had been carried on, but the church of the whole nation had subscribed all the way from two gifts of $250,000 each down to one cent. By this scheme every active clergyman of the Episcopal Church will be eligible to retirement from service at sixty-six, with a minimum pension of $600 a year. Widows of ministers will receive one-half of that amount. In the event of disability, a clergyman will receive a minimum allowance of $600 and a maximum represented by 40 per cent. of his average salary for the five years preceding disability. Dependent orphans of clergymen up to seven years of age will receive $100 a year; those between seven and fourteen will get $200 a year. Bishop Lawrence said the collecting of the fund was the most important enterprise the Episcopal Church had ever undertaken. To the honor of our common Christianity it can be said that a number of denominations are carrying out gigantic plans for this same cause. These pensions are helping to answer this prayer: "Now also when I am old and gray-headed, O God, forsake me not." (Ps. 71 : 18.)

Congressional Distribution of Seeds

A BRANCH of the Agricultural Department of the government at Washington has been very busy in getting the seeds ready for free distribution on orders from the United States senators and congressmen. Young women in the department put packets of seeds in envelopes, five packets to an envelope, the envelopes being conveyed by a moving belt past the bins in which the different seed packets are stored. The girl before each bin places a package in the envelope and at the end of the journey the envelopes are closed with a stapling machine. The Bureau of Plant Industry in the Department of Agriculture has charge of this annual Congressional distribution of seeds, and the members of Congress leave their orders with the Chief of that branch. Each senator and congressman is allowed for free distribution to his constituents vegetable seeds to the amount of 25,000 packages; flower seed, 3,000 packages; lawn grass seed, 30 packages; bulbs, 20 packages. What gardens of exquisite beauty and what a wealth of palatable and nutritious vegetables will spring up from the seed scattered by this Congressional distribution! Reproduction is the law of all life, vegetable, animal, spiritual. Every organism has in it the seed of its successor, to spring up down to the end of time. Christ thus used the planting of seed as a symbol of the scattering of the seeds of Gospel truth to germinate and grow to the harvests: "But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some a hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold." (Matt. 13 : 8.)

Looking Backward 100 Years

THE one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Rev. Philetus Beverly was celebrated at the Methodist Church at Burlingame, Kan., the other Sunday. When it came his time to speak, he said among other things: "I have seen civilization make a paradise out of a supposed wilderness. I can readily recall when we burned pitch pine and tallow candles for light, cooked in a fireplace and traveled only by horseback, canoe or oxteam. I lived when we had little else but the simplest necessaries, few farm tools, no machinery, and none of the luxuries that are now considered necessities. Our clothing was homespun and home-made, we raised our own grain, fruit and vegetables, and killed and cured our own meats, literally eating our own bread in the sweat of our faces, and living happy lives when to live at all was difficult. I am glad to have seen such progress, but sorry my hundredth year is to be celebrated at a time when so much blood is being shed. I hope to live long enough to see world-peace restored." Pastor Beverly's words have all the clearness, vigor, and timeliness that would be expected from a young man of thirty. It is a beautiful picture to see a man grow old so superbly. Those who are threescore years and ten and who had their youth in the frontier states will read with keen interest the old man's description of the pioneer life. Let us all join the patriarch in his prayer that he may live to see the world's peace, and that it may be before the celebration of his one hundred and first birthday. The vein of optimism that runs through the aged minister's talk is delightful. Some old people are sour in themselves and with others, always talking about how much better things were done in olden times than now, and how much better people were then than they are today. Others are like Pastor Beverly, who recognizes progress, the evolution of the desert into the paradise. "Say not thou, what is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this." (Eccles. 7 : 10.)

Trained Steers

THERE is a farmer at West Brookfield, Mass., who has a herd of Guernsey cattle out of which he makes profit, and from which he gets considerable entertainment. He has taken a number of the most intelligent steers in the herd and has taught them to do tricks of one kind and another. He has built a heavy wooden platform with a board a foot wide and about two feet high for the front feet to rest upon. At the proper order the steers take their place, each knowing which is his platform, and they go through certain evolutions. They are taught to roll a barrel around the barnyard by pushing it with the nose, and to do other curious things. Cattle are not as smart as dogs, or horses or elephants. What a great gulf there is between the ox and a human being with an immortal soul capable of limitless cultivation, expansion and progression! The superiority of man to the lower animals is thus expressed: "Ye are of more value than many sparrows." (Matt. 10 : 31.)

Poe's Trifling Compensation

IT is likely that some of Edgar Allan Poe's manuscripts brought good prices, but facts recently brought to light indicate that he sold some of his stories for a mere trifle. He was one of the contributors to Godey's "Lady's Book," which many of the old people of today saw their mothers reading when they were children, and the "Opal," which two publications were edited by Sarah Josepha Hale, a notable lady in her day. Among a collection of autograph letters received by Mrs. Hale that have lately come to light is one from Poe, in which he says: "If you will be so good as to keep open for me the ten pages of which you speak, I will forward you, in two or three days, an article which I will endeavor to adapt to the character of the 'Opal.' The price you mention—fifty cents a page—will be amply sufficient, and I am exceedingly anxious to be ranked in your list of contributors." If Poe were living today, in body as he is in spirit, he could get fifty cents a word instead of fifty cents a page for his manuscripts. One of the strange features in the history of literature is the ridiculously low prices that many of the masterpieces of the world have brought. Of the author as well as the minister it can be said, "The laborer is worthy of his hire." (Luke 10 : 7.)

The Christian's Highest Joy

*A SERMON BY REV. EDGAR DeWITT JONES, D.D.

TEXT—John 15 : 11. "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy may be in you, and that your joy may be made full."

THE note of joy runs like a scarlet ribbon throughout the Bible, especially the New Testament. "Praise ye the Lord!" is on the lips of every saint from Abraham to John. In the great cathedral of the Gospel narrative, joy bells chime continually. In the book of Acts and the Epistles the joyous note rises strong, clear, and jubilant. From Matthew to Revelation, in biography, in history, and in correspondence, the theme of triumphant Christianity may be affirmed in a single sentence: "O be joyful."

The joy bells rang at Jesus' birth. The great keynote of our Lord's Advent was that of joy. Jesus himself was joyful. He spoke with deep emotion of that joy which was his. He has been called the "Man of Sorrows"; more truly he was the "Man of Joy." Medieval art and theology are responsible for the portrait of Jesus as grief-stricken, sorrowful, and mournful of mien. The road our Lord trod upon earth was rugged, and he was a man acquainted with grief. Nevertheless, he was joyful. True, he was not gay or frivolous; yet his being thrilled with a joy that passes all understanding. To his disciples he said, "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy may be in you."

In what did Jesus' joy consist? In three things at least.

JESUS knew the joy of perfect obedience to the Father's will. Obedience to the laws of God results in the sweetest of joys. Obedience to the law of harmony produces melodious music. Obedience to the law of colors brings the loveliest of blends. Obedience to the law of seed time and harvest, the ripest and richest reaping. Obedience to the will of God, the holiest of lives. Such was Jesus' joy. "I do always the things that please the heavenly Father," he said. "I come to do the will of him that sent me," he declared. And in Gethsemane he reached the great height of submission where he could say, "Thy will, not mine, be done." Such obedience brought joy to Jesus, the dutiful Son.

Jesus experienced the joy of intimate fellowship with God. In deepest verity, such fellowship is a fruitage of obedience. How intimate was Jesus' walk with God! He was lonely at times, yet never alone. His was the high joy of Divine companionship it was soul-satisfying, and it was altogether wonderful in its beneficent influence.

Jesus' supreme joy was that of redemptive ministry. Greater joy than this the Divine Son of God could not experience. Reflect on his mighty ministry to mankind: his turning men from darkness to light, his giving sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, speech to the dumb, purity to the impure, wholeness to the sin-broken; and by his death on the cross lifting all humanity, sin-cursed and undone, up to heights of a new creation and reconciliation with the Father. The author of the Hebrew Epistle speaks of Jesus as one who "for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising shame, and hath sat down at the right hand of the throne of God." The writer had in mind the joy of redemption, and that joy Jesus knew in fulness of power. Moreover, he desired that others should have fellowship with him in this joy. In his great high-priestly prayer in John 17, Jesus asked that his disciples might have his joy; he prayed "that they may have my joy made full in themselves."

THIS prayer of Jesus' was answered: the note of joy was in the lives of the early Christians. First century Christians were a joyous company. Think of Paul and Silas in prison at Philippi, their backs cut and bleeding, yet joyfully singing hymns. Think of it! All through the New Testament the note of joy is jubilant and sustained. The apostle speaks of those whom he had won to the Christian life as his joy. Ah, there you have the distinctive Christian joy: Fellowship with Jesus in the redemptive ministry! In the Third Epistle of John the beloved disciple writes, "Greater joy have I none than this: to hear of my children walking in the truth."

In II Cor. 7 : 4, the apostle Paul exclaims, "I overflow with joy in all our affliction." In the seventh verse of Philemon he speaks of his "joy" in the fellowship of Christian faith. Every follower of Christ may know the joy that is his in proportion to the loyalty with which he follows his Lord and Saviour. The note of joy ought to be in the lives of Christian people; the joy of obedience to the will of God; the joy of fellowship with the Father; and, best of all, the joy of Christlike redemptive ministry.

THE highest joy of the Christian is experienced when he becomes a co-laborer with Christ in the redemption of mankind from the bondage of sin. In the tenth chapter of Luke the sending out of the seventy disciples by Jesus is recorded. He sent them out to prepare the way for his coming. He sent them out to heal and bless. He sent them out to blaze a path for the Kingdom. Thus they went forth, two and two, on their mission of mercy. Recall their testimony when they returned: "And the seventy returned with joy, saying, Lord, even the demons are subject unto us in thy name." Oh, the joy of the seventy as they came back to their Lord! Demons had been subject to them in his glorious name: demons of intemperance, demons of covetousness, demons of cruelty, demons of brutal temper, demons of haughty pride. They had witnessed homes delivered from demons that had blighted family life. They had witnessed the demoniac delivered from the terrible bondage of a bedeviled mind. They had witnessed such revolutions, such transformations, that they came back wondrously elated and experiencing a joy they had never known before.

THERE is no joy comparable with that which issues from Christlike ministration. Alas, the church for the greater part today knows little of this joy. We are not members of Christ's church merely to enjoy the fellowship of one another, to listen to inspiring singing or eloquent preaching. They are incidentals. We are banded together as members of Christ's body for the conquest of the world in the ministry of reconciliation. The field is the world. "Go ye into all the world," was Jesus' parting command to his disciples. It is not until one loses himself in the ministry for others that he begins to know the supreme joy of a Christian—the joy that abides forever and ever.

The joy of achievement is notable. To have done something well: to have painted a picture, designed a great building, written a deathless poem—there is a joy in achievement. When Gibbon had finished his monumental work, "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," he tells us of his elation when he had completed the last chapter, the last page, the last line, and the last word. He arose from his table and walked about in the garden strangely moved, singularly elated. And no wonder! But there is a joy greater than the joy of achievement!

The joy of discovery is memorable. What must have been the feeling of Columbus that memorable day when his feet were set for the first time on the soil of San Salvador, and he took the new country in the name of his king! Recently a famous astronomer, Professor Howe of Denver, has described his emotions when he discovered a new star. When he knew of a certainty the truth of his wonderful discovery, and reflected on the fact that his name would be handed down to generations yet unborn as the discoverer of that star, he shouted aloud in the sheer joy of his discovery. But there is a joy nobler than that of discovery!

The joy of relieving pain and ministering to the body is deep and satisfying. In Cleveland, Ohio, I numbered among my friends a celebrated specialist. He was a most likable man, and he was skilful in his profession. One day a singer came to him who had temporarily lost her voice, and was thereby greatly distressed. She could not sing a note. She was in the depths of despair. He performed an exceedingly difficult operation upon her vocal cords. When this was done he asked her to sing the scale. Dubiously she set about it, and lo! when she heard her own voice again she burst into tears of gratitude. When the physician told me of the incident I thought what a joy there is in being able to minister to the body. But there is a higher joy even than this!

THE highest joy, the incomparable joy, is the joy of spiritual recovery, of restoration, of redemption! The highest joy of Jesus was not in the healing of the leper, or giving sight to the blind, or curing the poor woman with the issue of blood—though such healing ministry was wonderful. His highest joy was in his redemptive work which brought about a reconciliation between God and man.

Would you know that joy? You can know it! "He that winneth souls is wise," affirms the author of Proverbs. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever," declares Daniel the prophet. "My brethren, if any among you err from the truth and one convert him, let him know that he that converteth a sinner from the error of his ways shall save a soul from death and shall cover a multitude of sins," admonishes James the Lord's brother.

"Come, we that love the Lord,
   And let our joys be known;
Join in a song with sweet accord,
   And thus surround the throne.

"Let those refuse to sing
   Who never knew our God;
But children of the heavenly King
   May speak their joys abroad."

When He Cometh, Shall He Find Faith?

JESUS closes the parable in Luke, chapter 18, with a vital question: "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" The question manifestly comprehends a definite faith.

When he cometh, shall he find faith in the justice of God, the conviction that the "God of all the earth" shall do right? Faith in the revealed truth that God hears the cries of the distressed, the overburdened, the despoiled, the "laborers whose hire is kept back by fraud," the weak and the ignorant, and every unjustly afflicted soul-faith that God hears, and will surely repay?

Shall Jesus find this faith? We may not believe that he will find it in the hearts of the oppressors, for "he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen," cannot love God whom he hath not seen or regarded or obeyed.

Shall he find this faith in the justice of God in the hearts of the oppressed? Not unless they now submissively pray: "Thy will, O God, be done."

Shall Jesus find faith in the justice of God manifested in permitting the unjust to reap as they have sown? It is written: "God will by no means clear the guilty."

When he cometh, shall the Son of Man find faith in his definite promise, "I will come again?"

Shall he find earnest, expectant hearts, patiently waiting and intently watching for his coming?

If we doubt that he will return to receive to himself all men in whom he finds steadfast faith, we may believe that he lived upon earth, sorrowed and suffered, was scourged and crucified, died and rose again from the dead, and our faith will be of no avail; for we shall be found doubting, not days and deeds and dogmas, but him.

The first promise, the promise of the Father, relates to the coming of the Son into the world of men to conquer their chief enemy, and to be unto them "the resurrection and the life."

The second promise, the deathless word of the Son, assures us that he will come again in power and glory to receive his own—a countless host, born into the "Kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ" through fellowship in his sufferings.

"Pray without ceasing": not mumbled words, not faint prayers symptomatic of faint faith, but pray earnestly out of a heart of love, strengthened and encouraged by the freely spoken word of Jesus:

"I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: let not your heart be troubled: a little while, and ye shall see me." A. L. BELDEN.

Compensations

SUNDAY, March 25. Isa. 27 : 8. "He stayeth his rough wind in the day of the east wind." And therefore, as we say, there is always something to be thankful for. If one thing visits us another thing is kept away. Or if there is impoverishment in one direction there is enlargement in another. When the darkness falls the stars come out. When winter strips the trees hidden prospects are disclosed. When we are sick shy kindnesses steal out of their seclusion. We never knew we had so many friends until death broke our fellowships. And so we are smitten on one side, and we are graciously liberated on another. We are bound with chains, and we have fellowship with angels. We are "cast down, but not destroyed."

It is a blind girl in one of Ian Maclaren's stories who is speaking: "If I dinna' see, there's naebody in the Glen can hear like me. There's no a footstep of a Drumtochty man comes to the door but I ken his name, and there's no voice oot on the road that I canna tell. The birds sing sweeter to me than to onybody else, and I can hear them cheeping in the bushes before they go to sleep. And the flowers smell sweeter to me—the roses and the carnations and the bonny moss rose. Na, na, ye're no to think that I've been ill-treated by my God, for if he didna' give me ae thing, he gave me many things instead."

Such is the confidence we may have in our God. He leads the blind by a way they know not. When they lose their eyes other discernments are quickened, and they have the mystic intimacy of an unerring Guide and Friend. Samuel Rutherford used to say that when he found himself in the cellars of affliction he began to look about for the King's wine. And John Bunyan used to look for the lilies of peace and the Lord's heartsease in the Valley of Humiliation. And out of the eater comes forth meat; the lion which prowls forth to slay us today will provide us with honey tomorrow.

What gracious compensation the Lord is prepared to give to our spirits in our day of desolation and distress! He feeds us with hidden manna. We have bread to eat which the world knows not of. We grow even while we are in straits. "In my distress thou hast enlarged me." That is the wonder of it, that when destruction seemed to abound the soul had a mystic nourishment which established it in a more robust and vigorous health. Hagar was in the wilderness, but the Lord opened a fountain of water. In desert places angels come and minister unto us. "He stayeth his rough wind in the day of the east wind." He giveth songs in the night. J. H. J.

The Tumult of God's Enemies

MONDAY, March 26. Ps. 83 : 2. "For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult: and they that hate thee have lifted up the head." God has his friends on earth. They are such as do his will. He has also his enemies. They are such as obstruct his will. There are those who not only refuse to do God's will but who hinder others who would do his will. These are God's enemies. Sometimes they are silent, but often they work in the open and make a great tumult. Have we never noticed how much tumult one discordant instrument in an orchestra may cause? Observe the tumult occasioned by one false Christian or by one belligerent unbeliever. Error is generally more tumultuous than truth. It must be so, for error's time is short. A dozen men who do not believe are more conspicuous than a thousand who do. Let us not forget, however, that the greatest forces are silent. Day dawns noiselessly. Spring steals upon us silently. Great movements often have their birth unknown of men. The kingdom of heaven cometh without observation.

The best way to meet the tumult of irreligion is to enter into the calmness of strong faith, and to lead a loyal life of faith. The tumult will die away, the earthquake, wind and fire will vanish, and God's still small voice will speak to men with power the thunder never had. C. C. A.

Behold My Servant

TUESDAY, March 27. Matt. 12 : 18. "Behold my Servant, whom I have chosen; my Beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: I will put my Spirit upon him, and he shall shew judgment to the Gentiles." In these words Matthew cites a text that was nearly eight hundred years old at the time. Thus God had through Isaiah directed the attention of his chosen people to the course which events would take in the days of Christ—for he is the "Servant" here intended. The noblest of the Jews, exalted in the pride of their heart, would spurn the teaching and helpful service of Christ, and he would then carry his merciful ministry to the very lowest strata of Jewish society; yea, he would actually go into pagan regions and cause castaways to see what people who thought they were living nearest the heart of God refused to see. The matchless love of the Father in heaven, who had determined to make a sacrifice of his Son, the object of his tenderest affection, in order to reclaim wayward men from perdition, would be appreciated by Gentiles when the elect race would be seen to despise it.

When these things would come to pass, the Gentiles would be apprised of a "judgment" of God concerning them. What a strange judgment! A judgment not prompted by righteous anger and meting out just retribution to malefactors, but turned into a visitation of compassionate love that stoops to the lowly, binding up the broken reed and kindling the smoking flax into new flame, creating life out of very death and filling the sin-darkened chambers of the heart with the light of the knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

Behold my Servant! Hear him declare my judgment! This call is still issued to millions who consider themselves shut out from God's thought and care. If any desire a convincing proof of the love of God for them, let them study Jesus, anointed with the Holy Ghost and power, whom God has sent to save sinners. W. H. T. D.

Remember Him with Your Heart

WEDNESDAY, March 28. II Tim. 2 : 8, R. V. "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead." When you remember our Lord at the Holy Communion as he has commanded, you are also to remember him everywhere else in life. Whatsoever you do or think, make all your being a communion memorial of his glory.

The last words Paul ever wrote were his letters to Timothy, when he said, as his final commission to his beloved young friend, "Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead." Don't for a moment forget him who lived, suffered, died and rose again for you and is alive forever more. The least you can do is to remember, with all your heart's deepest affection, him who bore the cross for you.

Paul was not ashamed to remember Jesus Christ crucified, to preach peace through his blood, power by his cross, immortality by his resurrection, and heavenly mansions not made with hands, wrought by everlasting love.

No wonder the apostle said, "Remember, Timothy, to endure hardness as a good soldier, when you think of Jesus, how he endured the cross, despising the shame, for you."

When you have preached the Word—the whole Gospel—when you have fought the good fight, finished your course, the Enoch chariot, the Elijah chariot, the Christ chariot, will swing low for you to go sweeping through the gates, washed in the precious blood of Jesus. Then you will have your reward, your coronation day, when a crown of glory will be yours, which the Lord will give to all who remember him and love his appearing. E. W. C.

The Undiscouraged God

THURSDAY, March 29. Isa. 42 : 4. "He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth; and the isles shall wait for his law." There is a variety of cactus called the century plant. It grows a very unattractive stalk, with blades like spears, and spikes like bayonets. Thus it grows, if not for a hundred years, for a long time, for more than a generation, and then fulfils its long-delayed promise by breaking into bloom. A visitor said to an English gardener who was taking care of such a plant, "Has it ever bloomed for you?" He replied, "No, I have never seen it bloom, and I shall never see it bloom; but my son may. My father took care of it thirty years, and it is now thirty years since I began to work here. My son is my assistant and will be my successor. I think he will see it bloom." Suppose we had a tree of such a nature as to take twenty centuries to bud, and thirty centuries to bloom, and forty or fifty centuries to bring forth fruit. Should we pronounce it a failure when it first begins to put forth its tender leaves? It is not a failure so long as it lives and grows. Whatever may have been in the prophet's mind when he wrote of the undiscouraged God, we believe that through him the prophetic Spirit spoke of Christ, and that his words apply to Christ as to no other. It is clear the long historic process was in the mind of God when he sent his Son into the world. He knew there must be travail, pain, delay, distress, but he knew there shall be also satisfaction. "He shall not fail." The success or failure of Christianity must be judged with reference to its methods as well as to its ends. The kingdom of God is not a building but a growth. The stones that enter into the slowly rising temple of a redeemed humanity are living stones. Not yet is the judgment of God established in the earth, but the isles are waiting for his law. This much of the prophecy has been fulfilled. How soon the rest of it comes true depends largely upon the measure of our fidelity. C. C. A.

Workers Together with God

FRIDAY, March 30. II. Cor. 6 : 1. "We then, as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain." This text exhibits the essential features of the Christian ministry. Ministers are workers together with God, with Christ. They are agents through whom a Greater than themselves chooses to work. All their qualities must be at God's service, and must be merged in their great calling. They never wield a greater and more beneficial influence than when they approach men upon the authority which God has commissioned them to exercise as his fellow workers. Ministers bring to men the grace of God, for from them men are to "receive" it. They do not only tell men "By grace are ye saved!" but through their faithful service the divine influences of grace are imparted to the lives of their hearers. Their whole activity aims at making grace the ruling principle in the conduct of men. This means that evangelical ministers lead men to act, not upon purely human and natural, but upon spiritual and divine impulses. The method which a minister of the Gospel pursues is expressed by the word "beseech," which means as much as "exhort." In the work of the Christian ministry no external force of any kind is employed. Not by flattery or intimidation, not by bribes or coercive measures, but by the cordial pleading of a sincere heart and by plain arguments of Scripture does the Christian minister seek to achieve the purposes of divine grace in his hearers. Last, but not least, the Christian minister is full of loving concern for the genuineness and permanency of those effects which his work is to produce in his people. He knows that the grace of God may be received in vain. There may be only the pretense of faith; or a relapse from a state of grace may occur, when the hearers do not really quit their sins, or begin to love them again. Hence the tender warning in our text. Such ministers deserve to be esteemed very highly in love for their work's sake. W. H. T. D.

The Meaning of Communion

SATURDAY, March 31. I Cor. 11 : 24. "This do in remembrance of me." Our Lord does not need our loving remembrance to increase his power, glory and kingly rule. We cannot add anything to his infinity. If we should forget to remember him, the King in his beauty will shine on forever just the same. We may decline his invitation to the Holy Supper, never putting a crumb of bread to our lips in remembrance of him, but he will be the same yesterday, today and forever. We may increase his joy by our coming, but nothing can affect the character of the unchangeable Christ.

The blessedness of the remembrance of Jesus is nearly all on our side. Eating and drinking at his table, we have fellowship and friendship with one who sticketh closer than a brother. A believing, trusting remembrance appropriates his shed blood for cleansing our sin away and puts his crimson signature to the promises to pay all penalties against the soul and to provide all blessings for keeping, guiding and saving. This supper commemorates the victories of his death and the triumphs of his resurrection.

We are to observe this communion memorial till he comes again. He may come tomorrow or today, while we assemble. As a family would have a vacant chair at the table for an expectant son, so we wait and look at every communion for his coming. In the fulness of time he will come and take us with him to the heavenly feast.

"For thee the burning thirst,
The shame, the mortal strife,
The broken heart, the side transpierced;
To us the Bread of Life!"

A Christian University for Japan

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

IN all Japan there is not a single mission school for boys or men which, so far as secular education goes, surpasses the government schools of like grade. Some Christian educators have modestly admitted that their schools are as good as the government schools, but in general not even this can be said.

Yet at a time when the existing schools, which must be retained as feeders, are below the government standard as far as secular education is concerned, there is much talk of a Christian university for Japan. If the Christian University is to be inferior in secular education to the Imperial Universities and private universities now existing, it might better not exist, so far as secular education is concerned. A second-rate school is not a credit to America or to Christianity. I am told that the annual expenditure at the Imperial University at Tokyo amounts to $1,500,000, and no Christian University can better the education there offered in an equal number of branches for a smaller expenditure.

A BIG mistake is made by givers in considering all mission fields alike. Japan is the key to the Orient. A Christian Japan would ultimately mean a Christian East. Japan is wide open to the Gospel, and Christian opportunities there are many and promising. There is nothing that the Christian cause in Japan needs at the present time more than an up-to-date, undenominational, Christian University. But the Japanese government system of education at present is, in most cases at least, superior to the existing mission schools, and an outlay such as would mean luxury in Turkey or China would accomplish little in Japanese higher education for men.

Every mission school I have seen is doing a helpful work, and the moral character and trustworthiness of their graduates has been attested by leading men of all religions. Christian progress in Japan would suffer a serious setback if any of the leading mission schools were abandoned. They are making first-rate men out of second-rate material, for the best students, Christian or non-Christian, will enter the Imperial University and other superior government schools if they can gain admission. Every one of these Christian schools is worth while, but all of them ought to be better, if they are to compete with Japanese schools.

America makes the mistake of sending out college graduates to teach in mission schools, while in Japan an instructor must spend years in postgraduate work abroad before he is considered fit to become a professor in the Imperial University. Given twenty million dollars to found a Christian university tomorrow, and it would take ten years, which would be time well spent, to enlist a proper faculty. Even then, many of the professors would have to be chosen from among non-Christian educators. Money will buy bricks, but it will not always buy brains; and Japan is one of these aspiring but poor countries that are impressed by brains but not by bricks. There are not ten really fine educational buildings in Japan; but among her educators Japan numbers many men who, as professors in American or English universities, have won an enviable reputation.

A few of these men are Christians, working in a non-religious environment, and hence robbed of much of their usefulness. Yet, almost to a man, these Christian professors rise above denominationalism and sectarianism, and cannot be obtained for existing mission schools. They would gladly work in an undenominational college or university, if such a school existed; but they would demand freedom from denominational interference before they would accept a position.

THE Christian University, if it ever comes, will have to be such an institution as cannot be inaugurated or supported by missionary assessments in the churches, either from the standpoint of the amount of money needed or provincial sectarianism on the part of the givers. Japan needs a Syrian Protestant College or a Roberts College, undenominational, but dominant as an educational force.

THE fact that the Japanese insist on being rulers in their own land is a hopeful sign. The fact that second-rate mission schools, most of them under Japanese administration, are turning out leaders who rise higher than Imperial University graduates by sheer force of Christian independence and determination, is a thought-compelling commentary on the power of Christ to give the abundant life to his followers, of whatever race. But there is no doubt that less money is coming into Japan for the very reason that the American members of the faculty or the board have to take a secondary place in the affairs of the school.

Japanese egotism has caused much trouble and misunderstanding. It has doubtless also caused much progress. In Turkey, the young men from Armenia, Persia, Syria and Egypt dare not call their souls their own. Nationalism in the Syrian Protestant College has to give way to international brotherhood, and no matter how much emphasis is laid on the development of the individual talent for leadership in those small lands which are denied nationalism by the powers not of heaven but of Europe, there is little hope that the young graduate can ever really lead his nation to better things. England, Russia or France will dominate his life. Japan, thanks to the anti-foreign movement, has saved her nationalism and independence; and methods similar to those used in Turkey or China do not apply. If unity and strength come to China or Turkey, conditions there will become similar. While we exclude the yellow men from America, we cannot hope eternally to dominate their souls at home. Christian money, sent to Japan, will be administered by the ones for whose use it is given, teaching democracy and not autocracy in a land which denies foreign domination in all things.

DR. PETTEE, who has done a noble work for Japan, had to keep tight hold of himself when he saw the Japanese doing things the wrong way, but he knew that the best plan was to let them find out for themselves; and the strength of the Japanese Christians of today is the result not of hot-house methods but of hardy fighting. The Bible is proving its usefulness as a character-builder, even in "heathen" Japan, and it may some day be generally used as a text-book in morals. But there is no more chance that Japanese government schools will adopt Christianity than that they will adopt Buddhism.

The excellence of Christian schools has caused them to be given privileges that are illegal, if one judges by the letter of the law. The president of one of the largest Christian schools in Japan told me that his school exists simply through the favor of the government, and that it is below the government standard in several things. Because Christian schools are making men, they are allowed unusual privileges. If they cease to make strong men, their lives as Christian schools can be snuffed out like a drooping candle.

The Christian movement in Japan has need of many more Christians well educated in the best schools. Dr. Wainright, who knows more about Christian literature in Japan than any one else, says that the work of the Christian Literature Society is hampered by the lack of highly educated men among the Christians, and adds that a Christian University is a necessity, if the great work of the Christian Literature Society in a literate land is to go on with the best results. Christianity in Japan needs more than rugged character. It needs broad scholarship, such as existing mission schools cannot supply.

First. Existing mission schools in Japan should be brought up to the government standard, irrespective of cost or time, or else dropped.

Second. Christian influences and evangelistic efforts must reach a larger number of university men in a natural, direct way, and not by the devious path of geography, political economy and physical culture. Japan is open to the direct appeal of Christianity, where it is not open to the indirect appeal of Christian education.

Third. Men of wealth in America must invest several millions in a Christian University which will be under Japanese management, and in which direct Christian work cannot be carried on as part of the curriculum, but whose faculty may be Christian, whose Y. M. C. A. may be as active as desired, and whose scholarship in strictly academic lines, confined to certain branches, will surpass anything that non-Christian Japan can offer.

THE Congregationalists, though sixth in the list of educational agencies, have concentrated their attention on one college, which is today the best Christian school in Japan. The Methodists come next with Aoyama and Kwansei, the next best Christian mission schools in the empire. The Presbyterians have two good mission schools, and the Episcopalians one, which may be largely developed through late grants, and which aspires to become a university in Japan at a total cost two-thirds that of the annual expenditure for the Imperial University at Tokyo. The Baptists have nothing, having done away with a school which was second-rate for several years.

Several of these schools are now getting large amounts from their alumni and are strengthening their staffs and courses. They may become excellent denominational colleges, corresponding to Albion, Kalamazoo and Olivet in my home state. Their religious life is strong, their graduates most useful men, and their place in Japanese thought is already secured. Earnest support of these schools, together with a curbing of any desire to make them universities, will make them not only efficient training-schools for Christians, but superior in scholarship and equipment to the corresponding non-Christian schools. In spite of the government provisions for education in Japan, there is a place and a need for these schools; and the attitude toward Christianity in Japan is now so friendly that legitimate religious exercises in these schools will not be interfered with, any more than they are in denominational colleges in America.

Religious influences in the existing non-Christian institutions can be greatly strengthened. There is a great need for properly managed hostels or dormitories, and these homes for out-of-town pupils can not only be made practically self-supporting, but strong centers of Christian life and thought as an integral part of the great universities.

The Y. M. C. A. has just opened a beautiful building opposite the Imperial University, which will not only be a Christian home for young men but a Christian meeting-place for their friends. At Waseda University there is another home for earnest young men which I visited on two occasions, and in which a strong Christian spirit is manifest. This hostel is in charge of Mr. Benninghoff, a strong Christian missionary, supported by the Baptists; and the open-mindedness of Waseda toward matters of spiritual interest may be in part due to his presence on the faculty, where he uses the Bible as a text-book in a class in religious history, and where the prestige he gains as a recognized professor in Marquis Okuma's big university of ten thousand students makes it possible for him to conduct a wide campaign of morality and spiritual betterment among the young men.

Mr. Benninghoff also supervises another hostel on his own grounds, which is a prominent meeting

Christ, as the Saviour not only of men but of man — not only of souls but of society. As a Burden-bearer and Comforter Christ has proved his priceless worth. As the great Example for a nation's thinking and action, he is gaining strength. Christian leaders must be able not only to evangelize the masses, but to win the political, commercial and intellectual leaders of Japan. They cannot do this as long as Christian schools are recognized by every ambitious boy as inferior to government schools.

AS for the Christian University for men, the subject is less live than it was some months ago. It seems evident that a strong school can never be founded as an interdenominational school, supported by mission boards. This is a time when each denomination is working hard for number one, trying to bring its own institutions up to a better standard and enlisting the enthusiasm and support of its alumni. A single alumnus of Aoyama has promised enough for a fine building there, and four buildings will soon be in the course of construction at the Methodist school. Rikkyo is planning a big new plant in the suburbs of Tokyo. Founded earlier than the schools in China, the mission schools in Japan are denominational rather than union, and they will be limited in size to the support of the denomination and the gifts of alumni.

If broad-minded Christians, with wealth, can become sufficiently interested in the value of Christianity to a nation that is struggling for spiritual and moral life, at the same time that it is dominating the political situation in the Far East, a Christian University may be founded and Christian professors may be secured. But the drawbacks are many, and only by unusual faith and generosity will such a school be established. Without it, Christianity in Japan must ever suffer from a dearth of well-trained men, and the life of Japan will not free itself from the superstition and indifference to moral issues which now hold it.

In female education, plans for a Christian university for women are progressing rapidly, and the morale of the Japanese men may soon be strengthened by the enlightening influence of the intelligent, womanly woman. There is little competition in this line, and a big opportunity is at hand to secure for many years the dominating place in woman's education in Japan for a Christian institution. This is the opportunity the friends of male education once had, and lost through denominational differences.

If American Christians are willing to support Christ in Japan, the good that may be done cannot be computed. The Japanese Christians are exerting an influence for righteousness utterly incommensurate with their numbers and talents. The nation listens gladly to the Christian message, and the progress of the Christian movement is impeded only by the lack of funds and trained workers. Theological graduates without college or university training can win the masses. But the need today in Japan is a place for place and home for Christian students. The possibilities of active helpfulness in the existing educational systems at this time of open desire for Christian knowledge have hardly been touched. Every university man is as open to Christian appeal as is his fellow student in Cornell, Michigan or Harvard, and this means of winning educated men to the cause of Christ, at a period in their lives when they most need Christian guidance, is one which will be increasingly used by mission bodies in Japan.

The girls at Nippon Women's University are learning chemistry with the aid of complete equipment

THE two million dollars invested in mission school property in Japan has provided for 160 kindergartens, averaging 50 children; 89 elementary schools, averaging 125 pupils; 68 middle schools, averaging 200 pupils; 11 colleges, averaging 100 students; 5 normal training schools, averaging 40 intending teachers; FORTY-ONE theological and Bible training schools, averaging TWENTY-FOUR pupils; 35 hostels; 18 industrial training institutions, and 20 orphanages, in all of which more than 21,000 persons are under first-class Christian instruction and second class secular instruction, as far as male students are concerned, at a total cost last year to the Japanese of $93,294 and to foreign mission bodies of $245,371.

For the money expended there are plenty of schools. In Tokyo there are mission schools enough to keep five thousand Viscount Kanekos guessing as to whether they should become Methodists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, Roman Catholics or Congregationalists.

At the rate of twelve thousand souls a year, Japan will become Christian at some period indefinitely remote. Twenty-one thousand persons under Christian instruction would be an admirable record, if it were not pitifully small among the millions of scholars of Japan. And even the small amount of a quarter million a year, if intelligently spent on a union educational system that was superior to anything the Japanese could offer, would be a tremendous force in the Christianization of the social order in Japan.

Charlotte Russe and—Bread

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

"IF you had to eat just one thing for the rest of your life, what would you choose?" asked Betty. Betty is ten and eating is one of the greatest interests in her young life.

Marian—ten also—hesitated before answering. And then, after a moment of really deep thought, she spoke.

"I think that I'd choose ice cream," she said, half hesitatingly. "Rich frozen ice cream, all smooth and—"

Betty interrupted. Betty always interrupts.

"I wouldn't," she said. "I'd choose charlotte russes—great big ones made of sponge-cake, and whipped cream, and chocolate frosting. That's what I'd choose!"

Betty's Aunt Alice had entered the room while the two little girls were talking. She is a favorite with young people, is Aunt Alice, because she can always understand their point of view.

"What were you talking about?" she questioned.

"I was asking Marian," said Betty, "what she'd choose if she could only have one thing to eat for the rest of her life. She said she'd choose ice cream. I said that I'd choose charlotte russe. What would you choose, Aunt Alice?"

Aunt Alice laughed. "Why," she answered, "I think I'd choose bread and butter!"

Betty and Marian looked at their grown-up friend and confidante with round-eyed amazement. What a thing to choose! Why, anybody could have bread and butter at any time—and ice cream and charlotte russe were—treats.

"I don't guess I understand," said Betty at last. "I don't see why you'd choose bread and butter; it's so plain!"

"That's why I'd choose it," said Aunt Alice. "You see," she went on after a moment, "it isn't always the sweetest food that is the very best for one. And it isn't always the sweetest food that you'll want. Something that's sweet, always sweet, changelessly sweet, gets very tiresome after a while. And it's the plain, substantial food that you can stand day after day. Thank you, girls," laughed Aunt Alice, "but I guess I'd better keep to my choice of bread and butter."

BREAD and butter doesn't sound very interesting—particularly when every recipe book is full of colored illustrations of pretty desserts and delicate salads and tempting entrées. But for a day-after-day diet any one of the elaborate dishes would grow monotonous, and sickening, and insipid. As a day-after-day diet, plain, simple, wholesome bread and butter would not grow tiresome; would not lose its food value.

I met two girls one day at a luncheon party. One, I thought, was the prettiest girl I had ever seen. Her long-lashed eyes were of the violet color one reads about in stories, and her hair was tinged with the misty black of midnight. She entertained us—there were a number of us at the table—with witty little stories and cleverly told experiences.

The other girl was not a pretty girl. But she was an understanding sort of a girl who laughed at the right time, and said a kind word to the one who was momentarily left out of the conversation—a girl who listened as if she understood and was interested. I didn't much notice what she looked like, except that there was understanding in her eyes, and her hair was neatly dressed, and her smile sweet. I didn't notice her much, because I was too taken up with the other girl's conversation—too fascinated by her beauty.

I met the two girls about a week later. The first girl was still as faultlessly perfect to look at. But her funny little stories and her cleverly told experiences were the same ones that I had heard several days before.

The second girl became interested in our conversation and expressed an idea or two that made known to me the brilliant brain under her neatly dressed hair. I began to like the second girl.

The third time I met them the first girl was still wonderful to look at. But her chatter had come to bore me. It was so light and frothy and commonplace. It was clever, but it had no depth or meaning. But the second girl impressed me so much with the power of her mind that I forgot that in looks she was not striking.

On our fourth meeting I discovered that it was tiresome, almost, to look at the first girl, because there was nothing back of her beauty. But I discovered that I wanted the quiet, plain, substantial second girl for my friend!

ONCE when I was a small child I was given a large box of chocolate creams as a birthday gift. I had never been allowed to eat my fill of candy, and so that day I sat down, the box on my lap, and ate until I could eat no more. The next day I was very ill.

It was a week after I had recovered my health that some kind friend offered me a chocolate cream. But when I saw it I turned away my head, nauseated at the thought of eating it. It was, I think, a couple of years before I ate another chocolate. Even now there are times when I remember the day when I, for the first time, was allowed to have all the candy I could eat. The memory is still a very bitter one.

Aunt Alice was wise when she told Betty and Marian that her choice would be bread and butter. And if Betty and Marian had been forced to eat nothing but charlotte russe and ice cream they would have grown very tired of their bargain. They would have been unable to look at ice cream or charlotte russe without shuddering.

But bread—bread, they tell us, is the staff of life. It is wholesome, and substantial, and good for one—just as some people are wholesome, and substantial, and good for one.

Look over the list of your acquaintances and see for yourselves how many of them are like bread, and how many are like charlotte russe. See how many of them are really good for you and how many aren't. Decide whether you could stand seeing them day after day, talking with them day after day, looking at them day after day. If they will stand that test they are worth making friends of—worth patterning your own ideas and ideals after. If they are like that they're like bread—bread, which is the staff of life.

But there are some people who are beautiful to look at, who have no more substance than the whipped cream and chocolate frosting that go to make up a charlotte russe. People who are pleasant, when taken in small quantites and not very often, but who are—as a steady thing—mentally indigestible. And, when you really know them, these people are the sort who make you appreciate how really wonderful the bread people are.

Oh, friends of mine, don't let yourselves be deceived, by an ornamental appearance and surface sweetness, into passing by the plain but substantial things of life. A charlotte russe is better to look at than a loaf of bread, but it becomes tiresome if one gets it too often.

Questions and Answers

E. W., Chicago, Ill. Please explain "There be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his Kingdom."

Several explanations are possible: 1. That Christ referred to his coming after the resurrection, and all of them except Judas lived to see that. 2. The day of Pentecost, but this is open to the same objection. 3. The destruction of Jerusalem, which ended the old dispensation. All these are problematic. The meaning no doubt is "till they see the Kingdom of God come with power" (Mark 9:1) and "till they see the Kingdom of God" (Luke 9 : 27). Christ is without question referring to the firm establishment, in the lifetime of some of those present, of that new Kingdom of Christ which was destined to work the greatest changes on earth, and to be the pledge of his final coming in glory. This is the accepted theory of prominent commentators.

A Subscriber, Jordan, Minn. Are we to understand that the conditions found by Jesus in the temple (John 2 : 14–16) were the prevailing conditions?

Yes. Under the ceremonial law of sacrifice as refined by the elders and priests, it became necessary to have animals without blemish. "To deal in such then became a necessity, and where would such dealers congregate but near the temple? Through the cupidity of the priests they were allowed into the temple itself. At what period the practice began is not stated, but some have supposed that the last words of Zechariah (14 : 21) refer to a similar practice, when he says, 'In that day there shall be no more the trafficker in the house of the Lord of hosts.' As it was with the cattle-dealers, so also with the money-changers. They flourished because the annual tribute to the temple could only be paid in the half shekel of the sanctuary. All who came from other lands, or who did not have the exact change, as we say nowadays, had to get it from the money-changers, who (as we learn from the Talmud) did their business in the temple."

W. S. O., Wayne, Calif. In the light of John 10 : 27, 28, could Paul have lost eternal life (I Cor. 9 : 27)?

Without going into your main question, as that is controversial, we would only say here that Paul never had any doubt as to his own salvation. When he speaks of subjecting his body to discipline, lest it lead him to become a castaway, he speaks of doing something that is worth while doing, because the end is worth while. God had given him the call to work out his own salvation with fear and trembling, and he was enabled to do this because God worked in him both the will and the work.

Inquirer. Without getting into a controversial topic, we can say enough here to assure you that God is no Moloch, neither is he unkind. He who gives the universal call to repentance, forgiveness and acceptance, also gives the ability to accept it.

J. H. J., Wolf, Ky. Why did Nicodemus come to Jesus at night?

If you compare John 3 : 2 with 19 : 38, you will probably conclude, as have commentators, that the reason why Nicodemus came to Jesus at night, and why Joseph of Arimathea was a disciple in secret, will be found in the fear they had of their fellow Jews. It was a brave thing to be a follower of Christ. Social ostracism, commercial ruin, personal and family inconveniences and danger were the lot of those who openly declared themselves. Not all men are constituted alike, and hence many, like Nicodemus and Joseph, were afraid to come out into the open. Human nature has not changed much. Too many today are afraid to stand by their Christian guns when danger lurks.

Reader. Please explain Matt. 5 : 22.

There would seem to be here a rather severe punishment meted out to one who merely uses a disrespectful and contemptuous term. To quibble about the meaning of words is to lose sight of the underlying significance of all of Christ's teachings. In using the word "fool," he no doubt merely "seized on the then current phraseology of unholy disrespect and contempt, merely to express and condemn the different degrees of such feeling when brought out in words, as he had immediately before condemned the feeling itself." What Christ is teaching is the wrong in the feeling of resentment toward a brother. For ages the Jews had been taught that the commandment in question is broken only by the murderer, the slayer of his brother. In keeping now with all his teaching, namely, the spiritual interpretation of the law, he shows that any hard feeling toward a brother, even though it only results in calling him a fool, is wrong.

D. G., Owego, N. Y., writes: "I have watched your comments on the high cost of living, and was much interested in E. W. Herbert's article on 'Fair Play to the Producer.'" D. G. suggests that those "back-to-the-farm" fellows might easily find a chance on a farm that would satisfy them. In his own immediate section he says there is more land than the farmers can work, and it is extremely difficult to get workers. He has three sets of buildings on his farm, with almost no workers, and yet it is only seven hours out of New York.

J. N. F., Cedarville, Wis. As we have frequently stated, there are many excellent Christian people who, having been reared in Christian homes, were so thoroughly surrounded by religious influences in childhood that they might be said to have been believers all their lives. This is the outcome of ideal Christian training. They might even have no remembrance of a time when they were not believers, and no impression of any special change, although conscious of steady growth in the spiritual life. Yet there usually comes a time when the desire for more thorough consecration and more definite service makes itself felt, and such a point marks the true spiritual awakening. In a large number of cases the convert finds seclusion with God the only satisfying way to get his new spiritual bearings. By such natures the great battle must be fought out alone. Others find their best aid to spiritual growth in association with God's people, in sharing their Christian activities, and in personally entering, as far as opportunities permit, on a life of active service. Every day spent in such work widens our horizon and strengthens our faith. However small our means or humble our station, we can still find opportunities for service. We recall the case of a poor shut-in, whose waking hours were spent in continuous service for others, and whose beautiful life was the means of brightening a multitude of others and winning many souls to Christ.

L. J., Deshler, Ohio. 1. The whole question of heathen salvation is one concerning which no man has a right to dogmatize. It should be left in God's hands. 2. It is needless to dispute about the figurative language employed in the prophecies. Figurative speech is characteristic of the Jewish writers. 3. Rom. 11 : 11 means that whereas the salvation of the Gentiles was the immediate purpose, there was a further design, namely, bringing about the final salvation of the Jews by stirring them up to zeal or jealousy by the example set by the Gentiles. 4. In I Cor. 3 : 13–15, Paul is teaching the old doctrine of the necessity for having our Christian attainments of a character that will resist the fire of the last day, namely, deeply rooted and of the right sort that can stand the glare and heat of a thorough investigation. If they are of the consistency of chaff, hay and stubble, easily inflammable and little lasting, they will of course be burnt away. If, however, they are built of incombustible materials and on the right and true foundation, they will survive.

X. Y. Z. Please explain Gal. 6 : 2 and 5.

There is no contradiction in these two verses. Bear ye one another's burdens, troubles, errors, cares and infirmities is an injunction directed to all Christians who would follow the Master's lead of being helpful and loving to their fellow men. Those who bear their own burdens well are best able to sympathize and bear with other burden-bearers, and the apostle in verse 5 recognizes this and advises accordingly.

Reader, St. Mary's, Ontario. We regard the fourth chapter of James's Epistle as the best characterization of war for Christians to study today. If the world were God-fearing and if men prayed and trusted him, their quarrels and contentions would soon cease. War at best is an unmixed evil, and the fame which the world gives to its great warriors is one that can bring no happiness, but only life-long regrets.

J. E. M., Brundage, Texas. Is there any proof of Nicodemus becoming a disciple or believer in the Lord Jesus? Two in our Bible class think that he was not.

There is a tradition that, after the resurrection, Nicodemus overcame his timidity and became an avowed disciple, receiving baptism at the hands of Peter and John. There is a further story, the authentication of which is uncertain, however, to the effect that the Jews, in revenge for his conversion, deprived him of office, beat him and drove him out of Jerusalem, and that Gamaliel, his kinsman, gave him shelter in a country house, where he died. He is said to have been buried by Gamaliel near the grave of Stephen, the first martyr.

Reader, Honea Path, S. C. Some one has said that dreams are at times the symbolization of our waking thoughts. Your experience conveyed a beautiful lesson, from which you seem to have drawn the right conclusion.

Mrs. J. S., Kalispell, Mont. We are distinctly told in Matt. 24 : 36 and 25 : 13 that the time of these things (the fulfilment of certain prophecies) no man knoweth. Human wisdom has proved unavailing whenever it has attempted to fix dates and "times" for the events foretold. The attitude of the Christian is to live in a state of preparation, so that, come when it may, he will be found faithful and ready.

Mr. A. B. King, assistant to the president of Middlebury College, Vermont, sends this very interesting paragraph, which was printed in the college publication eighty-seven years ago: "The first Sabbath school established in this region, and, so far as is known, the first started in New England, commenced in the village of Middlebury at the suggestion and by the aid of students of the college. It was in 1815, soon after the establishment of schools in Philadelphia, and the students of Princeton College became acquainted with and interested in this system of Bible instruction for children, and wrote on the subject to the Philadelphian Society of Middlebury College. Rev. Mr. Bingham and Rev. Mr. Root (then both members of Middlebury College) interested themselves in the matter, and two schools were soon in operation, one of which for some time kept in the kitchen of a pious lady in the east part of the village, and another in a building now occupied as a store in the western part."

H. W. B., Bradford, Pa. Are "kneeling," as told in Dan. 6 : 10, and "falling on his face to worship" synonymous terms?

Falling on his face implies complete prostration—throwing himself down in utter abasement. The prostration which means anything at all is of the spirit, not merely of the body. The soul that truly bows down before the Lord is not conscious of what the body is doing, nor does it matter.

R. L. B., Cumming, Ga. Is prayer a special calling to a special few, or is it the privilege of all Christians? Should women pray in public?

Prayer is not only the privilege of all Christians, but it is their duty and should be their joy. Not all care to, or can, pray alike. Some very good Christians cannot pray in public. It is with women as with men; they should pray in public if they can. Most people, perhaps, find their own greatest help in secret prayer; but prayer in public may be a help to others, too.

J. A. H., Emmett, Idaho. 1. The passage John 1 : 51 has called forth much comment. The Lord uses here a figure taken from Jacob's dream. Jacob, a wanderer far from home, is encouraged and strengthened by a vision teaching him that heaven and earth are so closely united that angels may descend to aid those in God's care here below. So Nathanael, and with him all believers, are to be succored and helped, cheered and encouraged, by the fact that through the coming of Christ to earth, by this actual physical joining of heaven and earth, the last obstacle to man's spiritual intercourse with heaven has been removed. Having been made one with us, we are partakers of all that belongs to him, among others the ministering of angels; and, further than that, having through him become priests and high priests unto God, we may pass freely into the innermost sanctuary of the Father who is in heaven. 2. You may obtain "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" for $1.

H. M. A., Rochester, N. Y. We must not allow any one to stand between us and God. Christ says, "Come unto me" (Matt. 11 : 28). And the burden of all Christian teaching has been that man needs no intermediary between himself and God. Why then the confessional? If we have wronged any one, it is of course incumbent on us to confess our fault to him and ask his pardon. Also it is a beautiful privilege to go to a friend, a father, a brother, a sister in Christ, and by confessing our faults obtain help in laying them before the mercy seat. David has given us the right idea in Ps. 51 : 4.

C. M. D., Boonton, N. J. Thanks for the memory passages received. The Jonah riddle has been published repeatedly.

M. A. C., Dewitt, Iowa. We cannot undertake to pass judgment on the case you mention, not knowing "the other side." If a minister neglects his own proper parish work to such an extent as your letter indicates, there must be some underlying cause for it, and under such conditions a church cannot hope to make any substantial spiritual progress.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

SOMETIMES our faith meets a temporary setback because we have expected a certain answer to our prayers and God has given us a different one. This week a member of the League asks us if we have ever known of the healing through prayer of a serious disease which baffles the physicians. His wife is afflicted, and because her prayers for relief are not answered by the curing of the disease she has begun to feel that somehow she has lost the divine favor and there is no hope for her, either here or hereafter. There is no promise that God will answer in the affirmative all of our prayers. The Scriptures expressly intimate otherwise. Paul testified that he himself had a thorn in the flesh, for release from which he had three times prayed, but the Lord answered his prayer, not with healing, but with a new measure of his grace, which enabled Paul to bear his affliction and to serve God acceptably in spite of it. It may not be God's will to heal, but it is always his will to comfort and to give strength to bear burdens, and to give grace to serve him acceptably in the place in which he has put us, even though that service includes the bearing of almost unbearable pain. God's purposes are hidden to the human mind, but his Spirit declares him to our hearts and leads us through difficulties and through successes to final victory, when faith triumphs over the last enemy.

E. H. testifies that in going through an operation a few weeks ago there came a wonderful spiritual experience which took away the fear of death, deepened and changed her life, and gave a deeper desire for perfect consecration and service.

Mrs. J. L. H. praises God for prayer answered in the reformation of two sons.

E. H. W. urges all Christians to pray for our country, and E. Van W. asks us to implore the Almighty to give the President and his advisers wisdom from on high that the nation may be guided in the channels of righteousness.

E. J. H. thanks God for prayer answered in the employment of two sons in the work nearest to his heart, the Y. M. C. A. secretaryship. He also asks prayer that the way may be opened for him to do effective work in the Master's vineyard.

An Anxious Mother asks prayer for her wayward son that, having been given a new chance, he may be kept from failing, and may return home.

Mrs. E. J. D. writes that her sight has been restored in answer to prayer.

H. H. sent his enrolment to the Prayer League, and with it a dollar which he asked to have forwarded to the Anti-Saloon League. He asks prayer for the successful conclusion of a real estate matter, and prayer also for a brother, that he may have no peace until he gives his heart fully to the Lord.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Rome, Ind.; Chatham, Va.; Solon, Me.; Chester, Ohio; Lancaster, Pa.; Dunellen, N. J.; Kinsman, Ohio; Huntington, W. Seven friends ask prayer that their sight may be strengthened; S. O. M., to be cured of double vision; Mrs. O. B. R., that cataracts may be removed from eyes; G. W. D., that tumor may be removed from brother's eye; Mrs. J. B., that two blind people may receive their sight; V. C. G., that a friend may be cured of a badly affected eye; Mrs. F. N. R., that sister's eyes may be cured of ulcers; twenty-one friends, for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves, friends or relatives.

Twenty-seven friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

One hundred and four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Twelve parents ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; A Wife and Mrs. E. K. H. W., that husbands may be delivered from the liquor habit; Mrs. A. E. P., that a young man may be cured of the liquor habit and become reconciled to his family; twenty-seven, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from the habit.

Ten readers ask prayer for special blessing for others.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

McQUAY-NORRIS LEAK-PROOF PISTON RINGS

To enjoy perfect motor service get McQuay-Norris LEAK-PROOF Piston Rings because they conform exactly to the cylinder bore and exert absolutely equal pressure all around. Yet this pressure is so delicate as not to cause undue friction or cylinder wear.

The perfect fit of every ring is insured by the micrometer manufacturing methods, which insure dimensions to within one-thousandth of an inch. The only piston rings obtainable in such a wide range of stock sizes that the garage or repair man can fit your motor immediately, whatever the make or the model. Over-sizes in all widths and diameters in stock.

Don't take chances with poorly designed and cheaply manufactured piston rings. Use only Genuine LEAK-PROOF Rings. Made only by the McQuay-Norris Manufacturing Co. — the inventors Known by no other name. Packed only in this special carton under this copyrighted label; each ring separately contained in this sealed parchment container.

As an assurance of getting the Genuine, have your garage or repair man send you the empty containers—one container for each ring—with his bill.

How Hudson Solved the Gasoline Problem

Now Furnished on the New Light Super-Six

The gasoline saver is one more new invention of the Hudson Super-Six.

It was shown for the first time at the New York Automobile Show in January. Now most all Hudson dealers are showing the new cars equipped with this and ten other important new features. The gasoline saver is the only new feature shown on automobiles at this year's shows.

Overcomes the Poor Gasoline

Hard starting and wasteful gasoline consumption due to cold weather and the low grade gasoline are overcome. Radiator and hood covers are not needed on the new Hudson Super-Sixes, even in the coldest weather.

This device has been in use on hundreds of Hudson Super-Sixes during the coldest winter weather. Its effectiveness has been proved. It is as easily operated as the damper on a stove.

Low grade gasoline gives low mileage and is wasteful and harmful to the engine, unless the motor is operated steadily at a high temperature.

Primer Insures Easy Starting

In zero weather, even at 20 below, the new Hudson Super-Six motor starts. The primer is another new feature of the new Super-Six.

On the new cars there are also other worth-while features you should see. There is the new plaited upholstering, more attractive door fasteners, hard rubber handles, an improved body finish and other details you can see. And then we have made many improvements in the building of the car. The car that last year won every worth-while record is a much better automobile now because we have learned to build them better.

We made those records of endurance, for acceleration and speed, with cars of the earlier production. No one has yet equaled anything we have done with stock Super-Six cars. And yet the cars we turn out today are infinitely better because of the increased skill and experience Hudson workmen have acquired in building the 25,000 cars that were produced last year.

Think What a Year Has Shown

Remember what was claimed for the Super-Six one year ago. Then we had only our own records to show—records proving the Hudson Super-Six the fastest stock car built.

We then had established only the 100-mile and the one-hour records for a fully equipped stock touring car. But since we have won the 24-hour record for a stock chassis, the Transcontinental Run both ways, the fastest stock chassis mile, and have outsold any other high grade car in the world. So if you want a fine car that outperforms any other car that is built, your choice must be a Hudson Super-Six.

Buyers Waited for Months

At this time last season orders exceeded our production by 8,000. At no time during the season were there enough Hudsons to go around. From this you can see what the demand will be this year. We are only producing 30,000 cars as against last year's 25,000 because we cannot build more and build them well. That is not a large increase. It shows, however, that if you want a Hudson you cannot afford to postpone buying. Unless you act now you may be like other thousands who will be disappointed this year because they could not get prompt deliveries.

Don't fail to see the gasoline saver.

Jesus Gives Sight to the Blind

International Sunday School Lesson for April 1. John 9:1-38

By GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

HERE we have an incident so packed with meaning that John gave up a whole chapter to it. It has dozens of points of contact for our own times and our own pupils. It is the record of upward progress from blindness and ignorance to sight and faith on the part of one man, and of the degeneracy of others through wilful rejection of the light. It begins with a discussion between Jesus and his disciples on suffering and its place in the divine plan. The twelve took it for granted that suffering is always a penalty of sin, though this is not the teaching of Scripture. With them the only question was "Who committed the sin?"

Every Affliction an Opportunity for Service

JESUS did not go into the philosophy of it, but gave the practical judgment that suffering gives opportunity to manifest the works of God. Merciful ministry would be impossible in a painless world. No afflictions would mean no pity. The thing to do is not to speculate as to why God permitted evil to enter the world, but to cooperate with him in removing it wherever we can. War makes some people pessimistic and faithless, but others go out to nurse like Florence Nightingale, or plan to care for the blinded veterans, or at least to give sacrificially for the relief of little children.

Jesus did not like to have his disciples stand and argue about the poor beggar's condition. "We must work the works of him that sent me." The Revised Version says "we." When Jesus spoke there was not a hospital or a Children's Home in the world. But wherever his disciples have gone they have worked his works, ministering to suffering in his name.

In this cure Jesus used means, spitting in the dust, placing the clay on the poor fellow's eyes, and sending him to wash at Siloam. Why not an immediate cure? Was it not in order to develop faith within the blind man's soul? Jesus used means which were then believed to be helpful, and required the man to believe sufficiently to make his way as best he could. Already the majestic voice of Christ had awakened faith. The man obeyed. As he obeyed, his eyes were opened, and so it is with us.

Jesus provided aids to faith. Today many men feel that they can dispense with church attendance, communion, even prayer and Bible study. It is to be noted that the spiritual life of such is seldom robust.

Personal Experience Invincible

"I AM he." There was no disproving this particular "sign." The man himself was on hand! There is no greater testimony to the efficacy of the Gospel than a redeemed life. When the blind man came seeing, the opponents of Jesus had to shift their ground. So it is today. All the skepticism and scorn of the world is powerless before one sincere Christian who knows what Christ has done for him.

"Ask him." The parents of the man who had received his sight may be pardoned their timidity before the authorities. After all, they could only testify to his former condition. The friends of John Goode know that he has had a remarkable experience, but we are all glad that one of them "asked him" to tell us his experience with Jesus Christ. Send the scoffer to him or to any of unnumbered multitudes who unite with him in saying, "Once I was blind, but now I can see; the Light of the World is Jesus."

"One thing I know." One certainty is worth a thousand speculations. When that certainty is based on absolute first-hand knowledge it is invincible. The blind man now had something to build on. In their efforts to shake him they gradually built up his faith! He saw their prejudice. He felt grateful to God. When Jesus came to him with the higher truths of which his cure was a symbol, he was ready. "Lord, I believe."

In times of testing, your religion simmers down to what you know from experience. Hearsay creeds will break unless they have been lived out and become one's own. Let us then seek to know Jesus better; to make the most of our opportunities day by day.

"Those Who Will Not See"

There are none so blind as those who will not see. "This man is not from God," they said of the Stainless One who had just brought light into a darkened soul. Bigotry will find some excuse for condemnation: "We know that this man is a sinner." Little can be done for those who close their minds and shut their eyes to the facts. This is unbelief: not to be unable to believe, but to be unwilling. With the man who thinks he "can't believe," the spirit of God is very patient; but with the man who "won't believe," he is stern indeed.

It is to be feared that we have among us today many who will not see God's truth. So the prophets found it in Israel (Isa. 6 : 9). So Jesus found the rulers of his day. We have men who absolutely refuse to see good in the Church of Christ. We have men, some of whom should know better, disparaging the entire enterprise of world-wide missions. Others have resolutely closed their eyes to all the power of the Bible. With these it is unwise to argue. Like the man who had been blind, we must confront them with the facts and hope that they will desire more light.

In this chapter the rejection of the Light of the World is plainly foreshadowed by this wilful faultfinding, this resolute determination to see no good in the Son of Man. The Cross looms on the horizon.

Unbelief in God's Presence in Contemporaries

"WE know that God hath spoken unto Moses, but as for this fellow, we know not whence he is." This is always the attitude of the enemies of religious progress—they are always zealous for ancient leaders and blind to the revelation of new truth from God. "We are Moses' disciples." Yet their ancestors murmured against him. Jesus rightly adjudged them worthy descendants of those who killed the prophets.

Just in the same way the great churchmen of the sixteenth century disparaged Luther. Who was Luther to question the decisions of the dead Popes? They failed to see in him another John the Baptist rebuking sin in Israel, another Paul pointing to justification by faith.

Well, the old problem confronts us anew today. Is God speaking through the advocates of Christian unity? And what about the Christian Socialist movement, which aims at fraternity in industry and the distribution of the goodly gifts of Nature?

We desire to be more open-minded than the Pharisees, but not to be led astray by charlatans. There could be no better advice given to the children of light who believe that God still has new truths for his world, than that given by Paul to the Thessalonians: "Despise not prophesyings, but prove all things, and hold fast that which is good."

"Are We Also Blind?"

THIS was the aggrieved query of Jesus' opponents. They did not like his reflections upon their attitude. But Jesus responded that if they were blind it would not be so bad, but to deliberately refuse to recognize truth while claiming to be its custodians was a very grave sin. We had better ask ourselves the same question, "Are we also blind?" Are we wedded to our own petty and narrow views of the Kingdom of God? Is Jesus beckoning to us, waving us away from our sectarianisms, saying "Follow me"? Are there blind men near whom we could lead to light if we really cared for their souls?

Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven.

"For judgment came I into this world." Christ sits on the judgment seat every day. But there is no contradiction with his other gracious word that he came not to condemn. Men judge themselves, as these Pharisees did. If they prefer darkness to light, their deeds are in some measure evil. We classify ourselves by our attitude to truth and by the deeds that we do. If we say, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die," then we establish our own rating. If we believe with all our heart, "For me to live is Christ and to die is gain," we automatically set ourselves on a different plane. The things we enjoy, the way we spend our Sabbaths, the plans we make for the future, make very plain whether we are for or against Jesus and his Kingdom among men.

Sunday School Methods

By Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

Palm and Easter Sundays

PALM SUNDAY. This should be observed by the singing of "The Palms" as a solo or by the school, and the reading of the story of Christ's entrance into Jerusalem. Palms may be used in the decorations, or green branches if available.

It is often used as an "Acknowledgment Day," when scholars are encouraged to make open confession of Christ as King, preparatory to their joining the church on Easter Sunday. Some splendid results were obtained in one school by the use of a card on Palm Sunday, on one side of which was printed as follows:

MY ACKNOWLEDGMENT

"I am not yet a professing Christian, but I know I ought to be one, and I desire to be one; and on this Acknowledgment Day I do accept Jesus Christ as my personal Saviour, and promise him that I will try to live a faithful Christian life."

Signed, ——————
Address ——————

On the reverse of the card was the following:

"FOR CHURCH MEMBERS

"'The Master is come and calleth for thee.'

"I am already a professing Christian, but I want to be a more loyal and earnest one, and on this Acknowledgment Day I do reconsecrate myself to my Master, Jesus Christ, and promise him that I will try to be more faithful to every duty of my Christian life."

Signed, ——————
Address ——————

These cards should be signed on Palm Sunday by all who will during a few minutes of silence, and after a tender appeal to all to stand by and with the Christ acknowledged as King on that day of entrance into Jerusalem.

Easter Day Suggestions

Easter gives the superintendent a chance to send an Easter poem or a personal message to the scholars, teachers and homes of the school. Special Easter programs are usually provided by the Mission Boards of the various denominations.

Decorations. — 1. Have the words "Christ Is Risen" painted by some school artist or painter in gold letters against a white cardboard background, or purple against a light gray background, and place at a prominent point in front of school. These words may be outlined too in Easter lilies against a green background.

Scholars and classes should be encouraged to bring to the school potted plants, where Easter lilies are not available, and have such gifts afterward designated for the sick.

In the intermediate and high school age, scholars may be glad to decorate Easter invitation cards to the school, using Easter lilies or some other floral designs.

As for the Program.

If possible have it painted in Easter violet. The Easter lesson should not be omitted. Where this will not leave sufficient time for a service, use the evening church service for the school. Use the great Easter songs.

Children or young people, in costumes of various lands, could tell what Easter Day would mean in those lands, and prepare for the missionary offering of the day. The superintendent should accustom the school to his Easter Day salutation "The Lord is Risen," the school replying, "The Lord is risen indeed."

The "Lily Processional" has been used effectively by the Baptist Church of Portland, Maine. A representative of each class brings, in procession, an Easter lily. These are arranged on a prepared pyramid.

The "Changed Cross," used first by Mr. Marion Lawrence in his school, is very impressive. This consists of a wire cross with meshes a half inch square. Class representatives, after the Scripture lesson and songs, bring red carnations, which are fastened into the cross by helpers on front and sides, the back being open. Easter lilies are placed in the center. Electric light bulbs are placed within the cross. The church lights are turned out, and the electric lights of the cross turned on, revealing the red of the carnations and the white of the lilies, suggesting the sacrifice and resurrection of Christ. The audience softly sings, "In the Cross of Christ I Glory."

3 STEPS TO BIBLE KNOWLEDGE

Each an Example of the Delightfulness and Value of the

SECOND BIBLE PICTURE STUDY

Have You Ever Had This Thought?

"I can climb to higher things—a nobler aim in life—a happier home—a worthier career—a deeper knowledge of God and His Word. These I feel that I can attain, if I bend my energies to the task."

Have you?

It is a beautiful and likewise a very practical thought.

Sometimes only one step at a time is possible. In the words of the sacred hymn, "One step enough for me."

Here Are Three Steps

Three Steps to Bible Knowledge—each a picture which interprets some verse or verses found in the Bible.

Do you think you can find those verses?

It surely would be a delightful pastime, and inspiring as well, to con the Sacred Scriptures for the verses, wouldn't it? Yet, possibly it would involve more time and energy than you can conveniently expend to go over the 31,000 verses in the Bible.

A Friend in Need

This is exactly what we foresaw in planning our unique Bible Picture Study. We have compiled all of the verses which are allowable in the Study into one neat booklet called "Pearls from the Bible." It is a convenient little book containing a limited list of Bible prophecies, precepts and promises—of inestimable usefulness in our Study because of the comfort and stimulation they bring to participants.

The Outfit Complete

"Pearls from the Bible" is only part of the Outfit for the Bible Picture Study, which we furnish in accordance with the terms outlined below. The remainder of the Outfit consists of the Answer Book, in which you can conveniently record the verses you choose to match the Bible pictures, and the pictures we have already published prior to this issue of the Christian Herald. Free competition in the Study is explained in the Rules, which are sent on request.

Why You Should Start NOW

It is important to start at once. By postponing your participation you will only crowd your work to the last moment. Rush work always will be unsatisfactory both to us and to you, the participant.

Perhaps some of you who were in the First Study are delaying your entrance into the Second because you have the old "Gems from the Bible," and you may be trying to find fitting verses in it for these Second Study pictures. Don't waste time that way. Secure "Pearls from the Bible" without delay, and make your research of practical use.

There Is Something More

We are offering $5,628.00 in cash rewards to one thousand participants submitting the largest number of best answers.

You can win the FIRST REWARD, $1,000.00, if you send the most complete list of best answers.

Or, if your work is not quite so deserving, possibly the SECOND REWARD of $800.00.

There will be 1,000 rewards! A complete list of rewards will be sent to you on request.

How to Obtain the Outfit

If you secure from some friend or acquaintance, who would be benefited by the Study, a new subscription to the Christian Herald at $1.00 for six months, we will send you an Outfit as a reward.

If you prefer, remit $2.35 to us, and we will renew your own subscription to the Christian Herald for one year from the time when it expires and send you an Outfit at once. Use coupon below.

"Pearls from the Bible" is a New Book

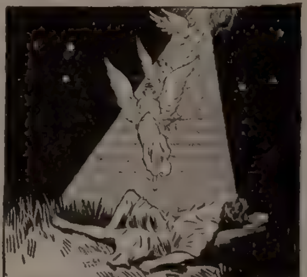
Those who took part in the successful First Study should not confuse "Pearls" with "Gems from the Bible," the booklet used at that time, which is valueless in this Second Study.

A Little Corner of Helpfulness

Here is the Study in a nutshell.

Note these verses carefully. Which of them fits the picture below?



And he said, Hear thou therefore the word of the Lord: I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left. I Kings 22 : 19.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. Gen. 28 : 12.

How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days. Matt. 12 : 12.

For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God. James 1 : 20.

You chose the second, didn't you? Of course you did, for it suits the picture best. While all may not be quite so obvious as this example illustration, every one is clear and plain.

In the Study itself there will be a series of pictures, and a limited list of verses in "Pearls from the Bible" from which to select the most applicable. Use the coupon

Bran Food

Made a Luxury

Doctors told us they needed a bran food which people would eat daily and enjoy.

They said they wanted flake bran, to be doubly efficient. And they wanted 25 per cent.

We made Pettijohn's to please them. We hid the bran in flavory wheat flakes, and made a delicious food.

Now thousands of doctors prescribe it. And millions of people are benefited by its constant laxative effect.

Pettijohn's

Rolled Wheat—25% Bran

A breakfast dainty whose flavory flakes hide 25 per cent unground bran.

Pettijohn's Flour—75 per cent fine patent flour with 25 per cent bran flakes. Use like Graham flour in any recipe.

Both sold in packages only.

Young People's Topics for April 1

Are We "Fooling" Ourselves?

Epworth League Topic. Prov. 14 : 12; II Cor. 13 : 5; James 1 : 26; Matt. 7 : 21

IT is a most serious thing to deceive ourselves regarding our own religious condition. Many men and women have wakened in later years to the fact that what they had thought was service was really a denial of Christ. Some of them have depended upon their own judgment instead of seeking a true understanding of the word of God. "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof is death." Some have depended for salvation upon the single experience of conversion, and have never learned that growth in grace must follow the new birth. Some are contentious; they will have their own way though the heavens fall. The grace of giving in is a Christian grace, all too little cultivated. We must fight for the truth, not for our opinions. The more strongly held our opinions are, the greater the chance that they may be wrong.

Everything changes in this world except a fixed opinion, and that is a rock which will remain unmoved, no matter how the waves of truth may surge against it. "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith . . . Know ye not . . . . that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" Search your heart. If you are not sure of the indwelling of his Spirit, go to your knees in a new consecration.

The loose talker, too, is one who may fool himself, even if he fools no one else. Some who can be very voluble in meeting would hesitate to open their books to the Lord. Hypocrisy is not yet unknown. There is more of it in the world than in the church, but the church still has some notable examples, of which he is one who attempts to cover an unworthy life with unbridled speech. Beware of the man who is so free with denunciation of all who think otherwise than he does. Don't fool yourself. It is the most serious folly in which you can indulge. Be square and honest with yourself, and it won't take the world long to discover that it has work for you to do.

The Quiet Ways of God's Providence

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. I Kings 19 : 1-13. (Consecration Meeting.)

MOST of us have our moments under the juniper tree. Things have a most disconcerting habit of going wrong. Our life is a hurried rush from task to task, from day to day. We live in the great and strong wind and in the earthquake, and we don't have time to stop to listen to the still, small voice. We wear ourselves out, and when our nerves give way we throw ourselves under the juniper of discontent and complaint and ask God why he ever put us here at all. All the time God is waiting for the quiet time when we shall stand at the entering in of our caves of self-assurance and shall be ready to listen to his voice.

Elijah fought valiantly against the priests of Baal and then ran from one wicked woman. He forgot that it was God's arm and not his that had slain the priests, and that the same Divine arm could shield him even from the threatenings of an enraged queen. He let physical weariness bring spiritual despair. God gave him a needed lesson and one we need today. First he fed him. Then he led him up into a mountain. Then he revealed himself, not in his might, but in the power of his gentleness.

Sometimes we get discouraged in our work for God. Let us learn Elijah's lesson and take care of our bodily needs, and then let us get away to our Horeb—our closet of prayer—and wait there for the still, small voice.

THE churches of Curwensville, Pa., recently united in a series of evangelistic meetings under the leadership of Rev. J. W. Mahood of Sioux City, Iowa. The meetings were held in the Methodist church.

A National Campaign for Neglected Children

(Coincident with the Centennial Celebration of the American Sunday-School Union)

In the rural communities of America hundreds of thousands of children are growing up without any Sunday-schools, without any religious influence or guidance, without books or associates to stimulate ambition and develop character.

Permanent peace, progress and prosperity can be attained only through the universal application of Christian intelligence. This means the regeneration and development of every religiously destitute community in the country. It means the education and Christian guidance of every child.

This vast work necessitates a thoroughly trained, nation-wide organization, properly financed. The American Sunday-School Union (the pioneer Sunday-school organization in America), by reason of its long experience and unusual equipment, is prepared to meet the great problems involved, and is now raising a permanent fund to extend its work among the several million children of rural America still unreached by Christian influence.

Families similar to this are to be found in mining towns, lumber camps, in mountain regions and in almost every undeveloped section of the country,—north, east, south and west. In this case, as in many others, the parents can neither read nor write; hence the children must be educated and guided by influences outside the home

It is proposed to reach these children through the agency of the Sunday-school in the same manner that five million children in similar circumstances have already been reached by this Society; and under the same practical methods followed by this Society in establishing more than 130,000 Sunday-schools from which thousands of successful churches of various denominations have been developed.

Owing to the growing importance of the work in which this Society is engaged, additional funds are imperatively needed to meet the calls for assistance from all parts of the country.

This appeal, therefore, is made to every reader of the Christian Herald to co-operate in this great work to the extent of at least One Dollar each. The amount suggested is small enough to enable every reader to respond, and yet the aggregate amount is expected to provide a substantial portion of the fund required. Every dollar invested in training children accomplishes more for the future of the country than ten times as much spent in social and political reform.

Simply pin a dollar bill to the coupon below, wrap it in a sheet of paper and mail it. Contributions to this campaign will also be received at the office of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York. We will then send you a formal acknowledgment, and will also send you, prepaid, the five following Anniversary pamphlets which describe the work of the Society and relate many of the unique and often thrilling experiences of its field workers:

(A) Accomplishments and Aims of the American Sunday-School Union.
(B) Sunday-School Pioneering in Rural America.
(C) The Forerunner of the Church.
(D) The Silent Guide of Human Destiny.
(E) Investing Money in Neglected Children.

Europe's Shifting Alliances

history since 1700 shows us, seems to be clearly that no nation goes to war except to achieve a definite political object (using the term "political object" in a broad sense, and including therein economic as well as purely political considerations), and a nation varies and adopts allies in accordance with their momentary value in aiding it to achieve such object. In other and perhaps simpler words, expediency governs the actions of nations in all their political purposes.

War, broadly considered, is but the application of physical force to bring about a political result obtainable usually in no other way. After the leaders of a state have, in their own minds, defined the political object for which they are willing to wage war, and their military and other advisers have informed them of the probability of the physical power of the nation being sufficient to overwhelm the enemy and thereby to achieve the desired result—in other words, after the chances of success or failure have been all calculated as closely as is possible for human beings to calculate—and the decision made, then, and then only, is the mind of the nation inflamed through the press, the speeches of its leaders, the songs of its poets, and all the other innumerable agencies for the stimulating of hatred and wounded vanity, for exciting rage, and for creating a desire for national prestige: which means national power to compel other peoples to obey, and to increase the national importance of one's own nation in the world, and therefore reflexively of one's personal importance as a member of that nation.

Then, when this propaganda has produced the desired result, war follows as a matter of national desire!

Such is the sordid truth as to the manner in which wars are actually started today and always have been, when that truth is stripped of its stage draping. We are justified in assuming it as a rule that nations wage war not for sentiment, not for friendship with another nation, but for eminently practical political objects.

With all the clashes of political interests existing, as well as many others which could be mentioned, it will be really wonderful if there are no breaks in the ranks of either group before the next few months are over. Only three, Great Britain, France and Germany, seem certain to stand steadfastly antagonistic to the end.

For us, as a nation, the immediately coming months are likely to be times of some considerable trial, in which we are rather likely to receive unintentional blows from one or the other of the combatants; but in this time of trial our duty seems reasonably clear. And when the word duty is used our duty to ourselves is what is meant, and that only.

Duty to the belligerents we have none, except to observe equal justice in our attitude of neutrality toward them, and to preserve that attitude unblemished by sympathy or prejudice for or against either side. Our duty to ourselves has been well laid down by one whose words today do not appear to possess the same authority as formerly, but which are nevertheless the only true rule of conduct in the present case:

> "Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial; else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation, and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil, and even second, the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests. . . .
> "Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities."

If we carry out Washington's advice, we shall mind our own business, we shall preserve our national poise, we shall avoid internal dissension, and we shall be able with a clear and tranquil spirit to support unitedly the duly constituted authorities in any constitutional action which they may hereafter be obliged to take. But a giving way to sentimentality, or prejudice or overstrained idealism, and above all to hysteria, will destroy our possibilities for aiding in the reconstruction of civilization, and besides may land our nation in the most dangerous and most precarious situation the country has ever known in its national history.

Laughing With Fate

ful heavens, but I'm weak! Let me cry."

THREE days later her mother opened the door for her.

"I've got good news for you, Madeline."

"Keep it. I'm surfeited."

"You needn't bother about it, of course, but I presumed to open a letter from Mr. Merrill. His son had flown again. He wants to know if you will consider coming to him as literary secretary."

"Whoops! What? Why, that's even better—I can't stand this. I'm going to go over and hug the old genius."

And two weeks later:

"I've good news for you, Madeline."

"You simply must avoid monotony, mother. This thing is getting to be a habit, a gluttonous, grasping habit."

"Yes. You will regret it, of course. But I feel compelled to tell you." She stopped, smiling. And her smile was a bit ambiguous, a bit teasing, a bit sad. "David Plymouth is in the library," she announced slowly. "He arrived in town this morning. He— —"

But Madeline had already reached the library door. She stood there staring at the man before her.

"David!"

He made a buoyant move toward her, and she leaned back weakly into a supporting angle of the two walls. As he neared her, she held out her hands in an odd little longing gesture. He caught them quickly to him.

He was straight and lithe and brown—from Arizona. There had been a reason for his going there.

"Are you well, David?"

"Perfectly, conqueringly, flippantly so. I and everything else in this great world, Maddie. All is well."

She slid her hands up and framed his face in them, looking at him earnestly. Then suddenly they slipped around his neck.

"Oh, it's so much nicer to be clinging to you—instead of memory, David."

He dropped his face to her cheek impulsively for answer.

"David. Will you please tell me why I laugh in purgatory—and cry in paradise?"

His arms tightened about her in quick comprehension.

"The first because you are wise, lady mine." He tilted her face to his. "The second because you are a woman."

The Foods of the Fighters

EVERY soldier who ever came back from war has had strange tales to tell of the food he had to eat. The Spanish-American War remains in the memory of most Americans as the episode in which the army developed a scandal about an article called "embalmed beef." The problem of the commissariat is the biggest problem of an army, and increases faster than the army grows in size. The great French Major Saxe is reported to have said that an army "battleth on its belly," and it has been well known since armies first fought that a starving soldier is no match for one well fed. Since it is not always possible to keep every element of a great military organization in constant communication with the general source of supply, it is necessary to prepare emergency rations which the soldier may carry with him, and upon which he may fall back in case the regular ration is cut off, or he becomes detached from his command.

The picture page which follows this illustrates a few of the most interesting of the emergency rations of the fighters of the world, the most ostentatious being Uncle Sam's ration of compressed maize meal with meat farina and three chocolate bars. This ration is deficient in fats, for the very good reason that, even though hermetically sealed, it would become rancid if it carried any more fat. It is not, therefore, a balanced ration; but the container holds enough actual food to keep a soldier from starving for twenty-four hours.

The British troops as well as the Dutch have a sausage made of ground peas highly salted, reported to have been originated by the Scotch, and which is put up in regular sausage-skins. It is said to be the most sustaining emergency ration known.

The Italian butter-ball and the Chinese egg excited the most interest among the editorial staff of the Christian Herald of any of the foods here illustrated. The butter-ball was interesting because of the perfect preservation of the unsalted butter within the dry cheese envelope. The egg, which was guaranteed to be at least four years old, was even more interesting, because eggs of that age are not usually accepted in polite society. Yet if this egg had ever been in a condition to be unwelcome, it had been thoroughly cured; the albumen was of an ebony blackness, although still soft like gelatine; and while it did not taste like the eggs we are accustomed to eat for breakfast, neither did it taste as bad as it looked. The Chinese consider these eggs a great delicacy, and Europeans are reported before now, to have acquired the taste.

The various forms of tea and rice were especially interesting. The compressed tablets of tea make it possible for one to eat his tea, if water is not available, the Russians getting what they call a dry cup of tea by slipping a little tablet of compressed tea into the mouth and allowing it to dissolve slowly. All sorts of meat and fish are dried in sheets and strips and hunks by the various armies, and the Russians even dry the spinal cord of the sturgeon, occasionally using this strange ration as a walking-stick.

These are not the foods, however, upon which armies live, but the emergency rations upon which the soldier depends when the regular rations fail.

A RASH BARGAIN. The minister dropped into the village barber shop for a shave, at the close of which he proffered the usual ten-cent price of the shop.

"I'll take it in preaching, sir," replied the polite barber, refusing the offered coin. "My friend," rejoined the minister with some dignity, "I haven't a ten-cent sermon." "That's all right, sir," quickly retorted the barber; "then I'll come twice."

IT'S A WAY THEY HAVE. "Why were you late to school this morning, Tom?" asked the teacher.

"Why, the bell rang before I got here," the little fellow explained.

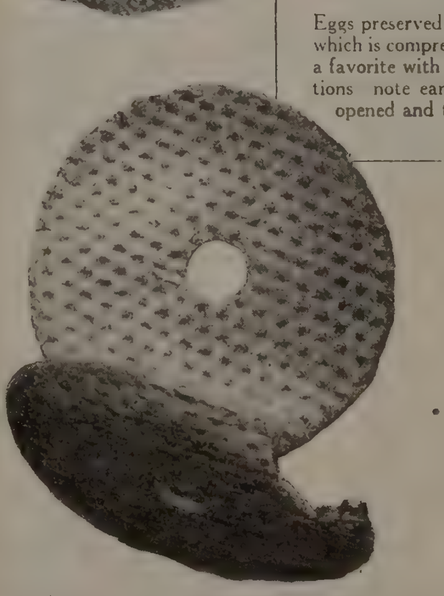
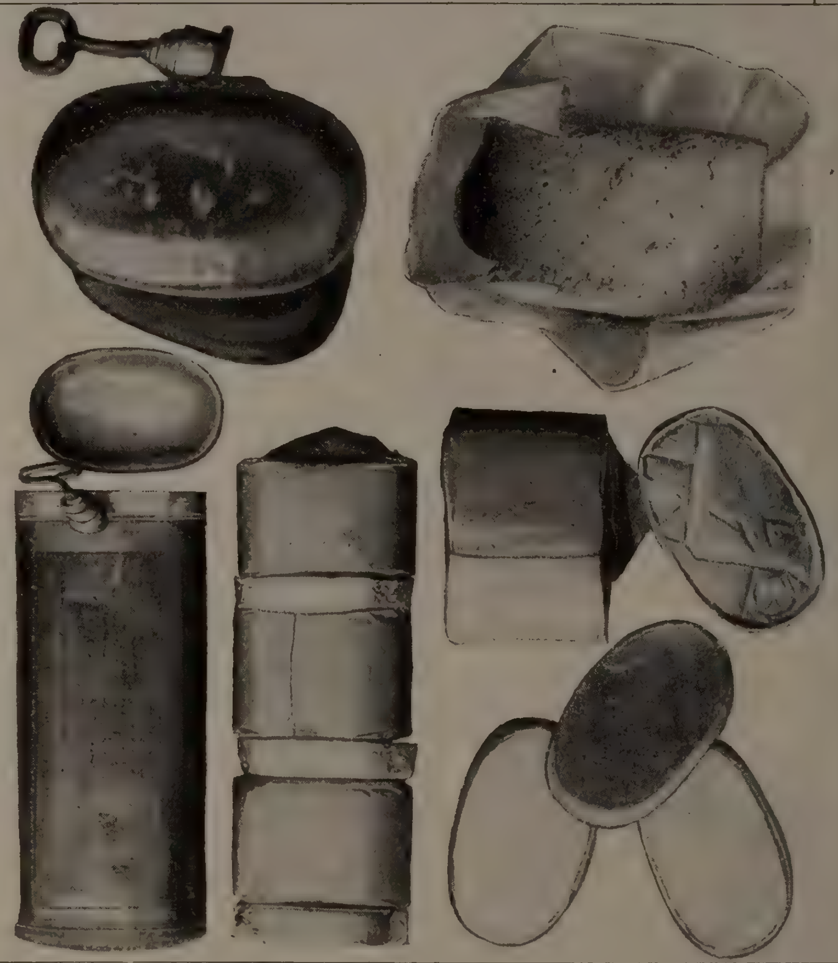
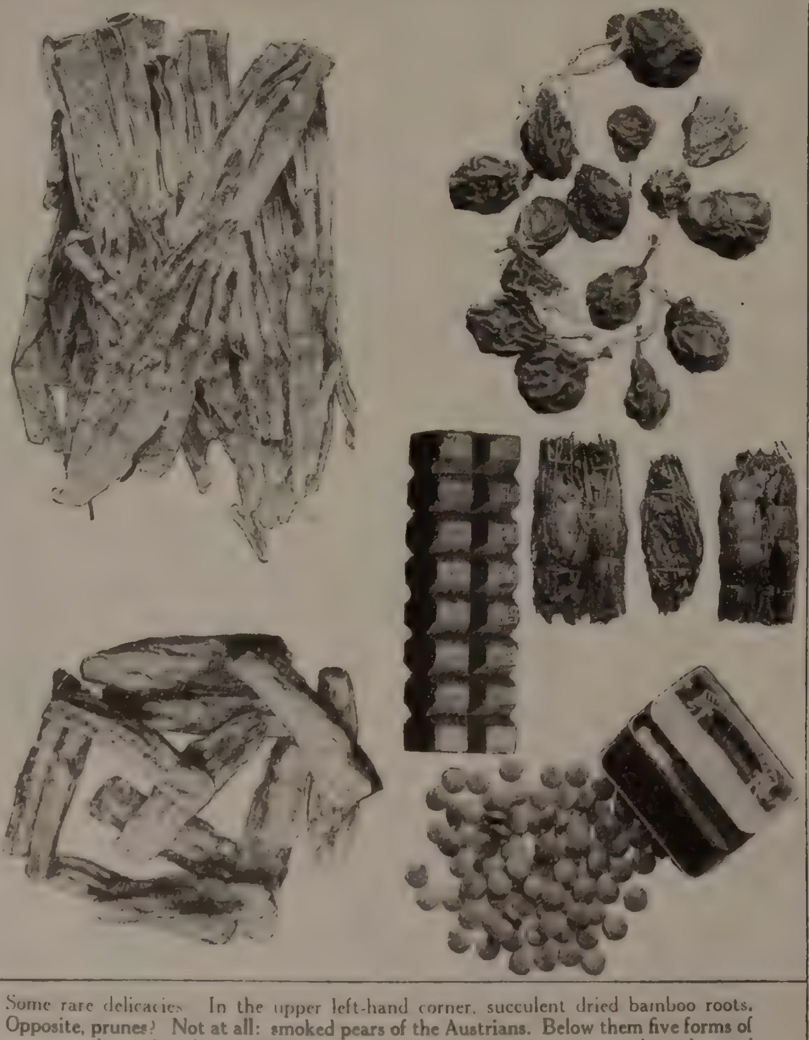
Eggs preserved in a thick envelop of barn-yard earth which is compressed around them and allowed to dry: a favorite with the Asiatics. The one in the illustrations note earth broken away, revealing egg—was opened and tasted in the Christian Herald office.

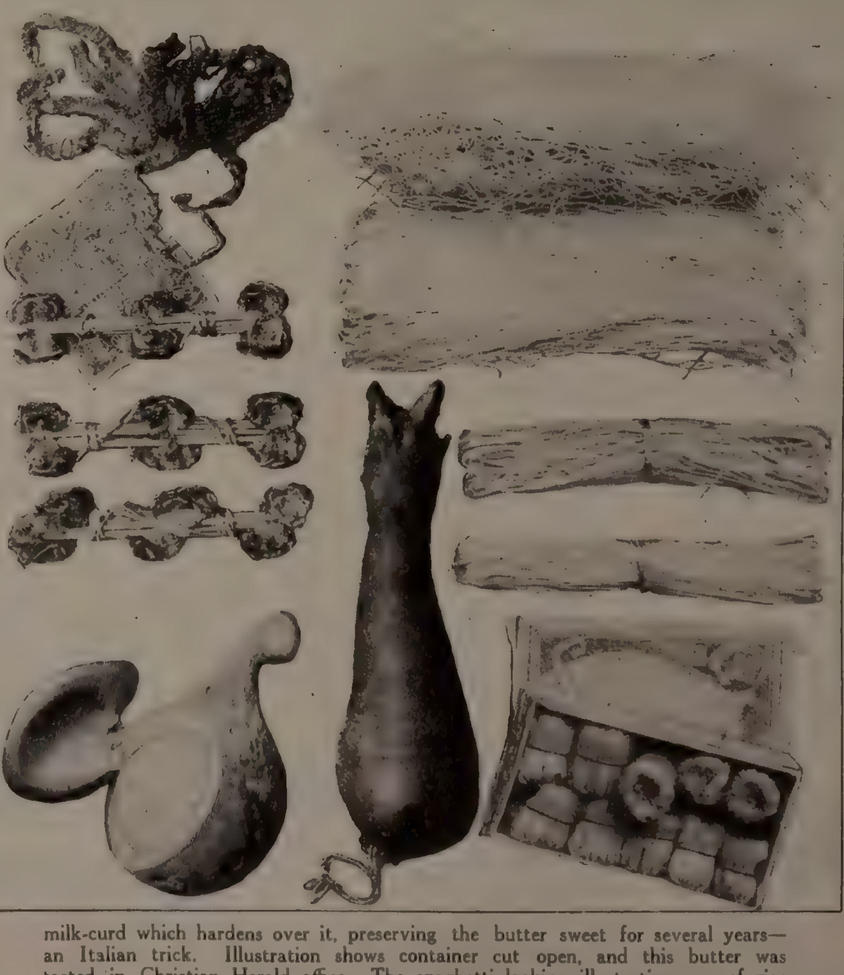


Thin disk black breads of the Turkish forces, six or eight inches in diameter, and not at all uninviting in appearance. Bread-stuffs are a principal item in the armies of all nations



The emergency ration of the United States army, consisting of compressed meal and meat cakes which are put up in sealed cans, as shown (the cans when emptied are often used as pocket water flasks), and chocolates, enough all told in this picture for twenty-four hours' subsistence





Some rare delicacies In the upper left-hand corner, succulent dried bamboo roots. Opposite, prunes? Not at all: smoked pears of the Austrians. Below them five forms of compressed tea (three being baled leaves, two fine-ground leaves compressed in cakes and tablets). Lower left-hand corner, dried (as nearly as can be) bananas, usually bound in bundles. In upper left-hand corner (opposite plate), dried devil-fish; dried oysters impaled on slender bamboo sticks; and, at the foot, unsalted butter encased in milk-curd which hardens over it, preserving the butter sweet for several years—an Italian trick. Illustration shows container cut open, and this butter was tasted in Christian Herald office. The spaghetti-looking illustrations are of rice ready in an instant for use, shown also packed in a box. And the thing that looks like a pig's foot is a pig's foot and leg, in the skin of which is tightly packed preserved ham-meat. When the meat is eaten the skin may be a water-flask.

The Slip-Shod Driver

Help Us Focus the Condemning Light of Public Opinion on THE SLIP-SHOD DRIVER—The Greatest Enemy of Motoring

The slip-shod driver is one who leaves tire chains in the locker when careful drivers put them on their wheels. Driving with chainless tires over wet-slippery-skiddy streets he gambles with the lives and property of everyone in his path.

Only two things can reach the slip-shod driver—fear of the law and the mightier power of public opinion. So, we ask you to help us arouse and concentrate a public opinion that will compel the slip-shod driver to use intelligence and judgment that will safeguard all of us against all preventable accidents.

Concentrate your light of condemnation on every driver who cuts corners; who does not signal when stopping or turning; who does not give a warning signal of his approach; who exceeds a safe speed limit; who does not inspect his brakes and steering gear; and who does not stop to put on tire chains at the first indication of wet-slippery-skiddy streets.

Questions and Answers

R. A. H., Coatesville, Pa., and Mrs. S. E. P., Sinnickson, Va. Please explain the meaning of the 13th chapter of St. Mark, especially the 14th, 17th and 30th verses.

Commentators agree that in the prophecies spoken by Jesus there was frequently what may be termed a two-fold perspective. From the discussion of the event near at hand (as in the prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem) the language "rises and swells beyond all temporal and partial vengeance, beyond earthly deliverances and enlargements, and ushers us resistlessly into the scenes of the final day." Mark 13, Matt. 24 and Luke 21 all deal with the same subject, and in each the principle noted is observed. With respect to the portions mentioned in the chapter in Mark, the passage from verse 14 to verse 23 is interpreted as referring to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem and the sufferings that would befall its population. In verse 24 the theme changes to the more distant field, and tells of the events to occur "after that tribulation," and in the last days. Verse 30, according to the usual Jewish mode of speaking, is held to mean that the generation then existing would not pass without seeing the prophecy (concerning Jerusalem) clearly under way, so that it could be described as a "begun fulfilment." Some authorities hold that it was completely fulfilled in the destruction wrought by Titus.

Rev. E. J. Young, Bartow, Fla., gives this new light on the "Veronica" story, which is familiar to most readers: "This is one of the non-existent saints who were invented in the fourth to the sixth centuries, sometimes from mistaking the name of a thing for a person, as in this case. The early legend was that an attendant wiped the death-sweat from the Saviour's brow as he hung upon the cross, whereupon his image was miraculously impressed upon the napkin. This was called the Veronica, i. e., 'vera icon' (true image), which was afterward transformed into a female saint. (See Smith's Ecclesiastical History, Vol. I, pp. 27, 454.)" The generally accepted form of the tradition states that the incident occurred not at the cross, but in the Via Dolorosa, on the way to Calvary.

J. F. R., Lansdale, Pa. The reason why the weather is warmer in November and December, when the sun is gradually becoming lower at noon, than in January and February, when it is becoming higher, is that in November and December the earth retains a great deal of the heat which it received from the sun in the summer, while in January and February the earth has become colder and has to depend on the sun for its heat.

D. F. L., Minot, N. D. Please explain when the promise made to Nathanael, as recorded in John 1 : 51, was fulfilled.

The figure used here is taken from the account of Jacob's dream (Gen. 28 : 12). As Jacob was encouraged by a vision which taught him that earth is united with heaven, and that guardian angels descend to succor those whom God loves, so believers are to be helped, cheered and encouraged by the realization that in Christ the union between heaven and earth has been strengthened and finally accomplished.

M. S. J., Boston, Mass. Why was it necessary that blood be shed for the atonement?

The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, says: "Apart from the shedding of blood there is no remission" (Heb. 9 : 22). Christ said, during the institution of the Lord's Supper (Luke 22 . 20), "My blood, which is shed for you." The entire theory of the atonement is based on this shedding of innocent blood as the prerequisite to efficacious cleansing from sin. The need of blood and its significance as a cleansing agent are well set forth in Lev. 17 : 11: "For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." Christ came to atone for our sins and his blood was shed for us. He recognized this by his reference to it at the institution of the Lord's Supper, and in John 6 : 53.

Miss M. L., Grantville, Va. How does the teaching of Matt. 5 : 39–41 apply to modern conditions?

These passages have been productive of much speculation and doubt. What is here taught applies equally to us today, as it did to those to whom Christ first addressed the injunction. What he is teaching is not a Pharisaical, literal observance of the words, but rather a spiritual one. He desires to impress on us that much of the sin and evil in the world is conquered by wise Christian submission, rather than by strenuous resistance. "To be merely passive were weakness; but a non-resistance from Christian principles and for a spiritual object is true strength and real victory." Hence, when actual violence befalls us, our Christian love must make us bear twice as much as the world in its injustice could demand. Then, also, if we are forced to go to law, we are to concede even more than the law demands, rather than show a vindictive spirit. When, however, those of the world wholly ovestep the bounds of justice, then it is our duty to resist just as strenuously as did Christ and his disciples.

An Ohio reader sends this interesting reminiscence of "Buffalo Bill"; "Cody was a native of the Buckeye State (not of Iowa, as was erroneously stated in many publications). He was born near Jacksontown, Licking County, Ohio. The newspapers of Newark, (the county seat of Licking County), and also those of Columbus, called attention to the above fact immediately after the announcement of his death. Cody's father died when comparatively a young man. The mother was left with a family of small children. She was a familiar figure in the southern part of Licking County, where she spent practically all her life. Mrs. Cody maintained her children by washing, knitting, and doing fancy work. The children left home to care for themselves when quite young. Bill went West when quite a young boy. The writer remembers Mrs. Cody very well. She lived in a small cabin near our home in the early seventies. She came to our house frequently for butter, eggs, milk, etc. Our mother used to have her knit mittens and make fancy work for pay. We have pillow cases in our house yet that have fringe made by Mrs. Cody. Ed Vanhorn, who died here a few weeks ago, used to visit Bill at his ranch at Cody, Wyo. When Mr. Cody was in Newark with his Wild West in 1907, he announced to the great crowd that he was glad to be back in his old home county again. Cody's mother was a bright, intelligent woman. She lived to be almost a hundred years old. Her body rests in a small country cemetery, just north of Jacksontown, in Licking County. We don't want to rob the great West of any glory that rightfully belongs to it, but here in Ohio we do want all that belongs to us. Bill Cody was born here, and that much glory belongs to us."

A zealous reader at Indian Head, Md., apropos of the need of spiritual preparation in view of the widespread expectation of prophetic fulfilment, writes: "The one way to prepare, and the only one that will please him [Christ], is to be always about his work, preparing our hearts to meet him, preaching and teaching by word, by example, by prayer, by holy living, by kindness; in other words, by doing our utmost to bring as many souls as possible to a saving knowledge of him. This is his will. He never charged us to speculate on the date of his Second Advent, but rather he condemned it as an idle curiosity and as interfering with and detracting from our diligent attention to the propagation of his Gospel. Let us all, therefore, buckle down to our work, stop wool-gathering, and let the Master take care of his part, which he will most assuredly do." All of which is sound spiritual advice.

Mrs. O., Houston, Okla. Coal-oil is the same as petroleum—an inflammable oily liquid mixture of numerous hydrocarbons, chiefly of the paraffin series, that exudes from the earth and is extensively used for heat and light.

C. O. M., Trenton, N. J. There are different degrees of belief, and there are two natures of belief, one passive and the other active. One may believe every word in the Bible, but be indifferent; his belief is no spur to his spirit or force in his life. He may be orthodox so far as bare believing goes, but the orthodoxy of bare believing is not enough. There is another degree, another nature, of belie It is alive and acts. It is vitalized into living faith and impels one to action. "Faith without works is dead," James tells us. If it were alive it would work. It could not keep from it, any more than the seed that is quickened by warmth and moisture could remain inactive and not grow. One may believe all about Christ, and be orthodox, but unless he also believes in Christ and on Christ, his belief is dead and unavailing.

R. L. S., Emaus, Pa. There is no record in the Scriptures covering that period of Christ's life between the ages of 12 and 30. John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was a second cousin to Christ. After a life devoted to preparing his countrymen for the coming of the Messiah, he was thrown into prison and executed by order of Herod Antipas.

Mrs. R. W. C., Lathrop, Mo., writes: "Relating to your reply to Mrs. J. A. N., Aldrich, Minn., January 3, would it not make the answer more clear to read carefully Gen. 8 : 4, where God says the ark rested 'upon the mountains of Ararat,' not Mount Ararat? No specific mount or peak is given."

Mrs. S. H. M., Conway, N. H. God does not tempt any one. He may permit us to be placed in positions where, if left to our own resources, we would fall; but he does not tempt us to evil. Temptation means also a trial of our moral character. The petition of the Lord's Prayer to which you refer asks that we be shown a way of escape from the many temptations to which we are subjected by the world, the devil and our flesh. As a Christian looks to God for everything, so also he looks for help and strength in the temptations that are bound to come.

THIS KNIFE O' MINE

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

If Jack th' Giant-Killer had had a Knife like mine,
He'd killed a thousand giants, an' not just eight 'r nine;
He'd laughed at 'em, an' stabbed 'em, an' yelled, "you keep away"
I'm out fer business, Giants, I got some Knife ter day!"

See, Jimmy, it's a big'un,
An' every blade is steel;
An' sharp—as sharp as—fire;
Jus' hold it, now, an' feel!

If that there man Horatius, what held a army back,
Had had my knife, I reckon he'd given them a whack!
He'd not 've asked two others ter help him guard th' way;
He'd cried, "What, just one army? I got some knife terday!"

See, Jimmy, five blades. Count 'em,
An' one fer finger nails;
An' one built like a chisel;
An' one ter open pails.

If Washington, so hungry an' sad about th' fight,
Had had a knife like this 'un at Valley Forge that night,
He'd stopped th' war, an' laughin', he'd said, "Why, that was play!
"Th' redcoats ran like rabbits—I got some Knife terday!"

See, Jimmy, ain't it dandy?
An', my, th' steel is blue!
I bet you're sorter jealous...
I bet you'd like one, too!

New York Awaits Billy Sunday

TEN thousand people pray. It is written that if two shall agree as touching anything, it shall be done. Yet here are 10,000, all agreed. Who shall measure the power of that prayer? Who can stay the answer if he would? And for what do they pray? For New York, for its people, for its life, for its quickening through the evangelical instrumentality of Billy Sunday.

Yes, Billy Sunday is coming to New York. Years ago, a few determined people began to pray that he might come, and gradually others began to pray, and after a long time a committee grew out of those prayers, and sent an invitation that was repeated and accepted. And now he is coming, and New York is making ready for his coming. A big part of that making ready is done by prayer for spiritual blessings.

The neighborhood prayer meetings in the homes are always the means by which a city is prepared for a Sunday evangelistic campaign. People who knew New York looked at its congested tenements and its unsocial apartment houses and shook their heads. They declared that prayer meetings in the homes of New York could never get started. But they did.

In the early days of the preliminary campaign, the island of Manhattan was divided into fifteen districts, and these were in turn divided into sub-districts, and these into blocks—a block might be one or more ordinary city blocks. There was a district chairman, a sub-district chairman and a block chairman, and under their direction committees called on every family, so far as possible, seeking definite knowledge as to the religious leaning or lack of leaning of each family, and searching for homes which would be open to prayer meetings. The committees had their troubles and their inspiring surprises. Some blocks were found to house not one Protestant family; yet in many of these houses Jewish families invited the committee to hold prayer meetings in their homes. At one of these prayer meetings in the home of a Jew there were five Hebrews present, and one of them took part, praying to Jehovah to bless the work of Mr. Sunday.

One block was surveyed by two young men. At their knock the door of a tenement was opened by a big, burly, red-faced man who swore at them and told them if they said Billy Sunday to him "he'd knock their blocks off." One of the young men stammered, "Oh, you musn't do that. If you do, I'll never speak to you again." And the big laborer saw the joke and asked them in and heard their story. One of the survey workers—a woman of social position—broke into a big exclusive apartment house by sending in her personal card to each tenant. Another walked into the rich foyer of a house where apartments cost as much a month as some tenements do a year, stepped calmly into the elevator and asked for Smith. The elevator man took her to the top floor, and when she had seen Mrs. Smith she made the rounds of the house, a floor at a time. Tenants have opened other apartment houses to the work, sending to the committee invitations to schedule prayer meetings in their apartments. One of these meetings the owner of the house, a saloon keeper, tried to stop by stationing himself at the front door to tell the incoming people that the meeting was called off; but the leader got in before the landlord began operations, and the meeting was held in spite of him.

THE churches cooperating in the campaign are responsible for the work in the various subdivisions, and the first effect of the campaign is being noticed among their own people. Many are taking part in these home meetings, whose voices have never before been heard in audible prayer; people whom the pastors never dared to call upon for public prayer are leading meetings and finding joy and liberty and a spiritual rebirth. In every neighborhood the meetings, started often with difficulty and continued at first in many cases with misgivings, have gained momentum until, as the preliminary campaign entered its last two weeks, the grand total of the people attending the prayer meetings on a single evening reached 10,000. These Sunday prayer meetings, held on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, using all the leadership of the churches, that known of old as well as that newly discovered, would be expected to interfere somewhat with the Wednesday night meetings of the regular church calendars. But instead, these regular church prayer meetings almost instantly felt the quickening impulse generated by the campaign. The meetings that once counted a faithful handful began to grow, and new voices, new consecrations swelled their ranks, until in some instances the crowds overflowed their meeting-rooms.

ALL of this visiting and surveying and praying made an impression on the metropolis. New York, by the middle of March, was talking little else but Billy Sunday. There are a great many who hate to see the tabernacle finished and who dread the opening of the doors, for they love their sins, their little profitable pet sins, and they are quite free with denunciation and quite reckless in the style of their language; but a lot of them know they are going to hit the trail, and a lot more are going to hit it who now think it's "all rot," and intend to go to the tabernacle to prove it. Then there are a lot of other people who haven't been giving God a square deal, and they know it; but they have to let off a good bit of steam before their boiler pressure is safe. And there are still other people—plenty of them—who have been hoping and praying for a great religious awakening. Therefore Billy Sunday and his meetings are being talked about everywhere, and he finds defenders as well as defamers in every crowd. And all of the talk helps the meetings.

It is no small task to organize one of these campaigns.

The William A. Sunday Evangelistic Association of New York is a big business institution, created in a few weeks, with competent executives and a smooth-running organization. How could it be done? First, a committee of business men took some time that might have been spent in making money, and organized themselves under the above title. They needed an executive who knew New York, and they put their hands, collectively and individually, on William B. Millar of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and said, "Here, this is the biggest laymen's missionary undertaking you ever heard of; it needs you. Just leave the details of your nation-wide laymen's work to your associates for three months, and direct this Sunday enterprise." And Mr. Millar, who had already divided himself between the laymen's Missionary Movement and the Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, moved into the executive's desk at the Sunday headquarters and began to help make things move. In this he had the efficient aid of Mr. George Sunday, the eldest son of Billy and Ma Sunday, and of Dr. James E. Walker, the member of the Sunday organization, whose duty it is to aid in organizing the preliminary work in every city.

But other religious organizations in New York recognized that they could most efficiently serve the purposes of their creation by giving every ounce of their strength to the Sunday campaign. So the New York Evangelistic Committee detached one of its men for the direction of the personal work of the campaign, and more than 3,000 earnest men and women prepared for this important work.

A business man, who had given his time unreservedly to the making of money for a number of years with much success, but who said he "hadn't been giving God a square deal," took charge of the work of organizing the 3,500 ushers who will be needed to handle the crowds at the tabernacle, quickly, with the maximum of comfort and satisfaction. This army of men had to be recruited, organized and trained. So this live business man said good-by to his office for six months and gave his entire time to the work, holding conferences, writing letters in the day time, and every evening meeting men who were enrolling to act as ushers at the meetings. The force of ushers under his direction is divided into companies; different companies will serve at different meetings, so that the work will be divided among the whole body of men serving. The man in New York who is in closest touch with the problem of conducting meetings in shops has taken charge of the shop-work of the Sunday campaign, and Sunday school experts have dropped their customary duties to work for the boys and girls whom it is hoped to reach through the auxiliary meetings, which are a vital part of the Sunday plan.

One of the largest elements in the scheme of the Sunday campaign, and one of the chief sources of its strength and its success, is the work for employed women. This has been taken charge of by women accustomed to leadership in the church and society life of the city, who have given it the first call upon their time. They have worked so industriously in making surveys of the places where women toil for wages that the general chairman of the Sunday Evangelistic Campaign was himself catechized as to the women in his employ and the conditions under which they worked, and the possibilities of holding meetings for them during the campaign, by two earnest representatives of the Women's Committee, who were so intent upon the task in hand that he was unable to explain his own connection with the phase in question until they had finished securing the information they sought.

Altogether more than 100,000 people have been at work in various capacities in connection with the preliminary campaign. Six thousand of these have been organized into three choirs of 2,000 voices each, one being a male choir. Each choir will sing at two services a week, and all will be together for the big Sunday services in the tabernacle.

NEW YORK has already come to realize that the Billy Sunday campaign is an impending reality, and not only that, it has begun to feel the stirring of the spirit of evangelism, which is the real power of the whole movement. The feeling of the multitudes is best evidenced by the declaration of a district leader on Washington Heights that the people of the rest of New York will have to come early or they will find the seats taken by those living in the neighborhood of the tabernacle.

Reports from the revival in Buffalo, where Mr. Sunday's meetings will be ended just in time to begin the campaign in New York, show the usual crowds and the customary good work. The Buffalo Express at the beginning of the meetings said: "It is to the credit of the evangelical clergymen of Buffalo that they have invited Sunday here. It shows their broadmindedness thus virtually to admit that there are spiritual tasks beyond their powers. Though they planted and watered, another must reap the increase. There are sin-sick souls that await Sunday's message, but in general the world turns to him because it is a little tired of material things. It has laid up much in storehouses and barns and now is beginning to suspect that, perhaps, in the process it has saddled itself with fatty degeneration of the conscience."

On February 5 it summed up the first week's work as follows: "Billy Sunday has been in our midst for a week. There is a perceptible change in public sentiment regarding him. Some who went to his meetings to scoff remained to pray—though the trail-hitting has not formally begun. Many others came away with a better opinion of the man's methods and moods than they had been given by advance notices. Still another class have had their criticism stilled or toned down by the discovery that many of the persons to whom they have been accustomed to look as commercial or social leaders of the community are back of the Sunday evangelization movement. All in all, the Express is confirmed in its first belief that the Rev. Billy is going to be mighty good medicine for Buffalo."

IT has been announced that Mr. Sunday's campaign in New York will be carried on as planned, regardless of any international situation that may develop. Speaking to his audience in the Buffalo tabernacle after the breaking off of relations with Germany, Mr. Sunday said: "We have ceased to be Republicans. We have ceased to be Democrats or Progressives. We have ceased to be English or, German, or French or Italian. We must all be Americans, single in our faith and allegiance to America. There are 100,000,000 of us, and we do not want war. But if war must come, we are 100,000,000 people who will back the President to the last ditch and to the last man."

Mr. Sunday is a patriotic American, but he is more than that, he is a patriot of the Kingdom and a general of righteousness. In New York on April 8 will begin a period of training for the service of the King.

[The Christian Herald has arranged to give each week reports of the progress of the campaign including twelve to fifteen sermons to be selected by Mr. Sunday. We have had many letters from subscribers asking where the best reports will be secured. The New York American will publish Billy Sunday's sermons complete each day with all the general news of the campaign. A year's subscription to the Christian Herald and a three months' subscription to the American, except Sundays, may be had for $3.]

The Gospel in the Jungle

THE work of the Malanje district, Angola, West Africa, is branching out most encouragingly. There are open doors on all sides, and requests for teachers come from a distance of 150 miles. We held the McFerson Institute for our native helpers for a month during July and August. There were fifty in constant attendance, and it was a real spiritual feast. We were greatly encouraged to see how a desire for good reading seems to be spreading. Those who attended bought on an average more than one book each during the month. One man gave back his meal ticket and lived on sweet potatoes, brought from his distant garden, for a whole week in order that he might own a copy of the "Peregrino"—Pilgrim's Progress—and several others made similar sacrifices. Never were the people so ready to hear, never were they so ready to make sacrifices in order to provide themselves with teachers, and never have the native workers put up with so much hardship without complaint. Our native work is wholly dependent on local contributions, volunteer service, and special gifts.

The missionary in a heathen village, some of whose people are hearing the Gospel for the first time

ONE of our workers is a poor leper—lepers are not segregated here, but allowed perfect freedom—with toes and fingers slowly being eaten off; but this does not deter him from walking miles every week telling the Gospel story in some half-dozen villages. Another is stone blind. He begged permission to go on an evangelistic tour into the regions beyond, and walked a distance of three hundred miles, led over the circuitous African paths by his son, a boy of twelve or thirteen years of age. He is a bright, happy Christian; his life is a real benediction.

One of our schoolboys, Tim by name, who had been sent out to help organize a little outstation school, came home one day a little over two years ago, saying that he had stopped at a large village about ten miles to the west and gathered the people together for a little service. At its close a man named Alexandre came to him and told him he had heard one of our workers preach a sermon some years before, and had never forgotten it. Now he felt as if he would like to accept the words of Jesus. On the following Sabbath he came to church with Tim, in a short time was converted, and immediately set about telling his friends and neighbors of the Saviour he had found. One of those who listened to him was Pascoal, a middle-aged man, well educated, but whose talents had hitherto been used in the service of the devil. Now he was ready to do what he could to undo past wrongs, and was anxious to be used of God in some way. He and Alexandre began in their own village. Soon they had some twenty boys enrolled for a day school, also a number of girls and women, and Alexandre threw open his house for a schoolroom. In less than six months the village wanted its own chapel and schoolroom, and the people were willing to build it themselves. All the help we have been able to give them at that station has been a second-hand suit of clothes for Pascoal, and the doors and board shutters for the chapel.

In June, when Mr. Kipp went out to dedicate the building, he baptized ten children and twenty-three adults, these latter being received as probationers, all having been under special instructions for at least six months. There were over two hundred people present at the services though not more than half of them could crowd into the little chapel. Not having material for his school work, Pascoal conceived the idea of using banana leaves instead of slate and paper. The boys collect the leaves and make pens from reeds and ink from soot and green tomatoes. The women have not been behind, and where less than two years ago they were sitting about smoking, covered with grease, dirt and a ragged cloth, today their houses are swept and they themselves decently and neatly clothed, learning to read the Gospel in their own language and being married according to the Portuguese law.

We have found our workers living on one meal a day, and that often a scant one; yet not a murmur, only a feeling of gladness that God would permit them to have any part in helping tell of his love to those who know it not.

AT Condo, our farthest outstation to the south, about thirty miles away, the workers have had much to try their faith. The people are of the Songo tribe, considered as almost inaccessible to the Gospel, glorying in their wickedness. One of our Christians moved to this spot. He was weak and frail physically, but a real work of grace had begun in his heart. He found the surrounding country being depopulated from what is known as the "sasswood test." Some one is accused of witchcraft, and in order to establish his guilt or innocence he is required to drink a poisonous concoction. If he vomits it up he usually lives, and is considered innocent; otherwise he is speedily subjected to torture until he is dead.

The drink is prepared from poison-roots with the addition of a powder made from parts of the body of victims who have already died. As soon as the breath leaves the body it is mutilated, the flesh dried and pounded to a powder in a mortar.

This Christian man who went to Condo felt as if he must try and help the people. He could read only very haltingly. He began having family worship, learned a few hymns, and in that way attracted some of his neighbors to his house and began to tell them of Jesus. He worked alone quietly, saying nothing to anyone, until one day last year he appeared with a large box containing idols and fetishes that the people had given him to be burned. He came pleading for a school teacher to go back with him. Just at that time there appeared a man who had heard God's voice in his heart. He had a fair education, but two wives. When he found he could not be a Christian without giving up one of them he had a hard struggle, but in the end won out, and sent away the second, putting up a daub-and-wattle house for her in a nearby Christian village. He signified his willingness to go to the new place over in the Songo, though we could promise him no help. He sold his garden, and with the three or four dollars' proceeds started out with a wife and four small children, with not even a roof over his head. He made a brave start, getting along as best he could with a little help from the people, building a shelter of grass and sticks, and commencing a garden. Seven months passed, months of harship; hunger and hard work proved too much for the wife, and one day a messenger came to tell us that she was dying, leaving a young baby. For the first time the man asked us to give him a decent piece of cloth in which to wrap the dead body, and a little food for his children. In July of this year we had the joy of organizing a small church there, and work is going on in a chapel which the people are building themselves under the direction of the "soba" (chief), who has gone out and cut the poles with his own hands.

"GO: TELL PETER"

An Easter Message for the Times

BY DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT—Mark 16:7. "Go your way, tell his disciples and Peter."

THE focus of our thought is in those two words: "and Peter." Christ's resurrection was "Good morning" to all the disciples; but it was more to this man.

The last time he had seen Jesus was in the judgment hall, where he had thrice denied him. His best Friend, whom he had so shamelessly renounced, was now dead! He said therefore, "I go a-fishing." Why not? The foundations of his faith had vanished into thin air. Why should he not return to his boats and nets? What better was there to live for?

But as he journeyed toward the lake, he was overtaken by certain women, who said, "We went to Joseph's garden early this morning to anoint the body of Jesus, and lo, the sepulcher was empty! And an angel standing by said, 'Go tell the disciples and Peter that he is not here. He is risen and goeth before you into Galilee.'" At these words the heart of the disconsolate man leaped up within him. "Did he make such special mention of me? Are you sure he said 'and Peter'?" On being certified that he had heard aright, he turned back and ran with flying feet to make assurance doubly sure. For if this were true, it could only mean that Christ had forgiven all!

The lesson is for faint-hearted Christians just now. We are living in "a grand and awful time." But the war clouds that hover over us are no blacker than the night that enveloped the disciples after the tragedy of the cross. In view of passing events not a few are saying, "My faith fails me! How could a gracious God permit these things to be?" Has the Lord forgotten to be gracious? We hoped that it was he that should deliver Israel; and, behold the lurid skies! Hearken to the hymn of hate sung by Christians on the firing-line! We will therefore to our farms and merchandise. As for our dream of Christian conquest, the bottom has fallen out of it."

He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh! Be it known by these presents that our God is a great God, who holds the cyclones in his fist. He maketh even the wrath of men to praise him!

"The Lord our God is clothed with might;
  The winds obey his will;
He speaks and, in the heavenly height,
  The rolling sun stands still!"

The keys of death and hell are at his girdle. By the power of his resurrection he speaks, as once he spoke out of the whirlwind, "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? Be still and know that I am God!"

IF there ever was a time for believers to listen at the Oracles, with their hands upon their mouths, that time is now. Never was the Easter message so full of divine significance. Let trembling Peters and doubting Thomases and recreant Demases observe how the fire and the whirlwind conspire with the Still Small Voice to exalt the majesty of the ever living and conquering Son of God.

I. Go tell Peter that Christ by his resurrection has set the seal of divine approval on his power to save; so that even so unworthy a backslider as he may turn and live. He is able to save even unto the uttermost all who will come unto him. Wherefore, return to the service of him whom you thought to be dead but who is alive and liveth forevermore. Back to your calling as a fisher of men!

The forty days which intervened between this announcement to Peter and the Pentecostal miracle were wonderful days for this man. His drooping spirits were so revived that Christ was now everything to him. Listen to him as he speaks to the multitude in the open court: "Ye men of Israel, hear these words: Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know: him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken and by wicked hands have crucified and slain: whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death: because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. Repent ye, therefore, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." In other words, this risen Christ is not only Peter's Saviour, but the Saviour of all who will penitently and believingly come unto him.

II. Go tell Peter that the teaching of Christ is yea and amen. On being required to give "a sign" that should verify his authority he had said, "No sign shall be given you but the sign of the prophet Jonas"; that is, three days in the belly of hell and then life and immortality brought to light! His credentials as a divine teacher were thus hypothecated on his resurrection from the dead. If that sign fail let him henceforth be known as an impostor and charlatan! If his locks be thus shorn then Samson shall be weak as other men. But if the sign be fulfilled, then let the Voice from heaven ring down the centuries, "This is my beloved Son; hear ye him!"

III. Go tell Peter that the Oracles are true. The prophecies concerning One who should redeem the world by plucking the sting of death are fulfilled in Christ. "O fools," said Jesus in his first Easter sermon, "and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Ought not Christ to have suffered these things and to enter into his glory?" Is it not written that the Seed of woman shall bruise the serpent's head? Is it not written that God will not suffer his Holy One to see corruption? Is it not written that his dew shall be as the dew of morning? Thus it is written and thus it must be! To your knees and to your Bibles, therefore, O followers of Christ! Be not taken up by the lips of talkers! The word of the Lord standeth forever! Not one jot or tittle shall fail till all be brought to pass.

IV. Go tell Peter that the work of witnessing for me is not in vain. The fishermen who were called to be fishers of men were not enlisted in a losing cause. They were not commissioned to follow the Cross as the emblem of a dead Christ but of One who was dead and is alive and liveth forevermore; of One who said, "Lo, I am with you always"; of One who personally leads his militant host on triumphant campaigns "even unto the end."

SOUL'S PEACE

"ACQUAINT thyself with God, and be at peace."
  So sang a poet, one whose altar fires
  Oft warm the fingers of faint bards, with lyres
Awaiting heavenly unction. What increase
  Of faith and hope and love that creed inspires,
  So tuned to all the devious desires
That in world's heart cry out, and will not cease!

Play up, play up, ye minstrels, sandal-shod
  With news of healing balm for heads low-bowed;
  A still, small Voice amid the clamant crowd
Comes perfume-like from out the tear-wet sod;
  Clasp close the theme, tear off the tomb-dust shroud,
  And sing aloft, with tone from Sinai's cloud:
"To be at peace, acquaint thyself with God."

CLARENCE URMY.

A FRIEND of Peter's, writing on the resurrection twenty years later, made this conclusion, "If Christ be not risen we are of all men most miserable; our faith is vain and ye are yet in your sins. But now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept! Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

V. Go tell Peter that my Kingdom is destined to cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. The march of progress now begins. The humble Twelve who formed the nucleus of the Christian Church were commissioned to go forth to the conquest of the world. At the close of the first century there were half a million who followed in their train; at the close of the fifth century, ten million; at the close of the fifteenth century, a hundred million; at the close of the eighteenth century, two hundred million; today, five hundred million; and still the royal standards forward go!

It is related that Charlemagne was buried, by his own desire, in a sitting posture, clothed in purple and ermine, his crown upon his head and his scepter in hand. Long afterward his tomb was opened by the Emperor Otho; but, alas! little was left of the imperial glory! The crown had fallen from Charlemagne's bleached brow; his scepter lay in the dust; his royal robes lay in tatters about him. Sic transit gloria mundi. But not so with Jesus. He hath upon his vesture and his thigh a name written, "King of kings and Lord of lords." By his triumph over the king of terrors he is set above all principalities and powers. His triumph is assured; the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

It may be that Macaulay's vision will come true, and at some future time a New Zealander will "stand upon a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's." If so, however, it will be because the New Zealander himself will be the last consummate fruit of Christian culture; a man of higher attainments in moral power than those who reared the fabric of the great cathedral. For Christ is a living and omnipotent force moving the world, through each succeeding sun, into a clearer light; and this will continue until, in the restitution of all things, every knee shall bow before him and every tongue confess in the full glory of his millennial reign that he alone is King over all.

VI. Go tell Peter to watch and pray: for the Son of Man cometh in an hour that ye know not. The frequent intimations of Jesus as to his Second Advent were profoundly emphasized by his resurrection from the dead. The members of the early church made more of it than we. At break of day they did not say "Good morning," but "Maranatha!" At nightfall they did not say "Good night," but "Maranatha." "The Lord cometh!" And no one anticipated his appearing with a clearer hope than Peter, who, more than a quarter of a century after the ascension, wrote, "The Lord is not slack concerning his promise; wherefore, seeing that ye look for his appearing, gird up the loins of your mind, and be diligent, that ye be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless."

VII. Go tell Peter that "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world." The antithesis of faith is pessimism. "There shall be wars and rumors of wars; but the end is not yet." Lift up your eyes to the bright light in the clouds! There is no room for quitters or slackers in the service of the risen and conquering Christ.

When Madame de Gasparin went through the burial-crypts of Palermo, her faith for the moment forsook her. Walking amid the heaped-up bones of centuries, treading upon the dust of the multitudinous and forgotten dead, oppressed by the all-pervading mold and the chill, she was moved to cry like the prophet in the Valley of Vision, "Can these slain live?" But as she came from the Catacombs into the sunshine, turning backward she saw above the archway, Jesu Nazaret, Rex Judaeorum—the words that were written upon the Cross—"Jesus of Nazareth, King of the whole Israel of God!" And thereupon her faith came back as in a sunburst, flooding her heart with unutterable joy.

SO, on the dawn of this Easter day, let Little-faith turn back from his "I go a-fishing" to meet his risen Lord with the cry "I go a-fishing for men!" For, in the light which the luminous shadow of the Cross casts over the empty sepulcher, we know that our labor is not in vain in the Lord. He that goeth forth with weeping, bearing precious seeds, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.

On the evening of his resurrection the Lord came into the upper room, with the glory of his great triumph shining in his face, and lifting his pierced hands said to his disciples, "Peace be unto you!" This is the benediction of Easter; and never was it more needed or more welcome than in these troublesome days.

O morning of the resurrection, break upon our souls, too often overwhelmed by sordid doubts and fears! Dawn upon the universal church, that it may go forth conquering and to conquer in the name of the risen Christ! Shine into the trysting places where we make our feeble prayers, and give us faith to realize that he ever liveth to make intercession for us! Shine into our night of sorrow, that, looking from the darkness of an open grave to the glory of the open heavens, we may praise him in whom life and immortality are brought to light!

The Story of Russia's Revolution

By
ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE Russian revolution which broke out in Petrograd on Saturday, March 10, is not only the most important event in the history of the last three years, but, indeed, in the history of the world in the past hundred years, or since the fall of Napoleon.

In very broad outline, what happened during the past ten days in Petrograd may be thus described:

For some time, bread and other food has been growing very scarce in the capital of the empire, owing very largely to transportation difficulties. In a time of war, such as the present, the difficulties of transportation have been enormously increased, since not only have the wants of the civil population to be supplied the same as in peace, but also the imperative necessities of the armies of six or seven million men which Russia is maintaining at the various points have to be met. Now, an army uses in one way or another seven or eight times as much of transportation facilities as does an equal number of civil population. In regard to food itself, the discrepancy is not so great, though it is commonly believed by military experts that the soldier in the field requires from fifty to sixty per cent. more food than the same man in civil life.

Then there are the special needs of an army in artillery, ammunition, projectiles, etc., the thousand and one things for purely military use which an army must have to be of any service. Thus it can be readily seen what a tremendous additional strain, in a country where transportation facilities were already hardly equal to handling the normal needs of its population, the war has put on such Russian facilities.

The result was that the railroads broke down under the strain, and food could not be brought to the northern cities of Russia in sufficient quantities to preserve their population from hunger. The situation became very acute about Wednesday, March 7, and on that day the first demonstration began in the capital, but this was of little consequence. A few days earlier the government, foreseeing that trouble over the food question was impending, had brought into the city some additional Cossacks and gendarmes and police, as well as quite a number of thousands of newly recruited troops, mostly from the environs of Petrograd. At this time the emperor was "somewhere at the front," and the empress and her family at a Petrograd palace, or in the immediate vicinity of the capital.

Thursday, March 8, the bread shortage became more serious and there was some speaking by bold spirits in prominent places in the city. On Friday, March 9, the situation was but little worse, though on this day the students of the University, who have always played a picturesque part in revolutions on the continent of Europe, went on a strike in sympathy with the demonstrators, and began to agitate.

On Saturday, March 10, the agitation was much greater. The bakers had less bread to sell, and were soon sold out, which compelled a large portion of the population to join the bread lines at the places where the government was making a free distribution of food. Some fighting occurred at various points between the mounted police and the population, but on the whole the situation was not serious. The street cars, however, ceased running. After dark the crowds dispersed largely, and during the night the city was fairly calm.

Sunday, March 11, passed much like Saturday, though the encounters between the crowds and the police became more frequent and more bitter, and toward evening the situation became much more serious and the authorities commenced to use machine guns against the mobs, which were apparently repelled and dispersed by nine o'clock in the evening. The city then became quite calm; but early in the morning, there was fighting in the workingmen's quarters on the other side of the Neva River from the center of the city. A little later the authorities blew up the bridges across the Neva, to prevent the inhabitants of these quarters from reaching the center of the town.

By noon on Monday, March 12, affairs even in the center of the city had grown much worse, and fighting between the police, the loyal troops and the populace was general. After the first few hours the newly recruited troops had thrown down their arms and fraternized with the mob; red flags appeared everywhere, and the actual revolution was on.

All through Monday night, Tuesday, and Wednesday the conflict raged and became very bitter, no quarter apparently being given or asked, and the police being gradually abandoned by the larger portion of the troops who had remained loyal. By Wednesday afternoon, March 14, the mob was in full control of the city and the police had been for the most part killed. The early reports, stating that the revolution had been almost bloodless, seem devoid of truth, as it is now certain that in the fighting between Sunday and Wednesday many thousands must have lost their lives; nor can we take as absolutely true the other cabled reports of the subsequent good order and lack of pillage of private property. We must remember that all our sources of information are controlled by the revolutionists, who not unnaturally wish to give themselves as clean a bill of health as possible.

So much for the revolution in Petrograd. While these things were going on at the capital, another revolution, seemingly independent of the one at Petrograd, but brought about apparently by the same surface cause, was going on at Moscow. There the revolutionists rendered themselves masters of the city with less trouble than in Petrograd, and subsequently affiliated with the provisional revolutionary government set up at Petrograd by the Duma, whereof we will speak later.

In other towns in Russia no marked outbreaks occurred, nor, with the exception of Kharson, have we at the present writing any certainty that any of the other important centers of population have actually affiliated with the revolution. There is, however, little doubt that sooner or later more of the Russian cities will join in recognizing the government of the Duma.

TURNING now to the political events of these days, and only stating facts concerning the accuracy of which there is no doubt, the political situation is as follows:

Prior to March 10—we do not know the exact day—the Czar issued a proclamation proroguing the Senate of the Empire and the Duma, the Russian House of Commons, until the middle of April, from Saturday, the 10th of March. This decree the Senate obeyed but the Duma did not. That body appointed an executive committee under the chairmanship of its president, which on Saturday constituted itself a provisional government and led the revolution. After the revolution was apparently successful, this executive committee formed a provisional cabinet composed of the following persons:

Premier, President of the Council and Minister of the Interior—Prince George E. Lvoff. Foreign Minister—Professor Paul N. Milukoff. Minister of Public Instruction—Professor Manuiloff of Moscow University. Minister of War and Navy, ad interim—A. J. Guchkoff, formerly president of the Duma. Minister of Agriculture—M. Ichingareff, deputy from Petrograd. Minister of Finance—M. Tereschtenko, deputy from Kiev. Minister of Justice—Deputy Kerenski of Saratoff. Minister of Communications—N. V. Nekrasoff, vice-president of the Duma. Controller of State—M. Godneff, deputy from Kazan.

These declared their principles of government.

Russia's New Bill of Rights

THE Provisional Government in Russia has issued the following appeal to the people:

"Citizens:—The executive committee of the Duma, with the aid and support of the garrison of the capital and its inhabitants, has succeeded in triumphing over the obnoxious forces of the old regimé in such a manner that we are able to proceed to a more stable organization of the executive power, with men whose past political activity assures them the country's confidence."

"The new Cabinet will base its policy on the following principles:

"FIRST—An immediate general amnesty for all political and religious offenses.

"SECOND—Liberty of speech and of the press, freedom for alliances, unions and strikes.

"THIRD—Abolition of all social, religious and national restrictions.

"FOURTH—To proceed forthwith to the preparation and convocation of a constitutional assembly, based on universal suffrage.

"FIFTH—The substitution of the police by a national militia.

"SIXTH—Communal elections to be based on universal suffrage.

"The Provisional Government desires to add that it has no intention to profit by the circumstances of the war to delay the realization of the measures of reform above mentioned."

The cabinet is obviously, from what is known of the men composing it, an attempt at a compromise between the various shades of opinion and factions in the party opposed to the old regimé, and while containing one or two men with cool heads and moderate liberal opinions, is in the main made up of either extremists or idealists. For the moment all seem to have submitted themselves to its government.

In the meantime, the members of the old imperial cabinet who had not been fortunate enough to seek safety in flight were arrested, and the fate of several of them is at this time in doubt. At Pskoff, about 100 miles south of Petrograd, the Emperor was visited by a deputation of the Duma who represented to him the situation at Petrograd, and according to the accounts we have, either persuaded or forced him to abdicate the throne.

Nothing at present appears to be known as to the attitude which will be adopted toward the provisional government by the active army on the various fronts, but this attitude is expected to have great weight in determining the future form of government Russia will adopt. Such, then, omitting the self-apparent fables and the obvious errors in the news of the two or three days—for no news of any kind came to us from Russia for nearly a week—appears to be a summary of the facts as far as they can now be established of the great upheaval in the former realm of Nicholas II.

How Czar Nicholas Abdicated

CZAR NICHOLAS, knowing that revolution was imminent, hastened back from the front to reach Petrograd. But his train was halted early in the week and turned back to Pskoff. Here emissaries of the Duma came to meet him and told him that the army as well as the civil government had yielded to the revolution.

"What is desired that I should do?" the Czar asked.

"Abdicate the throne," was the reply.

The Czar quickly decided and said: "It would be very hard to be separated from my son; therefore I will abdicate in favor of my brother, in behalf of myself and my son."

A proclamation of abdication had been prepared in advance. The Czar now signed it and gave it to the representatives of the Duma. He then returned to General Staff headquarters.

The Grand Duke Michael, thus made Regent, a little later issued a proclamation that he would hold the regency pending an election and the creation of a new government.

Meanwhile, the revolution had overtaken the Czar's family in the imperial palace at Petrograd, when all of the children but Grand Duchess Marie were down with measles. Grand Duke Alexis, the twelve-year-old erstwhile heir, who was reported dead, still lives, but is very ill. His attack of measles was complicated by the breaking out of the old wound in his foot, dating from the alleged attempt on his life about four years ago. He was reported as likely to recover. Grand Duchess Tatiana is in a serious condition and oxygen has been administered.

News of the disaffection of the troops reached the Empress on February 27. The palace guard was mobilized for defense, the riflemen remaining within the palace with machine guns, while outside were armored motors. When the Tsarskoe-Selo garrison revolted, a collision with the palace guards appeared inevitable. The Empress went to the commander of the guard and said:

"My desire is that you do not fire."

This was taken as an order to surrender, which he did. Soon revolutionary troops entered the palace, and officers went to the apartments of the imperial family. To these the Empress said:

"Let there be no violence. I am now only a sister of charity at the bedside of my afflicted children."

Mme. Catherine Breshkovskaya, who is known as "the grandmother of the Russian revolution," has been invited by Mr. Kerenski, Minister of Justice in the new Cabinet, to return to Petrograd. Mme. Breshkovskaya has passed thirty years in exile, most of the time in prison. She escaped twice, only to be recaptured.

The Czar's Abdication Manifesto

THE imperial manifesto in which the Russian emperor announced his abdication and that of his son:

We, Nicholas II., by the grace of God Emperor of all the Russias, Czar of Poland and Grand Duke of Finland, etc., make known to all our faithful subjects: In the day of the great struggle against a foreign foe who has been striving for three years to enslave our country, God has wished to send to Russia new and painful trial.

Interior troubles threaten to have a fatal repercussion on the final outcome of the war. The destinies of Russia and the honor of our heroic army, the happiness of the people and all the future of our dear fatherland require that the war be prosecuted at all cost to a victorious end. The cruel enemy is making his last effort and the moment is near when our valiant army, in concert with those of our glorious allies, will definitely chastise the foe.

In these decisive days in the life of Russia we believe our people should have the closest union and organization of all their forces for the realization of speedy victory.

For this reason, in accord with the Duma of the empire, we have considered it desirable to abdicate the throne of Russia and lay aside our supreme power. Not wishing to be separated from our loved son, we leave our heritage to our brother, the Grand Duke Michael Alexandrovitch, blessing his advent to the throne of Russia.

We hand over the government to our brother in full union with the representatives of the nation who are seated in the legislative chambers, taking this step with an inviolable oath in the name of our well-beloved country.

Liberty in Russia

THE abdication of the Czar Nicholas, forced by peaceful, almost bloodless, revolution, marks even more than the passing of the régime in Russia; it is the death of absolutism in its last stronghold.

Russian liberalism, represented by the Duma, is finally in complete possession of the very government in which autocracy has long been most rigidly maintained and was supposed to be most securely entrenched.

Not the least amazing feature of this peaceful revolution is the fact that it has been openly gathering force for months, and at last succeeds, in the face of the largest army that any government ever had under arms and in the midst of the greatest foreign war in which a nation ever was involved.

These, however, were reasons for, not against, the success of the revolution. While the food situation was made the basis, it was not the cause, but only the immediate opportunity; the cause and the work of organization lie farther back. Tremendous advance upon absolutism was marked by the creation of the Duma, the people's council, in 1905. Enormous pressure has been exerted in opposition to the present war. And now the Duma, steadily strengthened by increasing popular approval, not only has refused to obey the imperial rescript to dissolve, but is resistlessly proceeding to create a new government that will represent the people. The people already are in complete political power, and the army is with them. The Romanoff dynasty exists no more. Liberty and free government are set up in Russia.

What effect this momentous change will have upon the great war is as yet merely a matter of speculation. The Entente Allies, through their newspaper organs at home and here, are trying hard to convince themselves and the world that it is a triumph for more ruthless warfare. But the natural presumption all lies on the other side. It is indeed difficult to believe that the people and the army of Russia want any more war beyond what is still needed for defense. Imperialistic policies have crumbled with the Czar's Ministry.

World Hunger

AT NO TIME in human history has the food situation, on such a colossal scale, been so serious as it is now. Last year's universal crop shortage, which threatens to be followed by a still more alarming shortage this year, constitutes a problem so vast as to be staggering. Already all the combatant countries are in the grasp of partial famine, which may become absolute a few months hence. The food blockade—the weapon which the Powers themselves invoked—may prove their undoing. In trying to starve out their enemies, they find the blockade recoiling upon themselves and also upon millions of non-combatants and neutrals.

An American woman, Madeleine Doty, has told the story of hunger in Europe in a simple, straightforward fashion that compels belief. She has done more than many of her contemporaries to enlighten Americans regarding economic conditions. Without being specially conscious of it, she has furnished one of the strongest arguments yet adduced to show why America should remain at peace, in order that it may be the better able to render the noblest service, both during the war and afterward. Miss Doty was one of a little band of American women who went to Europe and studied economic conditions at close range. In all the countries visited she found suffering; whole populations living on short rations, food at famine prices, and in many places unobtainable. In Germany, France and England, conditions everywhere reflected the stress and suffering of war.

Summed up in a nutshell, this is the situation today: an aggregate of 25,000,000 men in the armies of the war, and all facing a decidedly precarious food outlook, but—over 150,000,000 non-combatants engaged in a deadly battle with Hunger!

Picture it if you can: Hunger sitting at the head of the table in innumerable homes; whole populations struggling to keep body and soul together; hunger in all faces—the haggard, hopeless, unsatisfied look that marks the famishing. Does it surprise you that the starving Russian people should have broken out in a revolution which may easily prove contagious? There is no nation that will not break down the barriers of authority when Hunger commands.

For two years, the world's food has been wasted, its tillage neglected, its crops reduced. The world crop of cereals in 1915 was the largest ever known. It was 500,000,000 bushels in excess of all previous records. Nature was kind that year. But in 1916 she gave us 386,000,000 bushels less grain than the year before. The warning went unheeded, the land was neglected—the men were needed for the great war. And now this year, with granaries well-nigh empty, and reserve stocks sadly depleted and with a world crop outlook that experts assure us will be less by 1,000,000,000 bushels than that of 1912, we are face to face with world famine. Our own land will have little or nothing for export from the coming crops, if the forecasts come true. Even if the wanton destruction of food by the war were to cease now, the most fortunate among the nations will have barely a scant enough food supply with which to sustain life till the next harvest.

Never has there been a winter so dark with sorrow, suffering and death as that now closing. Never has the race of men borne such heavy burdens as today. Why then should this nation, which is now standing at the open gate of great opportunities, hesitate as to the duty which lies so clearly before us? Not war with any one of the frenzied combatants, but a war against world hunger is calling us to service. Our relief commissions have spent millions in succoring Belgium, and millions more in helping stricken Poland, Serbia, Galicia, Armenia and Syria. The only way in which our nation can now help to bring back peace and sanity to a distracted world is to keep on striving, with multiplied endeavor, to save those peoples from the horrors of death by hunger and disease.

It is for these reasons, and with this end in view, that the Christian Herald has encouraged every movement for peace which the President and his advisers have undertaken. And although at times the prospect has seemed dark and unpromising, we have steadfastly held to the belief that God would not permit this nation, conscious of its own high purpose, to be dragooned into war against its will. Europe needs us, and needs our help. Let us stand steadfastly by our ideals, and work and pray and give more and more, that our hopes may come to a glorious realization.

Sound and Safe Evangelism

PASTORS and evangelists will welcome the efforts that are now being made by the Commission on Evangelism to establish a standard of principles which should be recognized by revivalists and spiritual workers generally. Rev. Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, secretary of the commission, announces the action taken in a communication just issued. Briefly summarized, the standard which is submitted for the acceptance of the evangelists of America stipulates (1) that they teach salvation through Jesus Christ, the Divine Redeemer of the world; (2) that they work in cooperation with committees of pastors; (3) that sensational and exaggerated reports be avoided; (4) that results of meetings be indicated as (a) decisions (commonly called conversions) and (b) reconsecrations; (5) that the Bible be used in the aftermeetings to explain the way of life and in asking inquirers to confess Christ before men; (6) that the pastors adopt some suitable plan, after each campaign, to conserve the results by getting the converts to join the churches.

These suggestions are such as should be welcomed by all evangelists; indeed, we believe many of the best-known and most successful have adopted most if not all of them in their work long ago.

There are some who may be disposed to criticize the suggestions of the commission on the ground that in endeavoring to standardize spiritual work it is attempting the impossible—that the true evangelist has a divine call and that his work is something that cannot be rigidly conformed to a fixed standard, even for the sake of efficiency. There is no force in such arguments, however, for nothing is further from the purpose of the commission, as we interpret it, than to hamper the evangelist. Its design is rather to help him in every way, to make his work still more effective, and to allow ample scope for those striking individual qualities that are essentially his own. Moody, with his rugged oratory, his unusual but telling sentences, his offhand illustrations, and his many idiosyncrasies, would have welcomed such a standard, and he recognized the need of sound evangelistic methods when he laid the foundation of his training school. Chapman, Biederwolf, Torrey, and many others, eminent in the same field today, will unite in according cordial support to the commission's recommendations. In Bible times the "schools of the prophets" were the training institutes which gave to the evangelists of those far-off days not only the standard doctrine but the best basis for efficient work. It is well that in our own day we should elevate the evangelistic profession by investing it with all the influence and authority that rightly belong to it.

The Evolution of Patriotism

IF WE turn the telescope of imagination backward, we can see a primitive man, with his mate and wolfish children huddled behind him, while he wields a club in their defense. His own were all he had mind or heart capacity to care for. In his ignorance and selfishness but one step beyond that of the brute, primitive man lived his own little life for his own little group. It was the seed of patriotism.

Mankind has progressed, and the individual's interests and sympathies have extended beyond the mere family or clan to community and national interests and allegiances. A celebrated phrase which marks the culmination of this wider patriotism was uttered a century ago by Stephen Decatur: "My country, right or wrong!" It was the expression of an age in which the world was in a tumult of wars.

Mankind progresses further, and the individual's interests and comity of brotherhood overreach the national boundaries and extend even beyond the seas. Patriotism, on wide-stretching wings of understanding and sympathy, floats far today. It soars over the lines not only of nations but of races and religions. The telegraph, the locomotive, the cables, the fast steamships are bringing the whole world into one community. To the intelligent American citizen the Chinaman is as close a neighbor now as a man in the next county was a century ago.

Here advancement was marked by the higher phrase of Carl Schurz: "My country! When right, to keep it right; when wrong, to set it right."

And we have advanced in the craft of government. We have learned that the highest rulership is not over other men but over our own cupidity and passions. We have learned that war is waste, that might cannot determine right, and that unbridled wrath and force constitute no true test of justice or of any righteous interest.

In the new day that is to dawn when the sun emerges above the black clouds of battle-smoke, the intelligent individual of every land will awaken to a world citizenship.

Defense Against Temptation

WHAT is the greatest temptation to young men in New York City? A minister has asked this question and received replies from many distinguished persons. One says "Women"; another says "Extravagance;" another says "Swell clothes"; and others say this, that and the other,—until one might believe that the young man's only choice is as to the temptation to which he must surrender.

Now, the simple fact is that, in New York City as elsewhere, the young man's danger lies not so much outside himself as within. Every soul carries within itself the counterpart of the sin to which it yields. If one be not fortified in his own mind and heart and soul, any of the temptations listed, or all of them, and more besides, may find him easy victim.

Our thoughts and motives, our desires and longings are forces which find their fellows. They cause us each to rise steadily upward or sink steadily down.

The young man's soul is his citadel, and his greatest security is in the divine sentinel which guards the gate of the heart.

Eleanor Porter's New Serial

NEXT WEEK'S Christian Herald will contain the opening chapter of the new serial story "The Road to Understanding," by Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna." It is a splendid story, as the Editors of the Christian Herald, having been privileged to read it, can testify. Indeed, we regard it as the finest she has yet written, which is saying much, for Mrs. Porter's "Pollyanna" is one of the best sellers everywhere. "The Road to Understanding" is a Love Story, of course, but it is worked out in a delightfully piquant way. You will like it from the very first chapter, and if you wish any of your friends or acquaintances to have a good time, just show them this announcement and tell them to subscribe for the Christian Herald. They will be more than glad they did so before they have got half through with the adventures of Helen and her friends. Mary Green Blumenschein's beautiful illustrations give a fine artistic setting to the story, and her idealization of Helen is excellent—just the kind of bright and lovable American girl all like to count among their acquaintances. Do not fail to read this Serial in next week's issue, April 4.

Heroic Coast Guards Perish

NINE men of the Coast Guard cutter Yamacraw perished in attempting to rescue the crew of the oil steamer Louisiana, which was stranded on Winter Quarter Shoals off Ocean City, Maryland, on March 5. In response to calls for help, nine men of the Yamacraw's crew hurried out to the Louisiana in a small boat, fighting their way through mountainous waves. Their little craft had just reached the side of the stranded tanker when a huge wave rolled the life-boat completely over. The crew of the Louisiana, powerless to render aid, watched the life-savers perish miserably. The cutter launched another life-boat, and it was capsized and the two men in it were drowned. Despite the death of their eleven comrades, four more of the Yamacraw's crew volunteered to try to rescue the Louisiana's sailors, but their boat, badly battered, was hurled backward and capsized on the bar. They were rescued by the lifeguards, and taken to the Coast Guard station at Ocean City. Four other ships, the Florida, Camaguey, Huron and Esperanza, hurried to the aid of the disabled tanker, and all on board were saved except one man, who jumped from the ship, was pulled into the boat of the life-savers, which was overturned, and he perished with all the rest in the boat. From one end of this land to the other, no more heroic men live than our sturdy life-savers along the coast. Their business is to look danger in the face and laugh at it as they push on and out to rescue the lost. The eleven Coastguard men knew that they were likely to be drowned in that terrific storm. What did they care? Their only desire and determination was to save the precious lives they feared would perish if they did not rescue them. A country is rich that has such heroic champions. They lost life, but found it in the affectionate heart of the nation which rightly cherishes the memory of those brave souls who, in laying down their lives for others, were true exponents of the spirit of the Master who said: "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." (Matt. 10 : 39.)

Remembered Carrier

RECENTLY in a severe storm a pastor walked into the kitchen and said to his wife, "My dear, it is a bitter day. Why not have a cup of hot cocoa ready for the postman as he comes along our rural free delivery route? They say he drinks liquor, and perhaps it will prevent his taking a drink of whisky when he gets home." "That is a fine idea," responded the good wife; "and why not a pail of warm water for his good horse?" The snow was deep and the carrier was over an hour late, but a careful watch was kept and man and horse received the warming beverages. As the carrier handed the cup back he said to the pastor: "I have been on this route eighteen years, and this is the first time any one ever came out with anything to warm me up." In his route he passed four churches, as many parsonages and scores of homes of good but thoughtless Christians. An occasional hot drink in winter and a cold one in summer might save many of the public's faithful servants from the fateful cup. It would at least make life more worth while. This was a little thing, and yet a big thing for the pastor and his wife to do, a beautiful example to set to their flock. The hot cocoa with the rich cream and sugar was nice, but the thing that made it the sweetest was the love that was put in it. There is nothing that so sweetens and warms a human soul as love. The pastor and his wife loyal to their Master had an ear attentive to these words of his: "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward." (Matt. 10 : 42.)

Wolf-Hunt Between Trenches

A WOLF-HUNT in which both German and Russian soldiers joined is described in correspondence from the Polish front. Parties of Russian and German scouts met recently and were hotly engaged in a skirmish when a large pack of wolves dashed on the scene and attacked the wounded. Hostilities were at once suspended and Germans and Russians instinctively attacked the pack, killing about fifty of the wolves. After the hunt the soldiers separated, each party returning unmolested to its own trenches. If the tongues of wolves could speak our language they might say the tearing in pieces of a wounded soldier now and then or a live lonely sentinel on his beat is trifling as compared with men made in God's image, bearing the name of his Son, killing each other at the rate of a million and a half a year, riddling with bullets, tearing with iron shells, suffocating with poisonous fumes, and burning to death with liquid fire those against whom they had no personal grievance, not one of whom had a word to say as to whether the war should be fought or not. The wolves might say, "The men in the trenches had just as well let us alone, cease tearing each other to pieces, and go home to the arts of peace." From the earliest time the wolf has had a mean reputation because it lives upon rapine, is violent, cruel, bloody and voracious. Moses in describing the violent warlike spirit of the Tribe of Benjamin likens it to a wolf: "Benjamin shall raven as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil." (Gen. 49 : 27.)

Discourtesy Costs Telephone

THE editor of a weekly paper published by the Master Bakers' Federation had the telephone in his sanctum disconnected, and took legal steps to compel the company to put back the phone. The Upstate Public Service Commission of New York rendered a decision that the company had had justification for disconnecting the instrument; that the editor had been rude and harsh in his language to the central office, and that he had so persisted in his ill-tempered demeanor that the company had a right to take out his phone or that of any other subscriber who knowingly allowed him to speak over his phone. Union N. Bethell, president of the New York Telephone Company, said: "Examples of extreme discourtesy are very rare. Though the decision of the commission establishes a precedent, it is doubtful if a similar case will ever occur." A. W. Casler of the company said: "Ninety-five per cent. of the people who use the phone are considerate and courteous." Sometimes the trouble is at the other end of the wire. Sometimes the ill-temper and sharp talk and sudden cutting off of the connection occurs at the "central." But these are the exceptions, and these impatient, snappy operators soon lose their job. As a rule the telephone girls are intelligent, patient, polite and obliging, wonderfully so, and the court has declared what it thinks of any rude or ugly treatment of them by a subscriber. There is a rule of human nature which did not seem to work in the case of the man who had his telephone taken out. It is this: "A soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger." (Prov. 15 : 1).

Gold Seekers of '49

THE formal and somewhat pathetic action of disbanding the association of "Pioneers of '49," which took place at the home of the secretary, George W. Hotchkiss, Evanston, Ill., brought together a dozen men, the only surviving members of the association, which was formed in 1899, with a membership of over one hundred and fifty. The pioneers of '49 were the forerunners of the spread of the United States westward, and as such have been history-makers. It was these devoted gold-seekers who first blazed the trail across the plains and brought the East in actual contact with the West. Others had preceded them, it is true, but in a large measure they were responsible for the quickness with which the Western country was subjugated and opened up for the safer traveling of the public and the fortune-hunter When gold was discovered on January 18, 1848, in digging a raceway near Coloma, Calif., the news traveled with incredible rapidity. Soon thousands of gold-seekers were starting for the new Eldorado overland, by the sea, across the Isthmus of Panama, and around Cape Horn. Those who traveled across the continent made use of every known conveyance; even in several instances brave and hopeful men started out on the journey of 2,000 miles trundling a wheelbarrow, which contained their provisions and supplies for the long journey. In recent years the Association has held an annual reunion, but the living members are now so few and so widely scattered that it was considered best to disband. At the final reunion the members built a camp-fire and cooked their dinner, just as they did in the days of '49. Along with and following these pioneers were men seeking farms, a source of wealth greater than the mines of gold, and men seeking souls richer than farms or mines, important as they are; and of the great West which they traversed it can be said: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose." (Isa. 35 : 1.)

Sold Flour at Cost

A LARGE flour manufacturer at Binghamton, New York, announced the other day that owing to the high cost of living he would furnish flour for the men working in his mills at cost. As there are twelve thousand of these workmen employed, there will be quite an amount in the aggregate of saving for them, and as the price of flour is so high the concessions to the men in the discount made will be quite a considerable item of credit to the proprietor. Every cent of the discount will be made good within the year by the increased product of the mills, for kind and generous treatment in any line of endeavor strengthens the spirit, quickens the muscles and increases the product. It was not the desire to get increased service out of his men that led the miller to make the discount—that would have been a cheap motive—but a desire to make the load easier to carry during this period of murderously high living. They had wheat in olden times much the same as that we have now. There is this reference to bread made from wheat flour: "And the woman had a fat calf in the house; and she hasted, and killed it, and took flour, and kneaded it, and did bake unleavened bread thereof, and she brought it before Saul, and before his servants. (I Sam. 28 : 24, 25.)

Denmark Gone Dry

ACCORDING to a dispatch from Copenhagen, Denmark has forbidden the sale of all spirits and other alcoholic liquors. The order calls for returns to be made on all stocks in the country. It was an economic measure rendered necessary by the war. When the king of Denmark signed the prohibition bill for Iceland he said he should sign such a bill for his own country if its parliament saw fit to pass one. The report says the order for nation-wide prohibition is only temporary. So was that in Russia; but its advantage was so manifest that prohibition is now a settled law of the empire. The nations of Europe are shouting at each other, but they are all turning their guns on John Barleycorn. Nations as well as individuals are asking this question with the answer, "Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine." (Prov. 23 : 29, 30.)

Bagdad, "City of the Caliphs," Captured

BAGDAD the Beautiful, the "City of the Caliphs," the joy of the whole Oriental world, has fallen under the attack of a British force. On March 11 the culminating point was reached of the campaign which opened early in 1915, when Anglo-Indian troops landed at the head of the Persian Gulf and moved up the Tigris River. The object of the earlier expedition was to deal a blow at the German project for the construction of the Berlin-Constantinople-Bagdad Railroad, and if possible to prevent the completion of the road. General Townshend, who commanded the expedition, however, fared badly. After various reverses, he was compelled to surrender with upwards of 10,000 troops at Kut-el-Amara, on February 26, 1916. Later, a new expedition was sent out, under Major-General Frederick Stanley Maude, and with a much larger force of troops than the first. Various powerful Bedouin tribes, breaking away from Ottoman rule, joined the invading army. Gen. Maude made rapid progress along both sides of the river Tigris and, finding the Turks lacking in artillery, he succeeded in driving them back to within three miles of Bagdad. The Turkish leaders called for reinforcements, but it is believed very little, if indeed any, new troops were able to arrive in time to be of service.

The city of Bagdad itself has long been regarded as unsuited to defense against modern military methods. No details of its capture have been received, but it is indicated in the dispatches that the Ottoman troops, holding a position on the eastern bank of the Diala, were surprised by the enemy, which had crossed the river in force and bridged the Tigris at a point which offered a favorable opportunity for attack. The Turks were driven back to within three miles of Bagdad and apparently the occupation of the city was effected by the British with very slight resistance and few losses. The Turks seem to have succeeded in extricating their forces without suffering a disastrous blow, although the loss of Bagdad as the base of Turkish military operations in Asia is an important one.

A view of the main street in Bagdad, near which city desperate fighting is reported as having taken place between the British and the Turks. The building at the extreme left of the picture is Army headquarters; that in the farthest background (with Star and Crescent above it) is police headquarters, and at the right are the government and municipality buildings

Bagdad has had a place in history for several thousand years. Within its environs are pointed out the tombs of Joshua, Ezra, Ezekiel, and the Well of Daniel. An antiquity is claimed for it reaching back beyond the times of Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon. Upon the present site stood a far older city, which had a splendor and influence that have immortalized it in song and story. In 763 A. D. the old city, then in decay, was rebuilt with stones from the ruins of Ctesiphon, also known as Madain, a famous Assyrian capital, some distance southeast. Bagdad was afterward enlarged and beautified by Harun al Raschid, the ruler whose exploits have been immortalized in the "Arabian Nights." It has many times been a center of warlike struggle: Jenghiz Khan sacked it in 1258, and Tamerlane in 1400, and it was conquered by the Turks in 1638. Its present population is probably between 150,000 and 175,000, being a mixture of many nationalities,—Persians, Armenians, Turks, Jews, Arabs and Kurds.

General Maude's force is estimated at 150,000. It has advanced at phenomenal speed, for two reasons—first, in order to forestall the arrival of Turkish reinforcements, and second, to get to Bagdad ahead of the Russian force. It would not have accorded with British hopes had their ally captured the prize; for Russia has long had an eye to an outlet to warm water, and would probably have been indifferent whether it could be reached either by way of the Persian Gulf or the Dardanelles. At the time of Bagdad's fall, the Russian army is believed to have been probably 150 miles from Bagdad, advancing from Hamadan.

The captured city lies on both banks of the Tigris River, in the very heart of the ancient Bible land of Mesopotamia. Its streets are narrow, crooked, and dirty. The buildings are mostly of yellowish brick, the monotony of their hue being relieved by beautiful colored tiling, especially in the courts and interiors. Many groves of date-trees and other palms give the city a picturesque appearance, to which the numerous mosques add greatly. There are many enclosed gardens; indeed, the whole vilayet (of which the city is the capital) is famous for its orchards and splendid gardens. A very large section outside the city itself, however, is desert, due to the neglect of the irrigation canals. In recent years these canals have been repaired, and it may yet come to pass that, with modern methods of cultivation, the former attractions of Bagdad may be revived, and it may again merit the distinction which won it the name of "City of Orchards."

The Gift of Peace

SUNDAY, April 1. John 14 : 27. "My peace I give unto you." But a soul may possess the peace of Christ and yet know no end of trouble. Indeed, 'round about these words of our Lord there are other words which look like unfriendly presences frowning in apparent contradiction. "The world hateth you"; "They shall put you out of the synagogue"; "Ye shall weep and lament"! These are very strange ingredients in a life which is supposed to be possessed by peace. The peace of Jesus is evidently not synonymous with the quietness of settled circumstance. It is not the peace of plenty. It is something which is independent of these. It can coexist with turbulence. It can go hand in hand with want. The circumference of life may be the realm of storm, while its center is the home of a profound serenity. The peace of Jesus is the harmony of a central and spiritual relation. It is union and communion with God. The soul is at rest. Its vagrancy is over. It no longer seeks a new doorstep every night; it has found a settled home.

If peace were only a matter of quieted circumstances we might win it for ourselves. We could seek and find it in social reconstructions, in juster laws, in more enlightened economy, in ampler comforts, in a larger purse. But if vital peace is supremely a matter of spiritual relations how is it to be found? And especially if it is the restoration of a broken relation, who can reset the disjointed limb and put it right again? This peace is not the work of the will. It is not an acquisition of human ingenuity. It is a gift, and it is the gift of the Lord Jesus Christ. "My peace I give unto you." He came to bring the wanderer home. He came to change our shifting, rickety tent for a settled abode. He came to end the appalling divorce which is the work of sin. He came to put us right with God, and to transform a sinful and restless vagrancy into a holy peace.

And if we receive the Saviour's gift of peace our life will have two distinctions; and these are only two of the many royalties which belong to the reconciled soul. First of all, we shall see things tranquilly. We shall have an eye "made quiet by the power of harmony." We shall therefore see things as they are; they will not be out of proportion; nor shall we be deceived by any borrowed plumes. "The eyes of them that see shall not be dim." And, for a second thing, if we have the peace of Jesus, we shall do things tranquilly. This central peace will affect our activities on the circumference. There will be no fuss, no feverishness, no panic. No energy will leak away in fretfulness and wasteful care. We shall have the strength of stillness. For God's peace, that surpasses all our dreams, shall keep guard over our hearts and minds in Christ Jesus.

Within the Gates

MONDAY, April 2. Rev. 22 : 14. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." What mystic word is there to serve us as a password at the heavenly gates? There is none. Fitness is the only open sesame, yet not fitness in the sense of worthiness, only fitness in the sense of willingness. Obedience is fitness. Desire to do the will of God is fitness. Humble penitence is fitness. He that willeth to will shall not only know the doctrine, but shall enter in through the gates into the City.

"Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise." What gates are these? The gates of the church, of God's earthly Zion. Our presence as reverent worshipers in the courts of prayer and praise is evidence of our desire to do his commandments.

In the parable of the prodigal son it is written of the elder brother, the jealous, pouting brother, "He would not come in." This must be written of many concerning the gates of entrance to the church of God, "They will not come in." The key to the gate is in our keeping, the gate here and the gate there. The key lies within the realm of the human will. "Whosoever will, let him come." "Wilt thou be made whole?" "I will." "Be thou clean."

Human Testimony

TUESDAY, April 3. John 15 : 27. "Ye shall also bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning." It is by all counts a most wise and benevolent arrangement that the Author of our faith has embraced in his plan of salvation the element of human testimony. Faith in Christ is "of the operation of God" (Col. 2 : 12). Luther expresses the common experience of all Christians when he says: "I believe that I cannot by my own reason or strength believe in Jesus Christ or come to him, but the Holy Ghost has called me by the Gospel, enlightened with his gifts, sanctified and kept me in the true faith." For the creation, propagation, and preservation of saving faith the testimony of the Holy Ghost through the Gospel is the one indispensable requisite. But even this word must be proclaimed by human agents.

In his gracious operations God does not intend to enter into direct contact with the heart of man by his majestic power. His Holy Sprit works man's conversion through means. Through the Word and ordinances of grace his testimony reaches the heart of man. But the testimony of men who have learned to know and love Jesus is added for corroboration. The disciples had lived in very close and intimate fellowship with the Lord during his earthly ministry. They had received during this intercourse indelible impressions of his truth, wisdom, grace, and power. These impressions the Lord wants published. What God has done to one person for his reclamation from sin and the effects of sin, he is willing to do for others. The knowledge which one disciple has gained in his fellowship with Jesus, the convictions which have been formed in his heart on religious questions, may serve to incline others to make a trial of the study of Jesus, or to strengthen his wavering confidence. We are not to believe on the authority of a mere man, but we are thankful for the testimony which a good witness renders for any matter in which we are and ought to be interested.

Love

WEDNESDAY, April 4. I Cor. 13 : 13. "The greatest of these is love." Love is the cure-all for the ills of life. It heals hurts of wounded pride, it cures the malady of a terrible temper. Love is not easily provoked; it holds the soul in a serene composure, suffering long. Christ's love suffered on the cross for mankind. Love gives itself to rescue the loved. Love helps carry the burdens of the beloved. Love is kind to the poor, the sick and the needy; it oils the creaking door and irritating joints of the soul. "Love envieth not." It wants others to be happy, even to have better things than the lover has. Envy is called the filthy slime of the soul, the daughter of pride, the tormentor of virtue, the instigator of revenge, murder and war.

Perfect love will banish envy from the soul forever. "Love vaunteth not itself." It does not, every time it lays the golden egg, rise from the nest and cackle. Love is humble, unobtrusive, preferring the elevation of others to itself.

"Love seeketh not her own." It means "others first." The music of the soul is in loving. Her happiness is in making others happy. Even self-denial is joy when others are benefited. It was said truly of our Lord, "Himself he could not save." He must save others first. "Women and children first" was the watchword on the Titanic. "Others first" is the Christian's motto everywhere. Love does not become excited by spiteful words nor irritated by the little insects of a biting, stinging tongue. Think of the patience of love; she beareth all things without a murmur, endureth all things without complaint, believeth all things good of another, thinketh no evil, harbors no gossiping stories, but rejoices in the true, the beautiful and the good. Love is a composite picture of all the graces. May all the world of mankind become enamored of her beauty!

The Power of an Endless Life

THURSDAY, April 5. Heb. 7 : 16. "Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life." The Bible has much to say about immortality; much directly, and much more by inference. It exhales the very breath of eternity. The turning of its leaves is like a zephyr from the unseen world. It is like a great picture with eternity for its background. It is like a great symphony, whose keynote is the endless life. The background of the Gospel of Christ is spacious; nay, it is spaceless, immeasurable. The keynote sounds above all harmony and discord: "This is life eternal." There is not a single epistle of Paul, pastoral or personal, in which the immortal hope does not burn like a beacon on the shore of his ocean of thought. The epistle to the Hebrews, while not the work of Paul, is thoroughly Pauline in spirit and tendency. John, who wrote a considerable portion of the New Testament—five of its twenty-seven books—says quite as much relatively about eternal life as does Paul. He says it differently, but quite as distinctly. Paul writes like a lawyer, John like a lover.

Who is it that promises us endless life? None other than Jesus of Nazareth, the supreme revealer of immortality. Patriarchs had hoped and poets had dreamed, but Jesus declared, affirmed, and finally exemplified the reality of the endless life. There are many arguments for immortality, but just one proof: the risen Christ. He died and was buried, but he lived again and still lives. This is the meaning not only of every Easter festival but of every Sunday—the defeat of death, the victory of our Lord over the arch-fear, the abolishment of death. Is death a wolf? Then his fangs have been drawn. Is death a specter? Flash this light upon it, and it vanishes into thin air.

Holiness

FRIDAY, April 6. Isa. 6 : 3. "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory." The scene which Isaiah has depicted is a glimpse of what, according to Rev. 4 : 8, is going on continuously in heaven. In all ages the "Thrice-holy" has been regarded as a reference to that inscrutable mystery in the divine Being; the Trinity in Unity. It is the theme of the angels' endless choral. With the host of cherubim and seraphim the church on earth joins in this hymn of adoration. Over the whole earth this song resounds, one company of singers taking up the strain when the other leaves off. The song emphasizes, in particular, the characteristic of holiness in God. This is that divine attribute which impresses a sinner most, and reminds him of his original state in paradise and his grand destiny. For holiness and in holiness God created man. Unto holiness fallen man was redeemed.

To apply the merits of Christ to sinners and to make their lives holy after the pattern of the immaculate Jesus is the endeavor of the Paraclete. The Trinity meets man altogether on the ground of holiness, and in the practice of holiness the unfathomable mystery of its ineffable Being is best studied. We may never exhaust by nicely drawn definitions the transcendent truth of the three distinct Persons in one undivided and indivisible Essence, but we come in personal contact through grace with each person, and live, so to speak, into this mystery. Thus, too, the whole earth becomes full of the glory of this wonderful God to us. We observe that his purposes determine the life of the entire race, and are carried out against all opposition from the forces of evil.

Partiality of Parents

SATURDAY, April 7. Gen. 24 : 4. "But thou shalt go unto my country, . . . and take a wife unto my son Isaac." Abraham feared that his son might marry a Canaanitish woman. He therefore sent Eliezer to his kindred, who returned with the beautiful Rebekah, whom Isaac married. Thirty years after, twins were born to them, Esau and Jacob. Esau, the elder, was heir to his father's wealth and position. But Esau, because of his hunger one day, after a hunting-trip, sold his birthright to Jacob for a mess of pottage. Esau was Isaac's favorite son, partly because of his hunting proclivities. He was therefore determined to pronounce his final blessing upon him. Rebekah, loving Jacob the better of the two, managed to deceive her aged and blind husband, so that he put his hands upon Jacob, ratifying his birthright as head of the household. Esau, on his return, was so angry over the loss of his father's blessing that he left his home forever.

Aside from this act of favoritism and fraud, Rebekah is considered one of the most faithful wives and truest women of the Bible. Her name is commemorated in every civilized country of the world in words more lasting than those chiseled on marble. In the Book of Common Prayer we read that "as Isaac and Rebekah lived faithfully together, so these persons may surely perform and keep the vows and covenant betwixt them made."

The moral is that parents should not indulge in great partiality for any of their children if they wish harmony to prevail in the family life. Jacob became a wanderer from home as well as Esau, living in fear of his brother for many years, thus leaving his mother, who had tried to do so much for him.

If Rebekah had trusted God to fulfil his prophecy concerning Jacob, that the elder should serve the younger, how much happier her life would have been! We should never do wrong in order to help God bring his purposes to pass.

FROM ONE WOMAN TO ANOTHER

Conducted by MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

The Little Foreign Woman

A LITTLE foreign woman went out of her tenement room to buy onions from a pushcart vender. The East Side does most of its marketing by the pushcart method, and the streets are always swarming with venders and ringing with their cries. So the little foreign woman didn't have to go far from her door before she found what she wanted.

Many of the inhabitants of the slums do not have a very great command of our language. But the little foreign woman managed to make the pushcart vender understand what she wanted. As he slipped the onions into a small paper bag she handed him three cents—what she had been in the habit of paying. Her surprise was great when he told her, roughly, that the onions in the bag were worth eighteen cents.

A difference of fifteen cents—it doesn't seem so much, does it? And yet probably to that woman it meant food for the rest of the day—bread, perhaps, for her hungry children. To that woman it meant the end, almost; and, like an animal at bay, she turned on the pushcart man.

HAVE you ever seen a cat jealously guarding her kittens—snarling, and biting, and scratching if a marauder came too near? It was the same instinct—the thought of her children—the mother instinct—that made the little foreign woman shake her clenched fist at the street vender and suddenly, beside herself, overthrow his pushcart. It was the thought of a baby asking for food that made her shriek her defiance in his face.

Out of the defiance of that little foreign woman—all in a week's time—a great movement has sprung up. The women of the East Side have banded together into a body called "The Mother's Anti-High Price League." Their headquarters are not easy to find, but I wandered through narrow streets filled with slush and mud until I came to the offices that they have taken in the very heart of the most congested district. And there I talked to two women, obviously different as to nationality and religion, but with the same great idea.

"This movement of ours," one of them told me, "is not a boycott—no, indeed! It is merely a great throb of indignation on the part of the mothers who cannot, no matter how they economize, obtain enough food to satisfy their families. It is a cry to the government asking that food prices be standardized—regulated as other prices have been regulated.

"You see," she continued after a pause in which she answered the telephone and gave directions to several women who had come in to ask questions, "you see, the grocery men, in this part of the city—and in other parts of the city, too—have a scale of prices. If a woman who looks as if she does not understand food values comes into the store they charge her infinitely more than they do a woman who looks sophisticated.

"A colored woman came into a shop where I was standing the other evening. She asked for potatoes, and was told that they were eight cents a pound. When weighed, the pound was found to contain just three medium-sized potatoes.

"'My!' screamed the colored woman, 'how can we live?' and she ran out into the night. I never saw her again."

A JEWISH woman, hearing that Governor Whitman was in town and knowing of no way to reach him, went to the Waldorf and asked for him. She was arrested for creating a disturbance and was taken to jail. When she was arraigned before the judge at the night court she looked up defiantly into his face.

"Why are you here?" asked the judge.

She told him.

"Were you sent up to see the governor by any society?" he questioned.

"No, your honor!" said the woman.

"Were you sent up by any person?" persisted the judge.

"No, your honor!" repeated the woman.

"Then," thundered the judge, "why did you go?"

The woman was thin and pale. But she towered as she faced her questioner and a flush of anger tinted her white cheeks.

"Why did I go?" she answered fiercely. "Why did I go? I went because we are starving. My man—he works for little money. And we have five children — bloodless children. They need meat, milk, butter, eggs! But not once this winter have they had them. And now we cannot have potatoes—now we can hardly have bread. That is why I tried to see the governor!"

The judge looked down at the woman.

"What," he said, "would you do if I sent you to prison?"

And then the woman laughed long and loud—a laugh that was hysterical, a laugh that bordered, almost, on madness.

"I don't care if you do put me in prison!" she hurled at the judge. "I don't care if I do go to prison! At least you'll have to feed me, there!"

THE women—the mothers of the New York slums—are bordering on hysteria. They are cold with rage. They are desperate—defiant—reckless. For the weight of the last straw is crushing them.

"Have you any special message to the readers of the Christian Herald?" I asked one of the women at the headquarters of the Mothers' Anti-High Price League.

She looked at me thoughtfully.

"Your paper goes into the farming community—the small town—yes?" she asked me. "Then you may give the women of the Christian Herald this message from the mothers of our city slums. Tell them that it is the duty of every woman to write to the representative from her district, her congressman, and ask him, as her representative, to do what he can toward lowering prices. Tell the women of the Christian Herald that they cannot realize the conditions in a large city where great multitudes are at the mercy of—sharks. They have apples and potatoes, barrels, perhaps, of them—your readers. We buy our potatoes and apples by the pound. Tell the women of the Christian Herald that this is a serious movement—a real Christian movement in which color and race and creed play no part. This is the message of the Mothers' Anti-High Cost of Living League to your readers."

This is the message. And I have seen, myself, that it is true.

A Woman Worth Knowing

MISS ROSE YOUNG—well known in New York City as a newspaper woman—has been chosen by Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt to direct the expenditure of the Mrs. Frank Leslie $1,000,000 fund for the cause of equal suffrage. Miss Young has already leased quarters in the city from which she will direct the activities of a traveling suffrage school, that may, in time, be enlarged to several divisions, and she has made arrangements to distribute a part of the fund, on the Carnegie plan, to state organizations which are conducting suffrage campaigns.

A Few Household Hints

Dishwashing

IF the woman who dreads dishwashing would follow these directions she would obtain better results in a shorter length of time.

"In placing a pile of dishes in the pan, lay them in, reversed, or face down. The water will then have more chance to get at the soiled surfaces than it will if they are placed as usual, face up. Use a mop in the right hand while holding the dish in the left. This makes washing the front and back of each article an easier task. Then place with the left hand in the drainer—thus never letting go of the dish until it is completely clean. The less changing of hands the less time will be spent before the task is finished. If you use soap powder in dishwashing it will dissolve the grease, and the hands need only be kept in the water for a few moments."

Salt

Do you know that salt will clean willow furniture, that a hot stove can be scrubbed with salt, and that, if rubbed on stained crockery, salt will prove very effective? Salt water is also good for some plants, salt and vinegar will clean brass, salt and lemon will remove ink-stains, and fine salt, sprinkled on a woolen cloth, will polish a mirror.

If You Mislay Kitchen Utensils

A long strip of canvas with big and little pockets, when hung on the wall, may hold some thirty or forty items. A camper or a housewife who moves often may roll the slip and pack it very easily.

New Uses for Common Things

Gasoline cleans a clock, ammonia freshens a dingy carpet, floor wax will keep a door or window sash from sticking, and a pail of hay and water absorbs the disagreeable smell of new paint.

Dried Fruit

When there is not enough mincemeat to fill the pie, when there is not enough fresh fruit for the pudding, and when the jelly is too thin, cut dried apples or peaches fine, wash them, and add them to the dish. The substitution will not be noticed.

When Washing Woolen Blankets

Do not, when you are washing blankets preparatory to laying them away for the summer months, rinse them in clear water, as it will make them hard. To maintain their original softness, rinse them in soapy water.

The Use of Bicarbonate of Soda

A pinch will remove stains from saucepans, if placed in water and boiled in them. If added to milk in warm weather it will keep it sweet; and added to meat, when stewing, it will make it tender. Silver goods rubbed with leather on which a little is sprinkled will look as good as new. A small amount added to water in which greens are boiled will keep them a good color. A pinch taken as a powder after meals is a certain cure for indigestion.

"I See by the Papers" that—

THE factory women in both this country and in Europe advocate the wearing of bloomers and overalls while at work. They say that it is easier, and in the case of munition plants—safer, not to be bothered with skirts.

—That the mothers of children living in the crowded districts of New York have announced their determination to keep their children away from the public schools until the city has done something to remedy the prohibitive food prices.

—That the woman suffrage advocates in the state of Maine have won a fight of nearly forty years for the submission of the suffrage question to a popular vote. The Senate, acting in concurrence with the House, passed unanimously a resolution providing for a special election on September 10, to act on the adoption of a constitutional amendment granting suffrage to women.

—That the woman suffrage bill has been passed in the lower branch of the Indiana legislature. It was previously passed by the Senate, and now goes to the governor. The bill gives women the right to vote for presidential electors and practically all state officers except governor and secretary of state.

—That the Educational and Industrial Union has conducted a series of conferences on "Professional Opportunities for Women." There were four conferences, held once a week, on the following topics: Nursing, Secretarial Work, Social Work, and Home Economics.

—That the ancient art of printing cloth has been revived by a talented woman who, after taking many prizes in contests, has gone into the work on a business basis and is making a great success of it.

—That the peace societies of a great city have removed the names of several well-known suffrage leaders from their boards. They disapprove strongly of the stand that the suffrage party has taken in the preparedness movement.

—That many settlement workers are considering the advisability of teaching housekeeping, in model apartments, to the growing girls and little mothers of the slum districts. It will arouse the pride and ambition of the girls, say the settlement workers, to be able to learn needed lessons in a home atmosphere.

From One Woman to Me

SHE passed me on the street today.
Her dress was worn, her hair was gray;
The very shoes upon her feet
Were old and shabby. But her eyes
Were friendly as the springtime skies,
And, oh, her smile was kind and sweet!

She passed me on the street today
And, as she passed, I felt a ray
Of sunlight touch my very heart.
I had been sad, and set apart
From other folk. . . . I had been blue
But when she passed with shabby grace
I murmured, as I saw her face,
"If she can smile, why, I can, too!"

She passed me on the street today,
A stranger woman, worn and gray,
Ah, poverty had touched her life;
Want she had felt, and care, and strife.
The very shoes upon her feet
Were ragged. But her smile was sweet
And filled with cheer, and undefiled!
And I, if we two ever meet
Beside the shining throne on high,
Will lift my eyes to God and say,
With all the angels standing by,
"She passed me on the street, and smiled!"

THE HOUSE OF GOODRICH: ITS CREED

GOODRICH is RUBBER; RUBBER is GOODRICH.

They are ONE the world round in household and mill; in man-packed city, or wherever civilization touches finger-tips with semi-savagery.

A remarkable domination of an industry by a single institution, this supremacy of Goodrich. A striking imprint of a name on a world product from its raw to its finished state.

Goodrich IS Rubber; Rubber IS Goodrich. Why is it?

Look to that frieze of buildings which here frames these pages for your quickest, most compelling answer.

Though it lists but a part of the fifty-seven buildings gathered at Akron on the Goodrich site of 101 acres, it does help picture to you the largest and most complete single Rubber Manufactory in the entire world.

WHAT buildings are shown here suggest the great size of Goodrich, but they fail to show you the BEEHIVE of life and industry they house.

They can but hint at the 3,772,329 square feet of floor space inside them with a capacity of more than 20,000 employes.

They say nothing about 16,000 horse power from Goodrich boilers, and 10,000 horse power from Goodrich dynamos that drive belts, and wheels, and rollers by thousands, and set the great plant aglitter with 20,000 lights.

Still less do they voice the 350 telegrams and 9,000 telephone calls that pour daily into them from the four corners of the world; or speak of the 18,000 pieces of mail handled every week day in Goodrich's own post office.

And least of all do they tell of the more than 4,000 distinct Goodrich products, a meagre general classification of which is listed in our frieze.

An excusable shortcoming, this last, for not even a Goodrich executive officer knows EXACTLY at one time ALL the Goodrich products that go to make up the 160,000,000 pounds of rubber goods Goodrich annually ships to the peoples of the earth.

You, and thousands of you, know you walk on Goodrich TEXTAN SOLES: BUT HOW MANY of you know that when you step on rubber mats and matting you are TWICE walking on GOODRICH RUBBER?

To live forty-eight years and be merely big, is to be but fortunate. The test of a manufacturing institution is how much it has written into the advance of the industry, and what benefits it has given to humanity. The factory that scores FIRST in ideas and NEW PRODUCTS is the true LEADER.

FIRST in the development field by seniority, Goodrich has always KEPT FIRST by learning new ways of the earth's great material mystery—RUBBER—to fulfill the needs of mankind, often anticipating the needs.

It was no coincidence that Goodrich made the FIRST clincher automobile tire in America, the FIRST cord tire, and the FIRST solid rubber tire for automobile trucks, buggies, and carriages. As Goodrich's business is rubber, its organization has always automatically met the NEWEST need of rubber.

BUT of finer significance this: While Goodrich builded itself, ALWAYS a leap and a bound ahead of the rubber industry, it builded itself into the confidence of people by integrity of manufacture and FAIRNESS of MARKETING.

Here is a triumph of the Goodrich CREED, the moral marketing force that rounds out Goodrich scientific knowledge, experience, and skill of workmen trained in the Goodrich way.

It is a creed which avows a covenant not to market an experiment till practical test proves it worthy of the Goodrich name.

It is a creed content, willing, to give the buyer the benefit of Goodrich's huge purchases of raw material, and Goodrich's secrets of rubber compounding.

It is a creed which backs up a Goodrich rubber band with the same jealous watchfulness of the Goodrich reputation as a Goodrich tire.

That is Why Goodrich is Rubber—Honest Rubber—to the world.

Neddie's Question

By
LOUISE PLATT HAUCK

"ABIDE with me; fast falls the eventide."

The clear tones of the soprano floated up to the landing at the head of the stairs. Neddie, stiffly erect between his aunt and the strange man who, it seemed, was uncle Leonard from Portland, listened intently.

"The darkness deepens; Lord, with me abide."

The darkness was very deep in his mind, and Daddy wasn't there to clear it away with the dear sunshine of his presence. Daddy was dead, they told him. That was Daddy in the long gray box down in the parlor, with the heaps and heaps of flowers over it. Neddie didn't believe it, and he wouldn't look. He didn't know at all what it meant to be dead, but that it was full of horror and mystery was very clear to him. The confusion of the last three days—the journey to his aunt's house in the city, the strange people coming and going, the tears and hysterics and hurried planning—it all seemed like a bad dream to him. But the worst of it all was the steady ache of longing for Daddy. Why, it was only four days ago that he and Daddy had had their splendid snow battle in the front yard of the farm. How glorious it had been! Daddy had built a big fort and entrenched Neddie behind it; and he had been the besieged city, while Daddy was the invading army, and battered down the walls with cannon-balls of hard white snow. How happy they were when they came in, rosy and panting and hungry as wolves, for the waffles Black Nora had for them! He remembered how he had sat for his usual half-hour before bedtime on Daddy's knee, planning a still stormier battle for the next day. They had talked of the ice on the pond too, and Daddy had said gravely that it was high time Neddie was learning to skate—a suggestion which had sent him to bed with his head full of excited anticipation for the morning. And when morning came——He had run into Daddy's room to dress, and Daddy was still asleep. And Neddie couldn't wake him. And Black Nora had come. Oh, how Nora had screamed when she bent over his Daddy! Nora had called to the milkman, and he had galloped his horse into town for the doctor. The doctor said, "Heart disease," and "what relatives should he telegraph for?" And late that afternoon came Aunt Amelia, sobbing and laughing by turns, and had to be put to bed by Black Nora. Neddie remembered how he had crept about the house that evening, lonely and miserable and wondering when Daddy was going to wake up and look after him. And then they said that Daddy was dead. What was "dead"? Would it keep Daddy away from him long?

Aunt Amelia did nothing but cry every time she looked at him, and say, "Poor fatherless, motherless child!" Neddie knew that he was motherless. Nora had told him that was why Daddy lived way off by himself on the farm; because he couldn't bear to see people after Neddie's sweet mother left him. Neddie knew how Daddy sat for hours and hours sometimes with her picture in his hand, not moving or speaking. It made Daddy feel bad, so Neddie was sorry that he was motherless. But fatherless! How could he be fatherless? Daddy was his father, wasn't he?

Neddie's small brow puckered into a hard knot as he sat through the anthem, puzzling over these complicated questions. The music died softly away, and from below the dry, harsh tones of the minister ascended. Suddenly Neddie started forward in his chair, tense with excitement.

"If a man die, shall he live again?"

That was what the minister was saying. Daddy had died, that was clear; but—would he live again? Neddie's whole soul was in that question. He bent forward, listening with every nerve for the answer.

"Dear friends, we are told in Holy Writ that he that loseth his life shall gain it; that Christ by the remission of our sins has secured to us eternal salvation. In this dark hour, is it not a consolation to you that mourn to know that your loved one is safe in Christ?"

THE bewilderment did not clear from Neddie's face. Why didn't he say whether Daddy was going to live again or not? Remission—salvation—consolation—those were words too big for a little boy who had got only as far as "John can roll the hoop" in his Reader. Well, maybe he would explain better after a while. Patiently he sat through the long, dry sermon, gravely attentive to each word. But when it was over and Dr. Winter had said Amen, his question was still unanswered.

And then Uncle Leonard had drawn him into a bedroom and closed the door. As they sat in silence Neddie heard the muffled roll of carriages on the pavement outside; then slow, heavy footsteps; and sobs from Aunt Amelia in the hall. When they came downstairs once more, the shiny gray box was gone, and all the flowers, and Daddy wasn't there! Then there was a wild, frantic time when Neddie beat against the door in the effort to get out and find Daddy; when he screamed shrilly that Daddy hadn't gone, and that he wouldn't stay and be Aunt Amelia's little boy! It merged into a horrid blur at last when Neddie, sick and exhausted with crying, was put to bed. The doctor came and gave him some medicine, and soon after he grew very sleepy. He slept and waked and sobbed and drowsed again for nearly a week, and somewhere in that blurry time he learned to accept the fact that Daddy was dead; that Daddy was gone; that Neddie must live with Aunt Amelia until Daddy came back. Aunt Amelia didn't say anything about Daddy coming back; nor did Uncle Leonard in the short time he remained before returning to Portland. But Neddie himself added it, pending the time he could get his all important question answered.

He had asked Aunt Amelia that first day of his illness:

"Aunt Amelia, if a man die, shall he live again?"

Aunt Amelia had gasped and run to the telephone to tell the doctor that Neddie was in a fever and out of his head. When Uncle Leonard came to bid him good-by, Neddie had repeated his question to him. And Uncle Leonard had patted his head and said:

"There, there, old fellow, don't bother your little brain about that," and pressing into his hand a shining five-dollar gold-piece, had left him.

After that Neddie grew cautious and bided his time. But when he was about once more and had learned the way to the big parsonage where Dr. Winter lived alone with Mrs. Winter, Neddie went to call on the minister. The visit had been a bitter disappointment and a miserable failure. The thin, dry minister had talked to him in a thin, dry voice about the Atonement and the Blood of the Lamb and the Remission of Sins, and then had asked him if he knew his catechism and if he were a good, obedient boy, and dismissed him.

ONCE more did Neddie try. He sidled up to his teacher's desk (nobody but Daddy had ever taught him before!) one morning before school and put his question to her squarely:

"Miss Grayson, if a man die, shall he live again?"

His cheeks burned now at the thought of the little shriek of laughter she had given and the tone of amused dismay in which she said:

"If you aren't the queerest child, Edward! What are you going to say next?"

He slunk back to his seat and resolved never to let the words cross his lips again. But always his mind groped about for the answer which should make of life a thing to be borne with the best degree of cheerfulness he could muster, or a weight under which to sink in utter despair.

Week after week passed, and still Daddy did not come. And now it was Easter. Last Easter he and Daddy had hunted the eggs together, and he had eaten three hard boiled for breakfast, and Daddy had pretended to hear him crow. Oh, Daddy, Daddy, why don't you come back to your little boy that wants you so! It seemed to Neddie that the ache in his heart grew bigger and sorer every day. Uncle Leonard had said that it would get easier after a while, but oh, it didn't!

Easter morning he followed his Aunt's black-garmented figure up the aisle to her pew in church. Everywhere was the scent of lilies, everywhere their silvery whiteness against the green. There was a subtle hint of happiness, of springtide joy in the air, and in a vague, unhappy way Neddie resented it Everybody was happy; everybody seemed to have what they wanted but just his own self. How joyously the voices of the choir caroled forth:

"He is risen! He is risen!"

That was the burden of the music, of the prayer, of the sermon.

"Christ is risen from the dead!"

Christ is risen, but where was his Daddy? There was no thought of irreverence in his little mind as he pondered the question. Of course, it was well that Christ had risen; but it was his Daddy he wanted!—his strong tender arm about him, his broad shoulder on which to lean a tired head, his loving voice saying, "Sonny Boy!"

"If a man die, shall he live again?"

There it was, the old haunting question, whose answer he could never obtain. Bitterly he listened as the dry, thin minister expounded his dry, thin doctrine of salvation; wearily he followed his aunt back to her home. There was no Easter joy nor hope; not even Easter peace for him.

LATE in the afternoon he slipped away to the green acre where they told him his Daddy lay. He had been there before with Aunt Amelia, and had listened unbelievingly as she pointed to a certain mound and told him it was his father's grave. He did not believe it now, but somehow he seemed a little nearer to Daddy than he did at home. There was a lady sitting on a low stone near the spot he sought. Her hand rested against a small marble cross upon which Neddie spelt out laboriously,

"Marjorie, aged eight years."

"Why, that's how old I am," he said involuntarily. The lady turned.

"Are you, dear? And what is your name?"

"Neddie Cunningham."

She glanced at the inscription of the stone on the next grave.

"Your father lies here, dear?"

Neddie nodded somberly. It was of no use to explain. She probably wouldn't understand any better than Aunt Amelia, or Uncle Leonard, or the others.

After a little the lady said softly,

"It is hard to wait, isn't it, boy?"

"Wait, ma'am? What for?"

"Why, to see them again. You to see your father and I to see my little girl."

Neddie's breath came fast.

"Is your little girl dead too?"

"They call it that, dear."

"And you really do 'spect to see her again?"

"I know that I shall see her again. Why, Neddie dear, I couldn't bear it for one minute if I thought she had gone from me forever!"

Neddie crept closer and laid a cold little hand on hers.

"Oh, ma'am! Maybe you can answer my question!"

"What question, laddie?"

"If a man die, shall he live again?"

The lady looked down into the sad little face raised to hers. She saw through the deep, dark eyes straight into the depths of pain and loneliness within. She reached out tender arms and gathered him into her lap.

"Now, dear boy, tell me all about it!"

Founder of Seventy-Five Churches

DR. EDWARD O. GUERRANT, who recently passed away in the midst of his ministry and full of years and honors, built seventy-five churches for his people, the poor and illiterate mountaineers of the Appalachian mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee. He was a man of wonderful personality and power, and gave up a life of promise to throw himself, with all the enthusiasm of his Huguenot blood, into the work of opening the eyes of those "other children" of the Kingdom, who had sat so many years in spiritual darkness.

A young cavalry soldier during the Civil War, he was a member of Morgan's famous command, and rode through the isolated coves of those mountains, where he was deeply impressed with the intense sadness of the people, their loneliness, their poverty and their ignorance. He was greatly attracted by their hospitality and their traditions. Most of them were direct descendants of Scotch-Irish ancestors, and for generations had remained in those mountain fastnesses while their pioneer relatives crossed over from Virginia to settle in the rich lowlands beyond.

After the war he cherished the vision of opening up that mountain region and bringing the people in touch with the outside world. As the first evangelist of the Kentucky Synod, he found his opportunity; but so enormously did the work develop under his hand that the Synod feared that it could not support it. It instructed Dr. Guerrant to retrench and not build so many churches. He resigned as Synodical missionary, declaring that if no other source could help, God could pay for the schools and churches and missionaries. And God did.

Dr. Guerrant organized the Soul Winners' Society, and in the sixteen years following he personally raised $175,366.95 for financing the work, $14,000 a year, all by prayer. Contributions poured in from all over the world, even from distant China and the Hawaiian Islands. Many warm friends North and East contributed liberally. Talented men and women left their comfortable homes to follow Dr. Guerrant into the mountains and teach the schools. He gave his own life unselfishly to his great task. He climbed mountains where even a horse could not go; he forded turbulent streams; he slept in cabins where families of fifteen lived in one room; and he won every heart with his cheerful, sunny disposition, and above all with his evident sincerity and his earnest desire to better their condition. Thousands were won to the Gospel under his preaching.

The work Dr. Guerrant did for one county alone—"Bloody Breathitt," the seat of fearful feuds, where human life was held so cheap that the click of a trigger was the signal for a harvest of killings—deserves the lasting gratitude of his state. Here in the county seat, Jackson, he placed his first church twenty-three years ago. All through the surrounding country are schools and colleges, radiating from Jackson and the Lees-McRea College, located there.

In memory of Dr. Guerrant's work, the name of the wonderful Mountain Mission he founded has been changed from "The Soul Winners" to "The Guerrant Inland Mission." The new church at Jackson, Ky., is to be called "The Guerrant Memorial," a permanent tribute to the founder of seventy-five churches among the mountains and valleys of that region, the darkness of which he had illuminated with the light of the glorious Gospel.

REV. Z. CHARLES BEALS writes from Hochow, via Nanking, China: "My circuit here covers over 400 square miles, with a large population. I am the only resident missionary in this district. We are organizing now for a complete evangelical campaign for this territory." Mr. Beals needs the help of local native preachers, and any reader who is interested in this new evangelical movement in a needy district of the great Chinese Republic, is invited to help. This missionary has baptized fifteen persons recently, and has now over fifty inquirers preparing.

SIXES

A New Size Now
And Hundreds of Extras

A new-size Mitchell—Mitchell Junior—is in all showrooms now.

It is for those who want a 5-passenger Six, roomy and powerful. And who want the Mitchell standards and the Mitchell extras in it.

So now you can get in Mitchell two sizes and two prices, and choose from eight styles of bodies.

Found in Mitchells Only

There are 31 extras in this year's Mitchell, most of which nearly all other cars omit.

There are bodies built in our own plant — our exclusive models.

There is 24 per cent added luxury this year, paid for by savings in this new body plant.

There is 100 per cent over-strength in every vital part. In the past three years we have doubled our margins of safety.

Built for Lifetime Cars

This double strength in every part is to give you a lifetime car. Over 440 parts are built of toughened steel. All safety parts are vastly oversize. Parts which get a major strain are built of Chrome-Vanadium.

Gears are tested for 50,000 pounds per tooth. Engines are tested for 10,000 miles, to prove that they stay new. In two years, not one Bate cantilever spring has broken.

That is what it means to get this Bate-built car.

Cost Us $4,000,000

These Mitchell extras, on this year's output, will cost us $4,000,000. That is why other cars omit them.

We make them possible by factory efficiency. John W. Bate, the great efficiency expert, has cut our factory cost in two.

He has built and equipped this mammoth plant to build this one type economically. For less than anyone else could build a like car.

Go see the result. See the extras which these savings buy. See how complete, how strong, how handsome they make the Mitchell cars.

See them and then decide if you want a car with or without them.

LONG-LIFE Kokomo BICYCLE TIRES

FOR more than twenty years KOKOMO has led the way in the construction of bicycle tires. The first American bicycle tire to be known as a "studded tread" was a KOKOMO. The first bicycle tire using a motorcycle weight woven fabric in its construction was a KOKOMO. We believe that the first bicycle tire using automobile-weight cord construction was a KOKOMO.

There are seven tires bearing the KOKOMO name—each of the seven differing in style and price. There are various treads and colors. Among these seven tires you will, we are confident, find one to meet your entire approval from every standpoint.

If you should choose the Kokomo OXFORD at $2.50 you will get a generous $2.50 worth of service. If EVERLASTER should be your choice you will receive full value in service, comfort and convenience. So with all KOKOMO Tires. For the price at which they are sold we believe there are no better tires made.

The Easter Message of Immortal Life

By George D. Allison, Ph.D.

AGAIN Easter comes with its message of spring beauty without, and of renewed life within. Never was Easter more needed than now when men have been slain by thousands and innumerable homes are clouded with grief. As we think of the ghastly trenches where noble young men are facing death daily, we ask the old question of Job, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Christ's answer is plain and convincing.

But how are you and I to make it clear and lasting to the minds of children? Do you, fellow teacher, realize how little your boys and girls appreciate the meaning of death?

Still, we must see that it is well that childish hearts are not overwhelmed by sorrow. Let us try today to give our pupils a foundation faith in immortality and the everlasting care of God, so that when the reality of physical death dawns on their minds they will already have a sure stay.

A Home in Sorrow

TRY to establish a point of contact for the story of Bethany, by finding a counterpart in your class. It will be unusual if you do not find some child with the experience of a bereavement in the family. Ask how mother felt, or older sister, perhaps. Then, if you can, get the child's own feeling about what had happened. So you will be able to teach better.

Then ask if any one mentioned Christ the Comforter or prayed to him. So lead to the story of the sisters at Bethany. Their brother had just died. Now Jesus was coming, and Martha ran out to him, saying, "If thou hadst been here, my brother had not died!" Yet Jesus could have come. He knew best, and allowed this sad event to happen. He knows best today, and in spite of our entreaties, our loved ones slip away into the other world.

In a home in sorrow we must be very kind and loving to one another. We must also speak of Christ and talk to him in prayer. And since so many are sorrowing, we must be very sympathetic and friendly as we go through life. Every heart hath its burden. Christians are ministers of comfort, heralds of hope.

The Sympathy of Jesus

MANY had come to comfort the sisters at Bethany. Friends are a help at such a time, though they may feel powerless. Jesus came. Jesus cared. When he stood by the sepulcher, "Jesus wept." Harsh teachers, who have said that we should not mourn, overlooked that. Jesus wept because of sorrow and sympathy. When we weep today in anguish, he looks down upon us with tender pity. Because we are human we must weep. But we ought not to sorrow as those without hope.

Perhaps that is why Jesus groaned in spirit—because there seemed no note of trust in God, no upward look, no cry of faith. It is too bad that so often Christian people give themselves up to grief without a hint of confidence in God's plan.

"Alas for him who never sees
The sun shine through the cypress trees,
Who hopeless lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play."

A Minister of Hope

"THY brother shall rise again." Ask your scholars why Jesus spoke as he did. He did it to awaken hope, to elicit faith. Belief in heaven is a powerful comfort and gives strength to endure. We must not fail to remind one another of it. So Jesus, when he was going away, reminded his disciples: "In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you."

"Believest thou this?" asked Jesus gently. Yes, she believed it in a general way. That's the trouble with so many of our beliefs! They are not vivid and vital enough. She supposed he would be raised up at the last day. It was to her a vague theory, that was all. But Jesus wanted her to realize that, for a Christian, death is only an incident; that through faith in him, we cannot really die. We are sharers in his life, and do not await some vague, long-deferred resurrection, but live on in his fellowship.

The Greatest Promise in the Bible

"I AM the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

Teachers, see that every scholar learns that, word for word. It has been called the greatest promise in the Bible. By it our loved ones are delivered from the grave and walk in His presence. St. John and St. Paul have not been dead these two thousand years, but rejoicing in seeing Him as he is. If we believe it, nothing can hurt us, nothing can make us afraid. We shall honor this body and seek to use our present life to his glory; and when the time comes to make the change, we shall lie down calmly, expecting to awake in his likeness.

My friends, let us ask ourselves if we believe this with all our hearts. Or is it a conventional acceptance that will not do us any good when our nearest and dearest go before us into another sphere? Let us lay hold on the life eternal, as Paul urged Timothy to do (I Tim. 6 : 12).

Jesus himself is the resurrection. We feel in our hearts that he could not die. And because he lives, it is only a step in thought to add, "We shall live also." We cannot believe that a brutal gang of soldiers could put an end forever to that marvelous personality. Such a thought is incredible. Jesus lives! But the Gospel unites us with him and makes us partakers of his glory. He promises: "He that heareth my word and believeth on me hath eternal life."

The Master Is Come and Calleth Thee

PICTURE to your class Mary sitting inconsolable in the house. Her sister and friends have tried to arouse her in vain. Now Martha slips in "secretly," because she knew Mary would want to see Christ alone, and whispers her message, "The Master is come and calleth thee." Get them to tell what she would be likely to do, and then read the story again. How real it all is: her grief, her eager rush to Jesus, her overtaxed nerves giving way as she bursts out, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died."

What a difference Martha's message brought—Jesus had come! And not too late after all. It is never too late for Jesus. Have we ourselves been sitting hopelessly, as though there were no such Almighty Friend near? Perhaps you, dear reader, need to take this as your Easter message: "The Master is come and calleth thee." Come out of gloom and despair into hope and faith and life in His presence.

Perhaps you are the Martha whose trust Jesus has quickened. Have you not a sister, a friend, who needs you to bear this message to him or to her? Jesus calls. He calls to life that is life indeed, to life more abundant, to life that can never die.

Springtime thrills with his summons. Out of the cold winter of unfaith and death, into the sunshine of grace, let us make today a resurrection day indeed.

High Lights in the Lesson

THIS story teaches the resurrection as a present experience. We are to be risen with Christ to newness of life, dead to sin but alive forevermore to righteousness and love. It applies to you and me now, not simply, as Martha said, at the last day.

"Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus." Individually and with regard to their diverse temperaments and needs! So God like a true Father loves all his children. Their number is no hindrance to his interest. That is why he destines each of them for immortality. Tell the boys and girls that God loves Elsie and James and Ralph. Go round the class and make it real to them.

Poor Thomas, the pessimistic one of the Twelve, says in verse 16, "Let us also go, that we may die with him." He expected death and found a resurrection from the dead! Let us give him credit for his courage in going when he believed enemies were lying in wait. Are we not like him in looking on the darkest possibilities? Christ fills life with glad surprises. With him, death itself yields a new outlook of opportunity.

"Take away the stone." It required some faith even to do that. There are stones to be rolled away before Christ can revive some of our dead members. Don't put obstructions in the way of a revival. There needs to be some heavy lifting done in our churches, if we are willing to remove all the obstacles that Jesus will point out if we take counsel together with him. We may have put the stone there ourselves in good faith, but the indication of Christ is all we need to take it away, if we are in earnest in our consecration to his Kingdom.

"Loose him, and let him go." Christ imparts the new life to the soul, but we are to help by removing the bonds of the dead past. The new converts we are receiving need to be helped. Those new Bible class men are hampered by old prejudices, bad habits, false ideas about the church. Cooperate with Christ so that the redeemed shall be unhampered by any old grave-clothes of dead customs in your church, too. Clear the way!

What the Story of Lazarus Does Not Teach

HOW reserved this account of John's is! There are no speculations as to Lazarus' experiences during the three days. He brought no message back from that "undiscovered country." Yet curious neighbors must have been eager enough to quiz him about it. Tennyson puts it beautifully -

"Behold a man raised up by Christ!
The rest remaineth unrevealed;
He told it not; or something sealed
The lips of that evangelist."

Lazarus is gone. He died again! The Gospel gives it only as an object-lesson, a parable of the power of God in Christ. Those believers who have passed through death are not destroyed. They still live in him. At his bidding they continue to serve him. At his summons we come or go.

John 11 : 25, 26 sends a beam of light down the dark corridor by which we all leave these scenes. All is well. God reigns, and his saints are partakers of his immortality!

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

The Question Box

QUESTION. I have a class of little ones in the Sunday school. I want to make the lesson of interest to them and I want to ask where I can get a book that tells how to tell stories and put them on the blackboard. I want a book of stories that can be illustrated on the board.—MRS. H. M. S.

For the teacher of the Beginners or Primaries, the following books on story-telling will be found helpful: "How to Tell Stories to Children" ($1.). "Telling Bible Stories" ($1.25). "Kindergarten Bible Stories" ($1.25). "Stories and Story-Telling" (50 cents). "Object Lessons for Little Children" ($1.). "Picture Work" (25 cents).

A book which will be of great service in showing how to use the blackboard in illustration work is "The Blackboard Class in the Sunday School" (Darnell).

Question. Will you tell me a good book or paper that will help in preparing to teach a class of young men and women aged sixteen to twenty in Sunday School? I want to give them good stuff and to make the work interesting.—L. S.

You cannot do better for young people of that critical age than to use the International Graded Lessons for Seniors. This is a four-year course, the first year's theme being "The World a Field for Service." These lessons meet these young people when they are seeking to know their place and purpose in life, and answers their questions and gives them outlook and a plan for their service. The lessons give ample opportunity for discussion of life questions. They are of course based on Scripture. In practical use, they have solved the very question you raise.

Question. I am organizing my Juniors for Messenger Service, and if you can give me some help along this line I shall appreciate it greatly. —A. L. H.

If you will write to David C. Cook Publishing Company, 160 Fifth Avenue, New York, or Meigs Publishing Company, Indianapolis, Ind., you can secure leaflets fully explaining this messenger service. In brief, the organization is for boys ten to sixteen years old. They are provided with cap, button and messenger record book. Members must not use tobacco or profane language, must be courteous and regular attendants at the Sunday school. A manager and captain are required.

The following lines of service may be rendered, each boy being assigned a district:

(a) Home Department. Material, messages and libraries delivered.

(b) Pastors' and superintendents' messages taken, also cards of invitation to church and Sunday school, copies of church calendar, birthday letters. Rally Day and other special day invitations, notices to absent scholars and teachers, flowers or fruit to sick and shut-ins.

(c) New families moving into the neighborhood in the messenger's district to be visited, and card of invitation left, or new scholar called for.

(d) Service about the school on Sunday as required by the superintendent or secretary.

Honor the boys in their work, plan meetings at intervals with devotional exercises, games, reading circle, wholesome talk, slight drill and a social time.

Question. Can you give me any information on the subject "Personal responsibility of the teacher for the scholar?"—R. C. Y.

The teacher's purpose is to draw to Christ; train for Christ. We cannot hope to do the work of the Sunday school in relation to the scholar unless we take upon ourselves the fourfold responsibility to him: namely, for his religious, social, physical and mental development. The Sunday school that stops at one of those angles cannot possibly succeed, but when the whole program is adhered to it is not difficult to hold and develop the scholar. This will involve on the teacher's part the visitation of the home and the preparation of the lesson, an active interest in the weekday life and a real love for the scholar. Success is sure to follow these plans.

May I suggest, as books that will deal especially with the teacher's relationship to the scholar, the following: "The Teacher, the Child and the Book"; "The Teacher That Teaches"; "Seven Laws of Teaching"; "The Girl in her Teens"; "Starting to Teach."

(All of the books named above can be obtained through the Christian Herald).

APPERSON
ROADAPLANE EIGHT

The Car That Has Cut Down the High Cost of Motoring

WHEN the stories began to come back to Elmer Apperson about the low cost of motoring which drivers of Apperson Roadaplane Eights were enjoying, he was not surprised.

To reduce the question to every-day human terms — he had worked to produce a car that would be "light on its feet" — with a world of reserve power.

The Roadaplane represents clever designing, proper balance, light weight, luxurious appointments, ample power.

These are the factors that make it the easiest riding as well as the most economical big car ever offered.

Let us submit some proofs— "from the men who pay the bills."

The News of the Week Condensed

THE GREAT RAILROAD STRIKE involving 400,000 men and 250 railways, which was temporarily halted by the passage of the Adamson Law September 2, was again called for March 17, after a conference between the presidents of the unions and the representatives of the roads had failed to result in agreement. The railways declared it impossible to enter into any agreement pending the decision of the Supreme Court, and the men declared that they intended to have the eight-hour law regardless of the decision of the court, and felt it necessary to take action before the country became involved in war. They insisted that there would be no strike if war should come. A committee of the Council of National Defense, acting for the President, called both sides into conference on March 16, the conference lasting all night. An appeal was made to the patriotism of both sides, and on March 18 at the demand of the President the strike was called off. . . . Secretary Lansing on March 12 delivered to all the embassies and legations of governments represented in Washington formal notification that the policy of the United States government was one of armed neutrality. On March 13 it was announced that no distinction would be made between ships carrying contraband and those carrying non-contraband, but that all would be armed and protected.

THE CHINESE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES on March 10 and the Senate on March 11 approved the decision of the cabinet to sever diplomatic relations with Germany and relations were formally broken March 14. . . . Americans engaged in Belgian relief, including Brand Whitlock, have turned over the work to Dutch and Spanish representatives to represent the American Commission for Relief in Belgium, which is continuing the work.

SUBMARINE OPERATIONS. The British official report of March 14 gives the total number of ships sunk from February 25 to March 11 as 46 British and one American, of 1,600 tons each or greater, and 6 small fishing craft. The total tonnage was not given. On March 10 the torpedoing without warning was reported of the Belgian relief ship Storstad, traveling with a German safe-conduct. The one American freighter was the Algonquin, which was sunk by shell fire on March 12, being attacked without formal warning, the crew of twenty-six escaping in lifeboats, reaching land after twenty-seven hours. . . . On March 18 the torpedoing of three American ships, City of Memphis, Illinois and Vigilancia, with loss of life in two cases, increased the tension at Washington. The mustering out of Guardsmen from the Federal service was halted. . . . The Administration on March 12 let it be known that it was anxious to have the Colombian treaty ratified for strategical as well as political reasons. The treaty was reported favorably to the Senate on March 13. . . . A tornado in central and eastern Indiana on March 11 destroyed more than $1,000,000 worth of property at Newcastle, killed 19 persons and injured more than 200.

PRESIDENT WILSON on March 14 sent to the Senate as his appointees to the Tariff Commission the names of Professor Frank William Taussig of Harvard University, Independent (chairman); Daniel Calhoun Roper of South Carolina, Democrat; David J. Lewis of Maryland, Democrat; William Kent of California, Independent; William Culbertson of Kansas, Republican; Edward P. Costigan, of Colorado, Progressive Republican. . . . The funeral of Ambassador Guthrie was held at Tokyo on March 13. The body is to be sent to the United States on a Japanese man-of-war, a courtesy which the government of Japan asked to be permitted to render to the dead ambassador. . . . Ambassador James W. Gerard reached Washington on March 14 and reported first to Secretary Lansing, and later to the President. The substance of his report was not immediately made public, but it was intimated that he assured the Secretary that Germany could hold out for at least a year, and that she had no intention of modifying the submarine war to please the United States or anybody else. . . . Brewers and the British government were reported on March 14 to have reached an agreement which will result in the closing of 30,000 public-houses during the following few months. . . . The United States District Court on March 10 decided that the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific Railways could continue under the present system of operation, there being no proof that the system had destroyed competition. . . . The world's total production of gold for 1916 is given as $478,625,000.

ELECTIONS IN MEXICO on March 11 resulted in the selection as president of General Carranza. The election was said to have been fair and orderly, and the vote to have been the largest ever cast in the republic. Villa celebrated the election on March 15 by again capturing the town of Parral, killing two American citizens, and reports were rife on March 17 of a new revolution under the leadership of General Obregon. . . . The annual report of the American Sugar Refining Company, made public March 14, shows that its manufacturing profit for the year was 4½ per cent. on $200,000,000 and that since 1894 its proportion of the total American business in sugar has been reduced from 75 per cent. to less than 34 per cent. A reserve of $1,000,000 has been set aside for the advertising of the company's trade-marks. . . . The largest single order for fighting craft ever given by any nation was placed on March 15 by the Navy Department when it ordered four battle cruisers and six scout cruisers, to cost, for hulls and machinery alone, nearly $112,000,000. . . . The total casualties in the European War on January 1, 1917, has been estimated at 9,203,300; 4,341,200 were killed in action or died of wounds.

The War in Europe

THE German retirement in the West, which last week appeared to have been halted before Bapaume, continued until at last reports it was affecting a line over eighty-five miles long, reaching from Arras to Soissons, and was extending to a depth which, as we go to press, had reached twelve miles in places, although it was evident that the British and French cavalry, in constant battle with German rear guards, had not yet reached the new line. On March 16 British troops captured positions north and south of Péronne, after severe fighting. On the 17th the British entered Bapaume, while the French captured Roye and Lassigny. On the 18th the full extent of the German retirement became evident when British and French troops pushing forward had taken Chaulnes, Nesle and Noyon, as well as over 200 villages which a week before had been in German hands. The retiring Germans were destroying villages, filling up wells, and taking every other measure calculated to delay their enemy.

On the Mesopotamian front, the British have continued to press the Turks northward, while the Russians, driving westward from Kermanshah were fighting in the border passes east of Bagdad, at last reports. Other Russian troops descending from Armenia captured the city of Van, and pressed forward toward the south, this movement being a severe threat in the rear of the Turks north of Bagdad.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

IN the midst of the salutations of the worshiping throng on the first Palm Sunday, Jesus wept over the city of Jerusalem, saying, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes." Then followed the prophecy of destruction which came true so faithfully a generation later. Jerusalem knew not the things that pertained unto her peace, her eyes were blinded, and in five days her purposes were turned from worship to murder. Now, as we approach the anniversary in 1917 of the events of Passion Week, let us pray that our eyes may not be blinded to the things that belong unto our peace, but that we in America may ever serve the purposes of heaven in the paths of justice and righteousness; and that we may not be led to crucify him afresh by becoming involved in the terrible world war.

M. W. C. writes a thankful letter. Her son, who was threatened with blindness, is slowly recovering his sight. She praises God and thanks the Prayer League for its petitions in her son's behalf. She asks prayer that the slow processes of recovery may be continued and hastened, and that in the days of waiting the son's faith may not fail, or his spirit grow weary, but that he may know that "His strength is sufficient."

L. J. H. also comes praising God for the restoration of her son's sight, which has so far improved that he can read a little. She asks prayer for his complete recovery.

A "Believer in Prayer" brings a record of prayer answered in a successful revival at Elkhart, Iowa, which resulted in eighty-three accessions to the church.

Mrs. A. M. testifies of prayers answered. Being told that her husband had an incurable disease, she prayed for direction and was sent to a specialist, who found the trouble to be easily curable, and who soon had the husband able to work again. At another time, when internal friction in the home threatened unpleasantness, she very sensibly went to her closet of prayer, and the difficulties were removed. Now she asks prayer that her husband may become a professing Christian.

R. H., who asked prayer for the reclaiming of several men from drink, writes that they have now kept sober for months, but are not saved yet. She asks prayer for the salvation of these men.

Two mothers ask prayer for the salvation and the return home of wayward sons. Mrs. R. H. says her boy, who once knelt in prayer with her, has for two years drifted away from God, and a month ago left home in the night. Since then she has had no word. She asks prayer that the boy may be saved for service, and that her husband also may be saved. Mrs. E. T. asks prayer that God may save her boy; she has heard from him, but she wants the protecting arm of the Father above thrown about her boy, that his weakness may be lost in His strength. She asks us to read Isa. 40 : 28–31, a message which has blessed her and given her strength.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at:

Haskew, Okla.; Acton Camp, Ky.; Scottsville, Ky.; Salada, Texas; Palmer, Ill.; Gaylesville, Ala.; Norwich, Conn.; Madison, Tenn.; Wake Forest, N. C.; Westfield, N. Y.; (at West Portland Church); Long Beach, Calif. (at the Grace Church here); Bottineau, N. D. (in the M. E. Church); Bandana, N. C. (at the Mine Creek Church and Silver Chapel); Loma, Tenn. (at the Antioch Church); Holtville, Calif. (in the Baptist Church); Marshall, Texas (at the First Presby. Church); Lynchburg, Va.; Cincinnati, Ohio (in the Trinity Presbyterian Church); Knoxville, Tenn. ("that many may be saved during revival here"); Palisade, Colo. (that many may be saved during revival); Dayton, Ohio ("that many may be saved during campaign here"); Gallupville, N. Y. (that many may be saved during revival services); Zanesville, Ohio (pray that many may be saved during revival held by Bob Jones); Fox Lake, Wis. (that the State of Wisconsin may go dry); Jackson, Minn. ("that saloons may be kept from this town"); East Chatham, N. Y. (pray for a world-wide revival, also that all nations may be peaceful); Mrs. E. F. S. ("that we may have a pastor, and that church troubles may be removed"); J. B. S. (for a minister who seems to have gone somewhat astray, that his church may be reconciled to him and stand by him in his time of need).

Mrs. R. W. R. asks prayer that son's mind may be restored; six friends ask prayer that minds may be strengthened; five friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for friends or relatives.

Two friends ask prayer that their sons' sight may be restored; E. L. H. and Mrs. L. J. J. ask prayer that their mothers' sight may be restored; Miss R. R., that pastor's and aunt's sight may be restored; Miss M. N., that spots before eyes may be removed; nineteen friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves, friends or relatives.

Thirty-nine friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Three parents ask prayer that their sons may be cured of the liquor habit; three wives, their husbands; nine, that other friends or relatives may be delivered from this habit.

Twenty-seven parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; including R. H., that son may be saved and return home; sixteen wives, their husbands; sixty-seven, for other relatives or friends.

Fourteen readers ask prayer for special blessing for others.

Eighty-eight ask prayer for the healing of friends and relatives, including Mrs. L. D. G., that son may pass safely through an operation; another, Mrs. J. T. G., that daughter may be healed without an operation; G. B. W., that wife may be cured of cancer; Mrs. H. P. A., that granddaughter may gain the power of speech; seven friends, for the restoration of hearing for themselves or others; fifty-six friends ask prayer for healing for themselves.

Thirty-seven friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Forty friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from the following:

S. L. D., Fort Worth, Texas; Mrs. J. N., Limona, Fla.; Mrs. I. H. C., Indiana; S. J. S., Union Point, Ga.; R. C., Richmond, Va.; T. S., Topeka, Kan.; A. D. S., Lexington, Ky.; Mrs. L. B. E., Los Angeles, Calif.; Mrs. E. T. S., Cincinnati, Ohio; Miss J. F. W., Harlan, Iowa; Mrs. M. D. B., Knoxville, Tenn.; J. B. O., Gallupville, N. Y.; Mrs. M. S., Pasadena, Calif.; Mrs. H. F., Grantsburg, Wis.; A Reader, Erie, Pa.; Mrs. H. E. S., Portland, Me.; Mrs. A. M., Mecaha, Mont.; S. H. L., Honey Grove, Texas.

Three Thousand Mothers at a Revival

MARCH 1 was celebrated as Mother's Day in the Biederwolf revival at Lawrence, Mass. Carnations were distributed free at a dozen of the leading stores, and a special service was held at the big tabernacle. For ushers there were young girls attired in white. Aged women were brought to the tabernacle in automobiles and seated in rocking-chairs well up to the front. There were about 3,000 mothers present, and a sparse sprinkling of old men. A census disclosed the fact that fifteen states and fifteen countries were represented in the audience. Most of the nations now at war were represented. The oldest woman, Mrs. Mary J. Fifield, eighty-seven, was presented with a bouquet of roses. A touching feature of the service was the singing by gray-haired grandmothers of hymns they had known since childhood. In many cases the words were unfamiliar to the audience and the lady suggesting them was encouraged to sing a solo. Others were taken up at once and swept over the tabernacle. Dr. Biederwolf said in his address that Christian home training is the source of a nation's true greatness, and that the time to appreciate mother love is before she is taken away. "How many in this audience have lost their mothers?" he asked, and nearly every hand went up. At the invitation, scores came forward.

FREE a reproduction of an original manuscript of one of Riley's poems.

Sad indeed is the American child whose dream world is not peopled by the Raggedy Man, Little Orphant Annie, Billy Miller, Uncle Sidney, Old Aunt Mary, The Happy Little Cripple, Lizbeth Anne, and all the other living and beloved characters of Riley's happy creation.

But Riley does not belong to the children alone. He is the cherished possession of all the people, big and little, rich and poor. He has made all the life of America better by his farm rhymes—Griggsby Station, Knee Deep in June, When the Frost is on the Punkin, The Old Swimmin' Hole, and all the rest.

American sentiment is everywhere sweeter for An Old Sweetheart of Mine, which has probably been read by more people than any other poem in the English language. American hearts swell to the glorious patriotism of The Name of Old Glory, Goodbye Jim, and America—Messiah of Nations.

How long is it since you have heard those silver bugles blowing in that far-off "Land of Used to Be?" Go back with Riley to the beloved Hoosier country of his "airly days"—to the Banks O' Deer Creek and Old Kingry's Mill, and the "Baptisin'-Hole." Go with that troop of ragamuffins "Out to Old Aunt Mary's" where the pies and the jams and the cakes are, and then come racing home in the crisp October air, with the old, old glow at your heart;

"When the frost is on the punkin
And the fodder's in the shock!"

The Lockerbie edition is not for sale at bookstores or through agents—you can secure it only by mailing us the attached coupon. Send it in today and we will mail you our special offer.

The Lockerbie edition contains all of the poems, sketches and stories of James Whitcomb Riley which have been published previously and in addition many selections which, up to now, have never appeared in book form. All the poems and selections are arranged in the order in which they were written, thus enabling the reader to follow the development and change in the author's style from year to year. There is also a sketch of Mr. Riley's life, now published for the first time, and corrected by him before his death. Everything contained in the Lockerbie edition is given in the final form in which Mr. Riley wished to commit it to posterity; every line was studied, corrected and polished by him for this final and definite edition.

THE BOOK YOU HAVE BEEN WAITING FOR

445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered

A HELP OVER THE HARD PLACES

THIS volume, we feel assured, will be welcomed by many thousands of readers of the Christian Herald and by Bible students everywhere. When the earlier volume, entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered," was published, it met with an enthusiastic reception, not only from members of the Christian Herald Family, but from clerical and lay students of the Bible throughout the country. So general was the appreciation and the testimony to the practical usefulness of the book, that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume.

In this new volume, "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," all the questions dealt with are entirely different from, yet no less vital and important than those treated in the earlier book. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to Pastors, Professors, Scholars, Students, Laymen, and the general Reader as a reliable source of reference. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure Scripture passages, many of which are liable to be misunderstood by the average reader. It is the combined work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations. The new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over "the hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

The subjects noted above and over 380 other equally important questions are treated in this wonderfully helpful volume, which should be in the hands of every pastor, Sunday School teacher, evangelist and Bible-lover. It will be found indispensable in the home circle, wherever the Word is read.

WE will send a copy of "445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.35

Or, we will send a copy to present subscribers as a reward for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $2.00

Another Community Church

IN the southeastern corner of Denver, Colo., and separated from the city proper by Washington Park, is a community of nearly 3,000 inhabitants. The only church in this territory less than ten years ago had scarcely more than 100 members, with a debt on the building, received aid from the General Conference. But the congregation grew with the population, and not quite two years ago the pastor suggested that a fund ought to be raised toward the building of a new church. The men took up the call and a short campaign brought a subscription fund of $12,000, payable monthly for twenty-four months. The old subscription will not be completed until June, but the rapid increase in attendance at Bible school and church compelled action sooner than was expected, and the first week in January saw another campaign, which brought an additional $17,000, to be divided into twenty-five monthly payments. The church expects to realize $4,000 from the sale of its old property, and it plans to commence a $35,000 building in the early spring. The idea is to build the new edifice to accommodate every need of the community, making it the center of social as well as religious activity, and furnishing an open door for the meetings of the improvement association, men's social club, boy scouts, camp fire girls, study and literary societies, and entertainments of the better character. The church is officially Methodist, but represented on the official board are members of the Baptist, Christian, Presbyterian, Congregational, Episcopal, and Lutheran denominations. Admission to membership is by "a confession of faith in God," "acceptance of Jesus Christ as personal Saviour," and "pledge of service." It is understood that members of other evangelical churches may retain their denominational names or memberships if desired. No other church or religious society is located in this community. The future of this Washington Park Community Church will be watched with interest.

"ALL roads lead to Rome," said a Latin proverb. When Paul and his companions, after the adventurous journey in which they suffered shipwreck on the Island of Malta, landed in Italy, they found brethren in Puteoli, now called Pozzuoli, near Naples, and "were desired to tarry with them seven days"; and then, the narrator of the journey says, "we went toward Rome." Luke does not tell us by what road they traveled, but we can be sure that it was by the great Appian Way, already 300 years old, which was built by Appius Claudius, a Roman censor, from Rome to Capua, a point not very far from the port where the prisoners landed. From Capua to Rome was a distance of 125 miles. Paul and his companions probably walked the whole distance, but were met at the Three Taverns, seventeen miles from Rome, and at Appii Forum, or the Market of Appius, ten miles from Rome, by delegations from the infant church in Rome. This great highway, a part of which is shown on our cover page, was built of hewn stones laid in cement, and averaged about twenty feet wide. Parts of the road are still in excellent preservation. The Three Taverns is identified by some ruins which are pointed out to the modern tourist as the remains of the station at which Paul was met by his loving brethren from Rome, who had received news of his coming—probably by the system of posts which penetrated to all parts of the empire and resembled the modern post office, and through the Acta Diurna, or public bulletins on which official matters were posted, and which were a prototype of the modern newspaper.

Another Advantage
ROYAL BAKING POWDER
SAVES EGGS

Use a small additional quantity of ROYAL in place of each egg omitted

The following recipes illustrate the rule, but the modification may be applied to nearly all baked foods, and will produce healthful and satisfactory home-made cakes at a considerable saving in cost.

Cream Layer Cake

- 1 cup sugar
- 1 cup milk
- 2 cups flour
- 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
- 1 egg
- 2 tablespoons butter
- 1 teaspoon flavoring

The old method called for 3 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Cream the sugar and butter together, then mix in the egg. After sifting the flour and baking powder together two or three times, add it all to the mixture. Gradually add the milk and beat with spoon until you have a smooth pour batter. Add the flavoring. Pour into 2 buttered layer cake tins and bake in a moderately hot oven for 20 minutes. Put together with Cream Filling and cover top and sides with White Icing.

Bran or Health Muffins

- 1 cup bran
- 1 cup graham flour
- 1 teaspoon salt
- 1 tablespoon brown sugar
- 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
- 1 cup milk
- 3 tablespoons shortening

The old method called for 1 egg

DIRECTIONS:—Mix thoroughly dry ingredients and add milk and melted shortening. Beat until thoroughly mixed and bake in greased muffin tins in hot oven 20 to 30 minutes.

Booklet of practical recipes which economize in eggs and other expensive ingredients mailed free on request. Address ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 128 William St., New York.

Spiritual, Mental and Material Rewards Made Possible by Participating in the SECOND BIBLE PICTURE STUDY?

What the Study Really Is

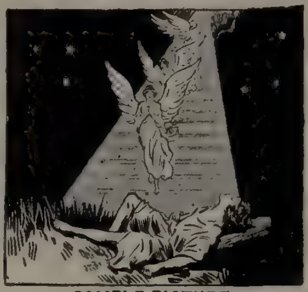
THE Second Bible Picture Study consists of choosing Bible verses to describe best the Pictures now appearing in the Christian Herald. You see three of them on this page.

Here below is a sample picture. Look at it carefully—and then determine which of the three following Bible verses is most applicable to it:

And he said, Hear thou therefore the word of the Lord: I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left. I Kings 22 : 19.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. Gen. 28 : 12.

How much then is a man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days. Matt. 12 : 12.



SAMPLE PICTURE

Which one did you select? The second? Yes, we knew you would, for it fits the picture best.

This single example, interesting as it is, suffices merely to give you the faintest idea of the real value of the Bible Picture Study. In the Study itself there is a series of such pictures, and a limited list of 2,000 Bible verses from which to choose.

Its Spiritual Rewards

It is hard to realize at a glance all the remarkable spiritual aid which you as a participant may receive from the Study. But picture to yourself, if you can, the joy of sitting down before a table and spreading these interesting Pictures before you. Picture the stimulation of reading through the Bible verses and selecting the one most applicable to the particular picture you are studying. You will in this way familiarize yourself with the sayings and doings of God's holy prophets and of the Son of Man.

Its Mental Rewards

Your memory is improved, your alertness quickened, your vocabulary and knowledge of the English language augmented by Bible Study. You will be able to concentrate with more ease. Your powers of discrimination will be sharpened. You will learn to love your Bible even more as its beauties unfold through the Study.

Its Material Rewards

As an incentive to participants we are offering $5,628.00 in cash Rewards. The first Reward will be $1,000.00 in gold. The second Reward will be $800.00; third, $600.00. Send for a free list of Rewards. We will gladly send it to you.

Your Tools

To secure the greatest benefits from the Study, you should secure "Pearls from the Bible," a compilation of 2,000 verses, giving prophecies, precepts and promises, culled from the Scriptures. It will be a precious keepsake, in addition to supplying you with the complete list of the 2,000 verses from which to select suitable ones for the pictures.

You may have "Pearls from the Bible" with the rest of the Outfit, consisting of a convenient Answer Book and the Bible Pictures to date free, by obtaining a new six-months-for-a-dollar subscription to the Christian Herald for some friend whom you believe the Study would benefit.

If you prefer, send us $2.35 and we will renew your present subscription for one year from the date when it ends and send you an Outfit at once. In taking advantage of either of these offers, kindly use the Coupon printed below.

You Start At Once

Send for the Outfit as soon as possible and begin the Study now. In this way you will give yourself ample time to enjoy it thoroughly. The Rules, free on request, tell how all may compete without expense. But why not secure the complete handy Outfit, and start right away to compete, without the slightest bother? Resolve to win one of the first Rewards. You have as much opportunity as anyone. Why not really try?

The Significance of Easter

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. I Cor. 15 : 50–58

What Easter Means to Me

Epworth League Topic. I Cor. 15 : 12-20; I Thess. 4 : 14–18

BECAUSE of the similarity of these topics, we will treat them together.

The work of Jesus became complete in the Resurrection. Had the body of Jesus of Nazareth remained in the grave of Joseph, had the stone never been rolled away, there would have been no Christ, no religion of the Son of God, no Christianity. Since, therefore, Easter celebrates the Resurrection of the Christ, it becomes the most important festival of the Christian year. Until Christ rose from the dead, the tomb held an unanswered question. Faith held the assurance of a life beyond, but of evidence there was little. The burial of Jesus was thoroughly attested; the breaking of the seals, the resurrection, the frequent meetings with the at first wondering and then worshiping disciples, are equally well attested. We know that Christ rose from the dead and that he ascended into heaven; and because we know this we have faith in him not merely as the greatest of teachers of ethical truth, but as the Saviour of mankind.

Paul says: "If Christ be not risen from the dead, then we are of all men most miserable." But since Christ is risen from the dead, his rising attested by a proof above challenge, death is swallowed up in victory, and the grave is shorn of its sting.

Easter should mean to us not only the resurrection of the Saviour and thereby the sealing of our faith, but each recurrence of the festival should mean to us a new resurrection within our whole lives, a new casting off of the shackles of those sins which so easily beset us, a new reaching forth of our hearts and hands to the Saviour of men, that he may fill us with his love and inspire us for his service. And it might mean a new start among our fellows, a new resurrection of confidence and regard for those about us, a new power to rise superior to those trivial things that so often interfere with friendship. Easter should mean to us reconsecration, reaffirmation of our loyalty, reassurance of our faith, and redoubled energy in our service. Christ died and rose again, not for us alone, but for the world, and the world is still sadly in need of him; and only through us, who know him, can the knowledge of his grace and truth and of his great salvation be proclaimed to those who know him not. Easter is not a time merely for the singing of hallelujahs, for the chanting of hymns of praise, for the sweet odor of lilies, or for the coining of beautiful sentiments, although all of these are well inspired by the great truth about which it centers. The message of the risen Lord to Peter was "Feed my lambs." He was made known to the two at Emmaus by the breaking of bread. His last command was to all his disciples to preach the Gospel to every creature.

Easter should therefore mean to each of us a risen Lord and present Saviour, a burning message, and a life that bears the image of the Christ.

Church Papers Worth Reading

HAVE you ever stopped to consider the wonderful array of interesting and helpful articles now appearing in that class of publications commonly called "church papers"? Or have you made the very deplorable error of falling into the belief that they contain matter adapted only to the ministers, Sunday school teachers and temperance advocates? If the latter obtains in your case a little more reading won't hurt you. Secure a copy of the Christian Herald, for example. Read the editorials—read the articles descriptive of travel—or, better still, read the pages devoted to news matter and backed by a Biblical quotation appropriate to each article. When you have finished you will have absorbed something worth while to you, something that better enables you to discuss just such subjects as come up for discussion in everyday life.—From Editorial by Howard Burba in Lima, Ohio, Times-Democrat.

For the "One Woman" Top

DU PONT FABRIKOID

RAYNTITE

Single Texture Top Material

Rayntite is more than the ideal one-man top material. It is also ideal for the "one-woman" top.

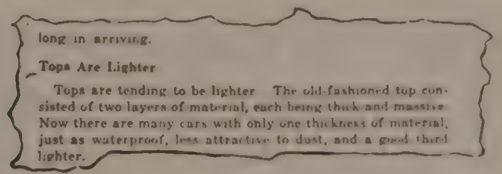
All far-sighted automobile manufacturers recognize the growing importance of the woman in the choice of cars.

Witness the increase in the use of colored bodies, graceful designs, ornamental interiors of closed cars, and Moorish finish Fabrikoid for upholstery.

A Rayntite top is light enough for the average woman to handle, yet guaranteed not to leak for one year, and built to last as long as the car.

Trade Authority Tells of Trend

From the show number of The Automobile of January 4, 1917, we clipped the following:



long in arriving.

Tops Are Lighter

Tops are tending to be lighter. The old-fashioned top consisted of two layers of material, each being thick and massive. Now there are many cars with only one thickness of material, just as waterproof, less attractive to dust, and a good third lighter.

Why make your car top heavy, and the "one-man" top a joke, by using material twice as heavy as it needs to be?

Now Made in Two Varieties

RAYNTITE No. 1—Single texture with Fabrikoid surface—and
RAYNTITE No. 2—Single texture with Fairfield Rubber surface

Each is guaranteed one year against leakage

If the car you are considering is not topped with Rayntite, find out whether you or your wife can really handle the one-man top.

Samples of either variety on request

Paint Without Oil

Remarkable Discovery That Cuts Down the Cost of Paint Seventy-Five Per Cent.

A Free Trial Package is Mailed to Everyone Who Writes.

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of Adams, N. Y., has discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He calls it Powdrpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is required is cold water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof, sanitary and durable for outside or inside painting. It is the cement principle applied to paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and looks like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

Write to Mr. A. L. Rice, Manufacturer, 107 North Street, Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a free trial package, also color card and full information showing you how you can save a good many dollars. Write today.

SAXON "SIX"

Consider This Certain and Positive Proof of Saxon "Six" Supremacy

First of all, turn your attention to the Saxon "Six" Motor.

Compare it with the car of less than six cylinders that stands highest in your estimation.

Though that "less-than-six" may be developed to the full limit of its possibilities, you still will find lapses between its power impulses.

On the other hand, the Saxon motor, with its six cylinders, develops a continuous flow of power. Vibration has been reduced to a minimum. Uniform torque, the ambition of all motor designers, is attained.

At a speed of 20 miles per hour, the Saxon "Six" motor developed 98% more impulses per minute than did the "less-than-six."

This 98% greater percentage of impulses is vitally significant.

And its significance is concretely expressed in the fact that when this "less-than-six" and Saxon "Six" were tested for acceleration, Saxon "Six" revealed 22% faster pick-up.

Nor is it in acceleration alone that this smoother power-flow gives the advantage to Saxon "Six."

In every phase of performance Saxon "Six" must be considered supreme among cars costing less than $1200.

Saxon "Six" is $865; "Six" Sedan, $1250; "Four" Roadster, $495; f. o. b. Detroit. Canadian prices: "Six" Touring Car, $1175; "Six" Sedan, $1675; "Four" Roadster, $665. Price of special export models, "Six," $915; "Four," $495; f. o. b. Detroit. (962)

Neddie's Question

Out it all came in a torrent of eager speech. The bewilderment, the loss, the desolation. And then the great, beautiful Hope that was born, only to be starved by the lack of comprehension in those about him.

"I could stand it for ever and ever so long, if I just knew he was coming back some time," he sobbed. "Once he had to go to New York and left me for 'most a month with Nora. 'Course I was lonesome and missed him awful, but I got along 'cause I knew he was coming back! And now I wouldn't care how long he was gone if I just knew that some time I could go home and my Daddy would be there!"

The lady sat silent, her arms clasping the quivering body, her eyes upon the little grave at her feet. Perhaps a little prayer went up that she might deal wisely, reasonably with this hungry little mind and heart.

"Neddie," she said at last, "your Daddy believed in God, didn't he?"

"Why, I s'pose so," Neddie answered. somewhat shocked.

"Did he teach you to say your prayers?"

"'Course he did! I said 'Now I lay me' till I was six, and then I said 'Our Father.'"

"Then, of course, he believed in Him, or he wouldn't have taught his little boy to talk to him. Now Neddie, one more question, and then I will answer yours. Do you know what it means to perish?"

"No," said Neddie, wonderingly.

"It means to die altogether. Just what you were afraid your father had done. Now, Neddie boy, ask me your question and I will answer it truly."

The solemn childish voice broke the stillness of the quiet place.

"If a man die, shall he live again?"

Clear, and sure, and joyous came the answer in the tender mother voice. "'He that believeth on me shall not perish, but shall—have—everlasting—Life!"

Slowly the perplexity in the little face gave way to understanding, and that to a radiance, which flooded the dark eyes with a light almost more than earthly.

"Laddie, if you keep trying as hard as ever you can to be the kind of man your Daddy wants you to be—to be brave and truthful and clean in your mind and your body—some day you will go home—and your Daddy will be there!"

Neddie's question was answered.

Merry Moments

COMFORT FIRST. Two little girls, whose parents were natives of Norway, had just been listening to a lecturer, who praised the people of that country very highly

"Just think! I was born in Norway!" said one, with a good deal of pride.

"Well," the other answered, "I could have been born there if I'd wanted to, but I thought I'd rather just be born in America, and then I'd be here."

A GOOD UNDERSTANDING. An Iowa paper compliments a lecturer who was blessed with very large feet by saying that he left a great impression everywhere he went.

A CLERICAL WIG WAG. A clerical friend in Ohio recalls an anecdote about the Rev. Dr. Vinton, once pastor of Trinity Church. An old college friend came into the vestry-room to see the doctor, and they had a warm greeting.

"But how is this?" said the friend. "You are older than I am, and yet you have not a gray hair in your head, while I am as gray as a rat."

"Oh, well," replied the doctor, "you know I am in the apostolic succession, and all the graces of apostolic life and doctrine flow down into my soul and into my body."

"Yes," added Dr. Ogilby, who was listening to the conversation, "our friend Dr. Vinton can say with St. Paul, 'I dye daily.'"—Harper's Monthly.

EDGING CLOSE TO THE TRUTH. A farmer who understood human nature said: "If you want your boy to stay at home, don't bear too hard on the grindstone when he turns the crank."

SAFETY FIRST. Railroad foreman: "Sambo, if we had war, wouldn't you like to be a captain and get in front and holler, 'Come on, boys!'?"

Sambo: "No, suh, boss. I'd ruther git behind and holler, 'Go on, boys!'"

TIMKEN BEARINGS

One of the Heroult Electric Steel Furnaces in the Timken mill.

Metal and Mettle

The mettle of Timken Bearings has been tried and found true through years of usage at points of severest service in the majority of high-grade motor-cars.

The metal from which Timken Bearings are made has always been subjected to the most rigid tests to insure Timken quality.

The different processes of manufacture have also been supervised with the most thorough inspection—the world has been searched for the most accurate automatic machinery—machines designed by our own engineers have been used to make Timken Bearings still more perfect—and the steel tube from which the cups and cones are turned has been drawn in the Timken Tube Mill.

All of this has made possible a control over quality that has resulted in the production of the finest bearings that money can buy for your motor-car.

But even this did not completely satisfy Timken standards.

In order to make this control of quality include the actual production of raw material the Timken Steel Mill has been built and equipped with Heroult Electric Furnaces—the most modern and efficient method of making Timken quality steel—a steel of extraordinary refinement.

Timken Bearings have always been known for their finer mettle—and now the use of a finer metal has added a still greater perfection.

In view of the long life and mileage expected of motor-cars today, this standard of quality, even though it does cost more, must be considered as the one dependable assurance of efficient motor-car service.

MANY furnishings and decorative objects are brightened up only at house-cleaning time because they cannot stand the continual weekly applications of soap and water. To the experienced house-keeper, the very hesitancy to wash an article frequently is a sure sign that, when it is washed, nothing but Ivory Soap should be used.

For thirty-eight years Ivory Soap has been associated with the cleaning of things likely to be damaged by ordinary cleaning methods. House-keepers do not hesitate to entrust such articles to it. They know from an unbroken chain of successes with Ivory Soap that it cannot injure the most exquisite colors, the most delicate fabrics, the most beautifully enameled, varnished, or painted surfaces, and the finest materials of every kind.

Jerusalem, the City of David, the goal of the Crusaders, seen from the valley above the Garden of Damascus

WILL THE TURK YIELD JERUSALEM?

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

[In this timely article, our well-informed war correspondent, Mr. Arnoux, accurately describes the military situation in Palestine, where the age-long struggle between Cross and Crescent for the possession of the Holy City has been revived by the developments of the present war. He evidently regards the capture of Jerusalem by the Allies as a probable event in the near future. The article possesses a special interest for all Bible readers.]

THE eyes of Christians and of Hebrews the world over have, for the past few weeks, been fixed on Jerusalem, the "Holy City," as they have not been for centuries before. There is a hope in the hearts of the followers of both faiths that in a short time the banner of a Christian nation will once more, for the first time since the fall of the Latin kingdom founded by the Crusaders, float over that city which, to those of both creeds, is the most sacred spot on earth. To the Jews, because there was the seat of their kings and their temple, a fusion as regards locality of both the national and religious importance of the Hebrew race. To us Christians, because we not only share the attachment of the Jews to Jerusalem as a religious center, but because we have an added and greater consecration of the place in that it was the best beloved city of Him who there died that we might live the life eternal.

Thus the news which has recently been flashed to us by the cable that British troops are within thirty miles of Jerusalem is to very many of the faithful the most important tidings that have come to us during the war. The hope that is springing in millions of Christians' hearts the world over is that the crescent is to give place to the Cross once more, and that the sepulchre of Christ is to return to the possession of his worshipers.

In the early part of the war, it will be remembered that the Turkish forces moved southeastward from the southern border of Palestine, and, establishing themselves in the desert of eastern Egypt, made several attacks on the Suez Canal in the hope of invading Central Egypt after taking the canal. At one time this movement appeared to have some chances of success; but ultimately it failed completely owing to Great Britain's energetic defense, and the Turks were finally compelled to fall back to the desert to the east of the canal, wherein they have been established for the past eighteen months, and up to a couple of months ago were successful in repelling all British attacks on their positions.

A little over three months ago, however, the British, after concentrating a larger force of troops than were hitherto available along the eastern side of the Suez Canal, began an offensive to the eastward. This offensive at first progressed slowly, but gradually gaining momentum as it advanced, drove the Turks almost completely out of the Sinai peninsula except the southeastern portion. The so-called desert between Suez and El Arish was successfully crossed and the many problems of water supply, transport and commissary were eventually solved in a manner reflecting great credit on those charged with their solution.

Finally, El Arish itself was captured and after being made a base of action, the British advance into Palestine was commenced and carried forward until, during the past week, the advance guards of the British army—largely composed of Indian cavalry and native camel corps—had penetrated to within thirty miles of the two-hilled city, where the plan was to wait until the slower moving infantry caught up with them. This being done, the British army is indicated on the map by the mass marked "A" to the south of Jerusalem.

There are, however, two other movements of the troops of the Allies in Asia Minor, which, while perhaps not entitled to the term "converging armies" in relation to the British army operating in southern Palestine, are not and will not be without great influence on the results of the campaign of this army, since the pressure which these two movements will continue to put on the Turks will make it impossible for the Turks to send re-enforcements to Palestine.

The first of these movements is that of the Russian Caucasian army operating in Armenia and Persia, which, as the black line running from "A," the British army in Palestine, to "C," the line of the Russian forces, shows, is 700 miles distant at its nearest point from the British Palestine force. The westerly wing and center of this Russian army has been practically motionless since its capture of Trebizond on the Black Sea and Erzingan in southern Armenia in the spring of last year, and is still remaining so. The eastern wing in Persia, however, has a varied history.

At one time last year, this eastern wing had completely driven the Turks out of southwestern Persia and had reached and crossed the border between Persia and Mesopotamia; indeed, it was at one time at a point but 90 or 100 miles from Bagdad. At a later period last year, however, this wing was driven back by the Turks along its whole front and far beyond Kermanshah (shown on the map) even to the north of Hamadan. But within the past two weeks, this wing has again swept southward, evidently operating in combination with the British in Palestine, and the British army of General Maude operating against Bagdad, and in spite of the Turkish resistance has recaptured successively Hamadan and Kermanshah, from which latter place it is rapidly moving southeastward in the general direction of Bagdad and Mosul.

The Turkish forces opposed to this Russian wing appear to have been somewhat demoralized by the several beatings they have received, are falling back in more or less disorder, and do not appear capable of much more organized resistance to the Russian advance.

At the present writing, as shown on the map, this Russian wing is distant about 200 miles to the northeast of the British at Bagdad. It is probable that before long the Russian center and the right wing toward the Black Sea will commence to move south, thus adding to the present pressure on the Turks.

The second cooperating force in the general movement against the Turks is the British army under General Maude, which has recently successively captured Kut-el-Amara and Bagdad, the latter the most important city of Mesopotamia.

Over a year ago, the British sent a force under General Townshend up the Tigris with the same object in view, but this force, after capturing Kut-el-Amara and penetrating to within 17 miles of Bagdad, was signally defeated at Ctesiphon, forced to fall back to Kut-el-Amara, besieged in that town, and ultimately forced to surrender after losing two-thirds of its strength.

General Maude's army has been successful in attaining its primary object, Bagdad, not only because it is far greater in numbers—(125,000) than General Townshend's (35,000) but also because during the past year the British have succeeded in detaching many of the semi-independent Arab tribes of the whole region from their more or less nominal allegiance to the Sultan and converting them into enthusiastic supporters in arms of General Maude's command.

Some months ago the Shereef of Mecca, the most influential personage in the Arab world, revolted against Turkish authority and his revolt had effects far beyond the limits of the Arabian peninsula. The inhabitants both of Mesopotamia and of Syria-Palestine are very largely of Arab blood and are in close touch with the Arabs of the Arabian peninsula, and share their hatred of Turkish, or, in fact, of any rule at all. In the semi-desert regions where the fighting is now going on in Mesopotamia and southern Palestine where railroads are few and roads, in our sense of the word, hardly exist, the hostility of the natives make the supplying of armies a matter of almost superhuman difficulty. Hence, within the past year, as a result of this detachment of the Arabs, the Turks have become in these regions strangers in a strange land, occupying only the ground actually covered by their troops, and harried night and day by fierce and ubiquitous guerrilla enemies.

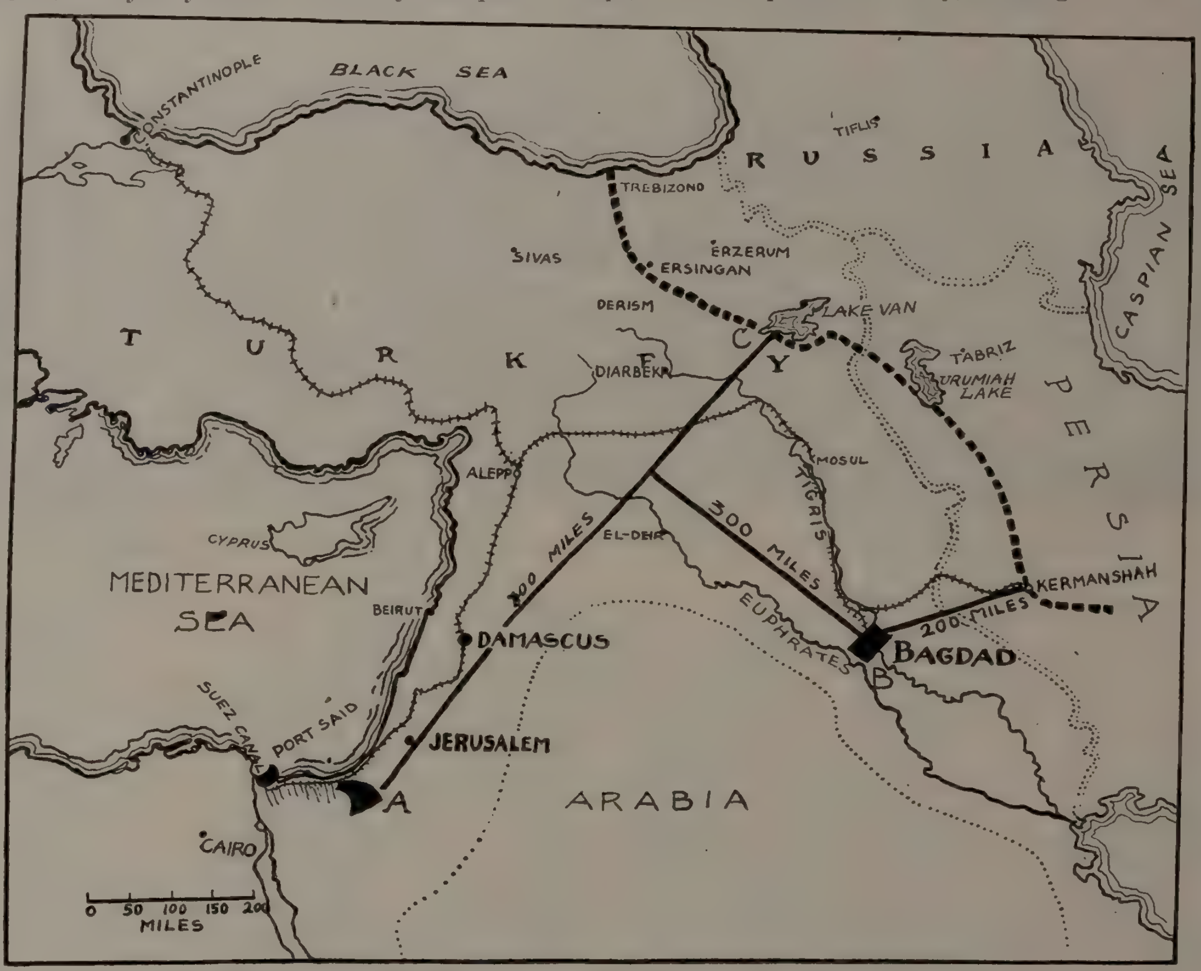
All told, this Arab population numbers several millions, and its defection will probably insure the complete retreat of the Turkish army as far to the west as a line drawn from Diarbekr to Aleppo (both shown on the accompanying map), and a retreat on the Palestine front probably as far to the north as the Beirut-Damascus line, if not as far as Aleppo.

If these retreats are carried out, one great effect, and to us the greatest in considering our present subject, is that Jerusalem will probably fall into the possession of the British force moving against it from the south. In fact, in view of all the circumstances and conditions, it does not at the present time seem possible for the Turks to prevent this result from being attained in the very near future, and perhaps even before these lines are actually before the eyes of the readers of the Christian Herald.

The future of this region must not, however, be too hastily assumed. The same Arabs who now are so potent a factor in its conquest may hereafter be exceedingly difficult to deal with, and unless very carefully handled may make the retention of this territory a hard matter, since the object of their present activities is not to change masters but to throw off all masters whatsoever.

Jerusalem's Many Sieges

IF Salem, the city of the priest-king Melchizedek, was the same city as Jerusalem, as many eminent Bible scholars believe, then the "Holy City" has a history of at least four thousand years. Jerusalem is first mentioned by its present name in Joshua 10:1, B. C. 1451, or 2,368 years ago, and its king at that time, Adonizedek ("lord of righteousness"), reminds us, in his name at least, of the king of Salem to whom Abraham paid tithes, and whose name means "king of righteousness."



The battle fronts in Bible lands showing the three armies converging on Palestine

The position of Jerusalem, which made it easily defensible, enabled it to hold out against the Hebrew invaders for 400 years after they had struck their first blow in the conquest of Canaan by the taking of Jericho. Although the tribe of Judah had taken a part of the city in B. C. 1618, it was not until 1044 B. C. that King David took possession of the citadel and made it his residence.

The treasures of gold and silver accumulated by Solomon and his successors seem to have been a great temptation to the predatory nations by which Palestine was surrounded, and the division of the kingdom of Israel during the reign of Rehoboam rendered the kingdom of Judah an easy victim. In 970 B. C., only five years after the death of Solomon, Shishak, king of Egypt, raided the city and carried away the treasures of the temple. In 884 the Philistines and Arabs plundered the city and took away the wives and children of Jehoram the king, leaving him only one son.

The secession of the northern kingdom was followed by occasional wars between the two kingdoms, in one of which, in 808 B. C., Jehoash, king of Israel, 'came down to Jerusalem and broke down the wall of Jerusalem from the gate of Ephraim unto the corner gate, 400 cubits," plundered the city and temple, and returned to Samaria with much treasure and many hostages.

But a more powerful enemy menaced Jerusalem from the east. In 700 B. C. Sennacherib, king of Assyria, after chastising the Phœnician city of Sidon, turned his attention to Hezekiah, king of Judah, and ravaged the country, but was bought off by a ransom of 300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold. As soon as Sennacherib had left the country, Hezekiah revolted, and Sennacherib returned with a large army and commenced a regular siege. While the Assyrian army was encamped against Jerusalem 185,000 of its soldiers died in one night by a pestilence or some other manifestation of divine power, and Sennacherib fled to Nineveh, where he was afterward slain by his own sons. In the next reign, that of Manasseh (B. C. 690), the Assyrians returned, and carried the king a prisoner to Babylon, but he was replaced on this throne after a short imprisonment.

After a succession of raids from Egypt on the one side and from Assyria and Babylon on the other, Jerusalem suffered the first of its great sieges at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. This siege lasted three years, and the city was at last reduced by famine. The king and the remnant of his army attempted to escape, but were captured and taken, with all the principal people, to Babylon, after the temple and other important buildings had been burned. This took place in 586 B. C. Later, in 582 B. C., there was a final deportation, which left the country literally uninhabited.

The books of Ezra and Nehemiah record the first Zionist movement, in which the exiles returned to Jerusalem. After the empire of the East had passed from the Persians to the Greeks, Ptolemy Soter, one of Alexander's successors, captured the city in 320 B. C. on a Sabbath day, when the Jews would not fight, and carried a great number of the inhabitants into Egypt. In 170 B. C. Antiochus Epiphanes plundered the city and razed its walls to punish the people for an uprising against a high priest of his appointment, and attempted to abolish the observance of the Jewish law. This led to the revolt of the Maccabees, who succeeded in driving the Gentiles out of the city in 163 B. C., and in 143 B. C. set up in Judea an independent state, ruled by the law of Moses. This lasted until 63 B. C. when the Roman general Pompey captured the city on a Jewish fast-day, when the inhabitants were mourning the conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; and thus commenced the Roman rule.

The greatest calamity that fell upon Jerusalem since the capture by Nebuchadnezzar was its destruction by the Romans under Titus, who suppressed an insurrection by razing the city to the ground, leaving hardly a trace to show where it had been. Jerusalem was later made a Roman colony, under the name of Ælia Capitolina, by which it was known until the time of Constantine.

In 614 the Persians under Chosroes II defeated the army of the Byzantine emperor Heraclius, took Jerusalem by storm and destroyed a large part of the city, including the finest Christian churches. When they withdrew they took away the principal inhabitants, and the relic which the Byzantine Christians believed to be the true cross. When peace was restored, the prisoners and relic were returned, and the emperor entered Jerusalem bearing the cross on his shoulders.

While the Persians and Byzantines were fighting, a power was taking form which was soon to change the destiny of half the known world. The Arabians under Mohammed had already conquered Egypt and Syria when the Caliph Omar appeared before Jerusalem, and after a long siege it surrendered in the year 637, and he built the Mosque of Omar on the site of the temple of Solomon.

In 1073 the Turks, who had been converted to Mohammedanism, invaded the territory of the Caliphs, and took possession of Jerusalem, where they outdid the Arabs in cruelty, if not in fanaticism; and the barbarities committed by them on native Christians and European pilgrims supplied the provocation to the first Crusade. By the time Godfrey de Bouillon led the Christians to Jerusalem on June 17, 1099, the city had again changed hands, the Egyptian Caliphs having driven the Turks beyond the Euphrates. After a siege of forty days the city was taken by storm, and the Crusaders signalized this victory by an indiscriminate massacre of the Moslem inhabitants, after which Godfrey was elected king of Jerusalem. In 1187, the city was taken by Sultan Saladin, and from that day to this it has remained in the hands of the Moslems, with the exception of fifteen years of Christian occupation, which was ended in 1244 by its recapture by wild Moslem tribes. In 1517 the Turks obtained possession of Syria and Egypt. In 1832 Mehemet Ali, governor of Egypt, made his country independent of Turkey and seized Palestine. During an insurrection in 1834, the rebels seized Jerusalem and held it for some time, but yielded on the appearance of the army of Ibrahim Pasha. Palestine was restored to Turkey by European interference in 1841, and has been under Turkish rule ever since.

What the Evangelists Are Doing

EVANGELIST GEORGE WOOD ANDERSON tells an interesting story of how one town was voted dry. It was the small town of Belle Center, Ohio, and it happened when the evangelist was a boy. There was a saloon in the town. The evangelist's mother and some other godly women determined to put it out of business. The method was simple. They took their knitting and dropped into the saloon at sundry unexpected times, making themselves really comfortable, and everybody else otherwise. It was not long before the men of the town stopped dropping in for drinks at odd moments, as had been their custom, and the saloon, lacking patronage, was forced to suspend business.

Dr. W. W. Hall of Swissvale, Pa., a well-known evangelist, has an interesting history. He was born and raised in Pennsylvania, on the Monongahela River, and at an early age began to earn his own living by driving a mule in a coal mine. Being ambitious, he applied for a position on one of the steamboats that hauled coal up and down the river, and was given a trial, which soon developed into a responsible position. Then he decided to take up the study of law. At twenty-three he was converted and started in Christian work. He studied for the ministry, and in a few years occupied his first pulpit. For twenty-eight years he served as pastor. Then he gave up the pastoral life to take up special evangelistic work. Since entering the evangelistic field, he has received calls from many parts of the United States and England. He has gathered around him a strong and efficient band of helpers. In his after-meetings no one is asked to sign a card until he has been given personal attention, and has been prayed with. Only actual converts are counted, reclamations and consecrations being recorded separately. Evangelist Hall and party have been holding meetings at Monessen, Pa., with gratifying results.

Evangelists Haudenschield and Pugh conducted a campaign in Wellington, Kan., during the latter part of January and the month of February, and a large number of conversions are recorded. The evangelists went from there to Grundy Center, Iowa.

Evangelist Hofmeister and party began a revival campaign in South Solon, Ohio, with a service at the Christian Church Sunday, February 25, in a great mass-meeting for men. Hundreds were stirred with great spiritual results.

Evangelist Henry W. Bromley and party held a campaign in Dayton, Ohio. A tabernacle seating 5,000 persons was filled nightly, and many confessed Christ. The business men and shop-girls, the men in the mills, and those in the institutions were all visited by the workers, and as high as fourteen meetings were held in a day.

Evangelist E. H. Baker of Washington, Pa., conducted a very successful campaign in the First Baptist Church of Nebraska City, Neb., which resulted in about 100 conversions, and on February 26 completed a campaign in Waynesburg, Pa., with about fifty converts.

Evangelist B. S. Taylor, of Mooers, N. Y., conducted revival work during the winter in Ironton, Ohio, Richmond, Ind., and Georgetown, Ill., and at the Bethany M. E. Church, Philadelphia, Pa.

Evangelist Edwin H. Edgar, of Albany, Ore., has just completed a series of short meetings in eastern Oregon, lasting about seven weeks. Between three and four hundred confessed Christ.

In·the Balance

IN the President's hurried call for the assembling of Congress in extra session to consider "grave matters of national policy," the country is again brought face to face with the weighty responsibility of deciding, once for all, whether we are to take part in the war that is devastating Europe, or to keep out of it and attend to our own business—retaining our leadership among those neutral nations which have preserved their sanity amid the world-madness. It may be that the decision will have been reached even before these lines are read, although such precipitancy is unlikely. Rather is it probable that Congress, with its usual thoroughness, instead of being swept off its feet by public clamor, will give to this question of peace or war adequate and deliberate consideration, in order that the wisest course may be ascertained and adopted.

It is beyond question that for weeks past the United States has been drifting warward. There has been a vast amount of political buncombe and spread-eagleism in the air. There has been no end of loud declarations to "stand by the President," from those who the very next day were sharply criticizing the Administration for not casting in its lot with the Allies. Regardless of our remoteness from the centers of conflict, they have professed to believe that were we to join the struggle, the influence of that act, like the weight of Brennus's sword when he cast it into the scales, would decide in favor of the Allies. The Christian Herald has stood by the President at all times when we believed him to be acting under wise advisement for the nation's highest good. We have commended his earnest efforts to preserve peace and his use of all honorable means to prevent the country from being forced into war. For these reasons, and knowing that the President has all these weeks and months had his ear to the ground, not for the shouting of the jingoes, but for the voice of the people, we have believed and still believe that if at the end of it all we are forced into war, it will not be of his seeking or his desire.

Further, we have been conscious of the fact that if the real situation in Europe were known, with its universal sorrow and suffering and hunger and dissatisfaction with the war, our government and the nation would be more than ever convinced that the struggle is one which is being consumed by its own violence, and cannot last much longer. This has doubtless been the President's view, as it is that of many others; and it is therefore a valid, humane and righteous reason why America should avoid entering the struggle and rekindling the dying conflagration. But beyond and above even these considerations, there remains the fact that this war is one of Europe's own making, and not necessarily one in which we ought deliberately to involve ourselves as a matter of free choice. If war should come unavoidably, it should not be brought about by the compulsion of the financiers at home who are interested in war loans, and the militarists and jingoes who have been blowing the war trumpets in the effort to arouse the nation for nearly three years past. It must be because war has been forced upon us by an enemy. If in the judgment of Congress and the President war is inevitable, then the nation will respond with its entire manhood and all of its resources. We feel assured that whatever its action may be, it will be such as is in line with the dignity and patriotism which have been characteristic of Congress in all great national emergencies.

In a great war of such far-reaching proportions as the present, it was logically impossible that any country could wholly escape suffering in some degree, directly or indirectly. If we had been the only neutral to endure wrong, the case might have been different; but other neutrals, most of them, have suffered even more than ourselves. Bulgaria was never, strictly speaking, a neutral. With the sole exception of Rumania, not one neutral nation has joined in the mad, destructive struggle. Nor is there any evidence of a desire on their part to do so now.

What, then, should be our attitude as a nation in this time of fateful crisis? It should be, indisputably, America First. It is a time for a cool and deliberate review of the situation before us. If in the judgment of Congress we are to take steps to protect our commerce and defend our citizens, then we shall do so with all the traditional spirit of unity and courage and self-sacrifice. The whole nation will stand behind the President and government in any course that is based on self-defense. Never have we become entangled in the quarrels of the old world, and we should not now.

We have implicit confidence in the loyalty of our whole people, native and foreign-born alike—that all will prove themselves true Americans should the test come. We further believe that the nation as a whole is opposed to war, unless it be absolutely forced upon us, but that if war should come the nation would respond loyally and unitedly. But it must be a war for America First. And we still cherish the hope that some way may be opened by which the American people may be able to render far greater service to the world than they could possibly do by joining the war and adding to its woes and sufferings. Our prayers will rise that Congress, the Cabinet and the Executive may be wisely guided in this emergency.

The Rising from the Dead

AGAIN mankind sees spring in the valleys, smiling in the splashes of sunshine, freshening in the showers, shyly creeping for shelter in the pause of the blustering winds that blow the last remnants of old winter from the land.

The sure advance of warmth, with the dead grass and trees once more greening and the buds opening to a new form of never-ceasing life, for the many millionth time attests, even to the material senses, that death is nothing but an empty name.

Thus year after year is borne in upon us, through all the natural life by which we are surrounded, the soul-inspiring lesson that even in the tiniest seed there is something which cannot die.

It is glad and fitting celebration, throughout all the animate world of nature, of that supreme event in human history wherein the Divine Son of man, though dead, did rise again and demonstrate that we all, through him, may become ever-living sons of the Eternal Father.

The human mind, since it began to think and believe, has thought and believed immortality. Millions in all ages have grasped at shadows of the truth, mere images of a truth too vast and glorious for the finite mind unaided to grasp entire; but the truth itself, the firm belief in immortal life, has been through countless cycles of generations inbred in the human mind. It is the very core of all true civilization, the nucleus of all real development, the force of all human progress.

One may think he does not believe in immortality, but he deceives himself. No mind can look at death without looking beyond it. Death, like birth, is a line invisible to human comprehension. None can shut his eyes so tight as not to see, in the springtime smile of nature, the deathlessness of life and the ever-watchful providence of God.

While immortality is the natural belief of the natural man, the leaven in the human loaf, yet how far more secure and inspiring and saving the belief becomes when illumined by divine revelation and exalted by sublime faith!

How actual and vivid and acute the belief and faith become, in communion with the risen Christ!

How the redeemed soul thrills, in its human chrysalis of clay, with the warmth of the love divine!

Liberty Enlightening the World

THAT was a wonderful spark, destined to glow into a great light and cast its bright rays far, which was kindled upon this continent one hundred and forty-one years ago.

It is a light which has guided to republican liberty every independent people of the western hemisphere; it has illumined France; it lifted for a while the shadows from Spain; it has liberated Portugal and even distant China, and now at last has penetrated to the very depths of darkest Russia.

In 1776 most of the world was still governed by kings of absolute power. A republic was an untried experiment. The right of men to govern themselves was but an axiom; their capacity for doing it remained to be shown. America had to prove it to herself as well as to the world.

Well, America has proved it gloriously. This Republic is no longer an experiment, but a successful demonstration: no longer weak, but powerful; no longer isolated, but bearing great world tasks, duties and responsibilities. It has become an inspiration, an example, a model and a mighty power among all the nations.

This is a marvelous achievement, but greater still awaits our show of worthiness. Never in the days of its weakness was our Republic so severely tested as it is now in the day of its strength. May we through gravest stress still cling to our traditional ideals of harmony at home, of equal fairness to all the nations, and the blessed results, respect and peace.

Now, more than ever before in all history, benighted humanity needs the steady, unflickering light of the great Republic founded upon equality of its own people and impartial justice to all others.

Evangelist Sunday on War

WHEN the war spirit reaches the pulpit and threatens to turn the church into a recruiting station, something is bound to happen. According to the New York Tribune, Evangelist Sunday, speaking in Buffalo, announced his intention of turning the New York tabernacle into a recruiting station. "I'll call for recruits," he is reported as saying; "volunteers for Christ and the U. S. A. I'll have recruiting officers there to sign them up. Jesus will be our Commander-in-chief, and He has von Hindenburg beaten to a frazzle." This is neither good Gospel nor good sense. The whole trouble with the church in the ages that are passing is that it has been too prone to fits of militancy. What a spectacle it presented when the European war broke out—bishops, archbishops, cardinals and plain ministers and evangelists all shouting for war, blessing the colors and invoking the divine aid to help the armies of one nation slaughter those of another nation! One of the principal reasons why the church has lost its hold on sensible people is because of its inconsistency in getting out of its proper Gospel orbit to help play the game of war. "My kingdom," said Christ, "is not of this world, else would my servants fight." When will our preachers and spiritual teachers recognize the fact that in the service of King Jesus there is no room for the advocacy of human warfare?

The One Who Holds On

THE greatest men in the world have suffered defeats. But they have come up again, stronger for the struggle.

Take General Grant, for one striking instance. He was a dismal failure for half his life. But he never gave up his high ideals, and he never gave up his struggles to attain them. When the crucial time came he was ready for it. His opportunity had been created within.

Even the strongest-hearted may fail, not only once but again and again. But what of that? Life is a campaign, not a single battle.

At the close of the first day of the battle of Shiloh, a day of severe Union reverses, General Grant was met by his much-discouraged chief of staff, McPherson, who said: "Things look bad, General. We have lost half our artillery and a third of the infantry. Our line is broken and we are pushed back nearly to the river."

Grant made no reply, and McPherson asked impatiently what he intended to do.

"Do? Why, reform the lines and attack at daybreak. Won't they be surprised?"

So surprised they were that they were routed before nine o'clock.

Every one who succeeds meets just such crises, and must avert disaster by a prompt reforming of lines and a surprising early attack.

There is no real defeat for the one who holds on in a right cause. The only permanent and hopeless failure comes through a soul-surrender.

The Spirit of Youth

LATER life is largely the working out of the visions and the enthusiasms which come to us in youth. For youth is not only the beginning, but the perennial spring, of all our faculties.

The real test of the man is not, How much skill has he? but, How much youth abides in his soul?

Whether the long stretches of middle life, under the heat of the sun and the burden of the day, shall be a monotonous and barren plain, or blossom as a garden continually freshened by crystal waters, depends upon the depth and volume of the springs of youth.

There are men of few years but great age. We have all seen them—those old men of thirty or forty, who have fingered the fringe of life with the tips of their idle hands, and imagine they are sated, worn-out men of the world. They have exhausted, as they believe, all of life's resources, and for them the years hold nothing but monotony and weariness. Nonentities.

And we have seen those other men on whose strong, trained shoulders rest the burdens of seven, eight and sometimes nine decades, full of the unwasted power of the spirit, electric with energy, virile with that strength which comes of freshness and of joy in the work done and the vision fulfilled.

Life is measured not by its years but by its enthusiasms.

While the vision glows the life is young. Only when the vision fades is the life here done.

THE ROAD TO UNDERSTANDING

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER Author of "Pollyanna"

CHAPTER I

Frosted Cakes and Shotguns

IF Burke Denby had not been given all the frosted cakes and toy shotguns he wanted at the age of ten, it might not have been so difficult to convince him at the age of twenty that he did not want to marry Helen Barnet.

Mabel, the beautiful and adored wife of John Denby, had died when Burke was four years old; and since that time, life, for Burke, had been victory unseasoned with defeat. A succession of "anything-for-peace" rulers of the nursery, and a father who could not bring himself to be the cause of the slightest shadow on the face of one who was the breathing image of his lost wife, had all contributed to these victories. Nor had even school-days brought the usual wholesome discipline and democratic leveling; for a pocketful of money and a naturally generous disposition made a combination not to be lightly overlooked by boys and girls ever alert for "fun"; and an influential father and the scarcity of desirable positions made another combination not to be lightly overlooked by impecunious teachers anxious to hold their "jobs." It was easy to ignore minor faults, especially as the lad had really a brilliant mind, and (when not crossed) a most amiable disposition.

BETWEEN the boy and his father all during the years of childhood and youth, the relationship was very beautiful—so beautiful that the entire town saw it and expressed its approval: in public by nods and admiring adjectives; in private by frequent admonitions to wayward sons and thoughtless fathers to follow the pattern so gloriously set for them.

Of all this John Denby saw nothing; nor would he have given it a thought if he had seen it. John Denby gave little thought to anything, after his wife died, except to business and his boy, Burke. Business, under his skillful management and carefully selected assistants, soon almost ran itself. There was left then only the boy, Burke.

From the first they were comrades, even when comradeship meant the poring over a Mother Goose story-book, or mastering the intricacies of a game of tiddledywinks. Later, together, they explored the world of music, literature, science, and art, spending the long summer playtimes, still together, traveling in both well-known and little-known lands.

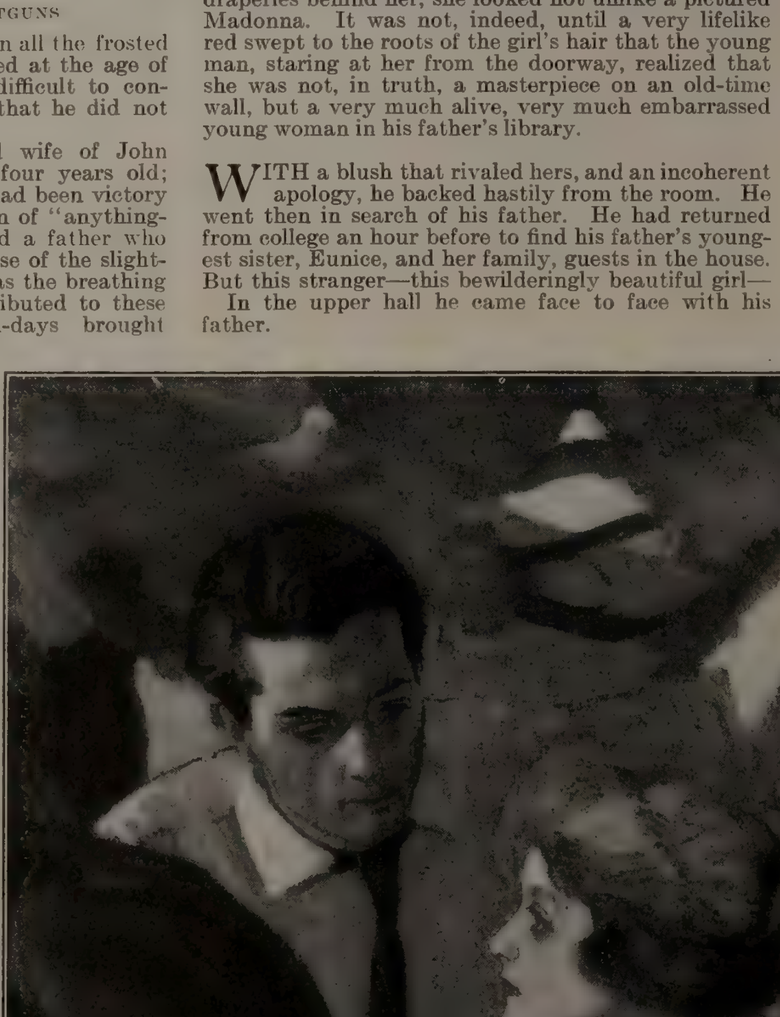
Toward everything fine and beautiful and luxurious the boy turned as a flower turns toward the light, which pleased the man greatly. And as the boy had but to express a wish to have it instantly find an echo in his father's heart, it is not strange, perhaps, that John Denby did not realize that, notwithstanding all his "training," self-control and self-sacrifice were unknown words to his son.

One word always, however, was held before the boy from the very first—mother; yet it was not as a word, either, but as a living presence. Always he was taught that she was with them, a bright, beauteous, gracious being, loving, tender, perfect. Whatever they saw was seen through her eyes. Whatever they did was done as with her. Stories of her beauty, charm, and goodness filled many an hour of intimate talk. She was the one flawless woman born into the world—so said Burke's father to his son.

Burke was nearly twenty-one, and half through college, when he saw Helen Barnet. She was sitting in the big west window in the library, with the afternoon sun turning her wonderful hair to gold. In her arms she held a sleeping two-year-old boy. With the marvelous light on her face, and the crimson velvet draperies behind her, she looked not unlike a pictured Madonna. It was not, indeed, until a very lifelike red swept to the roots of the girl's hair that the young man, staring at her from the doorway, realized that she was not, in truth, a masterpiece on an old-time wall, but a very much alive, very much embarrassed young woman in his father's library.

WITH a blush that rivaled hers, and an incoherent apology, he backed hastily from the room. He went then in search of his father. He had returned from college an hour before to find his father's youngest sister, Eunice, and her family, guests in the house. But this stranger—this bewilderingly beautiful girl—

In the upper hall he came face to face with his father.



He was looking at her lovely, glorified face.

"Dad, who in Heaven's name is she?" he demanded without preamble.

"She?"

"That exquisitely beautiful girl in the library. Who is she?"

"In the library? Girl? Nonsense! You're dreaming, Burke. There's no one here but your aunt."

"But I just came from there. I saw her. She held a child in her arms."

"Ho!" John Denby gave a gesture as if tossing a trivial something aside. "You're dreaming again, Burke. The nursemaid, probably. Your aunt brought one with her. But, see here, son. I was looking for you. Come into my room. I wanted to know—" And he plunged into a subject far removed from nursemaids and their charges.

Burke, however, was not to be so lightly diverted. True, he remained for ten minutes at his father's side, and he listened dutifully to what his father said; but the day was not an hour older before he had sought and found the girl he had seen in the library.

She was not in the library now. She was on the wide veranda, swinging the cherubic boy in the hammock. To Burke she looked even more bewitching than she had before. As a pictured saint, hung about with the aloofness of the intangible and the unreal, she had been beautiful and alluring enough; but now, as a breathing, moving creature treading his own familiar veranda and touching with her white hands his own common hammock, she was bewilderingly enthralling.

Combating again an almost overwhelming desire to stand in awed worship, he advanced hastily, speaking with a diffidence and an incoherence utterly foreign to his usual blithe boyishness.

"Oh, I hope—I didn't, did I? Did I wake—the baby up?"

With a start the girl turned, her blue eyes wide.

"You? Oh, in the library—"

"Yes; an hour ago. I do hope I didn't—wake him up!"

Before the ardent admiration in the young man's eyes, the girl's fell.

"Oh, no, sir. He just—woke himself."

"Oh, I'm so glad! And—and I want you to forgive me for—for staring at you so rudely. You see, I was so surprised to—to see you there like—like a picture, and— You will forgive me—er—I don't know your name."

"Barnet—Helen Barnet." She blushed prettily; then she laughed, throwing him a mischievous glance. "Oh, yes, I'll forgive you; but—I don't know your name, either."

"Thank you. I knew you'd—understand. I'm Denby—Burke Denby."

"Mr. Denby's son?"

"Yes."

"Oh-h!"

At the admiration in her eyes and voice he unconsciously straightened himself.

"And do you live—here?" breathed the girl.

To hide the inexplicable emotion that seemed suddenly to be swelling within him, the young man laughed lightly.

"Of course—when I'm not away!" His eyes challenged her, and she met the sally with a gurgle of laughter.

"Oh, I meant—when you're not away," she bridled.

He watched the wild-rose color sweep to her temples—and stepped nearer.

"But you haven't told me a thing of yourself—yet," he complained.

She sighed—and at the sigh an unreasoning wrath against an unknown something rose within him.

"There's nothing to tell," she murmured. "I'm just here—a nurse to Master Paul and his brother." She sighed again; and, at this second sigh, Burke Denby's wrath became reasoning and definite. It was directed against the world in general, and his aunt in particular, that they should permit for one instant this glorious creature to sacrifice her charm and sweetness on the altar of menial services to a couple of unappreciative infants.

"Oh, I'm so sorry!" he breathed, plainly aglow at the intimate nearness of this heart-to-heart talk. "But I'm glad—you're here!"

Once more, before he turned reluctantly away, he gazed straight into her blue eyes—and the game was on.

It was a pretty game. The young man was hard hit, and it was his first wound from Cupid's dart. Heretofore in his curriculum girls had not been included; and the closeness of his association with his father had not been conducive to incipient love affairs. Perhaps, for these reasons, he was all the more ardent a wooer. Certainly an ardent wooer he was. There was no gainsaying that—though the boy himself, at first, did not recognize it as wooing at all.

It began with pity.

HE was so sorry for her—doomed to slave all day for those two rascally small boys. He could not keep her out of his mind. As he tramped the hills the next morning the very blue of the sky and the softness of the air against his cheek became a pain to him—she was tied to a stuffy nursery. His own freedom of will and movement became a source of actual vexation—she was bound to a "do this" and a "do that" all day. He wondered then, suddenly, if he could not in some way help. He sought her as soon as possible.

"Come, I want you to go to walk with me. I want to show you the view from Pike's Hill," he urged.

"Me? To walk? Why, Mr. Denby, I can't!"

Again the wild-rose flush came and went—and again Burke Denby stepped nearer.

"Why not?"

"Why, I couldn't leave the children; besides—it's Master Paul's nap hour."

"What a pity—when it's so beautiful out! Tomorrow, then, in the morning."

She shook her head.

"I couldn't, Mr. Denby."

"The afternoon, then?"

"No."

"Is it because you don't want to?"

"Want to!"

At the look of longing that leaped to her face, the thwarted youth felt again the fierce wrath he had known the first day of their meeting.

"Then, you shall!" he vowed. "Don't they ever give you any time to yourself?"

She dimpled into shy laughter.

"I shall have a few hours Thursday—after three."

"Good! I'll remember. We'll go then.'

And they went.

To Burke Denby it was a wonderful and a brand-new experience. Never had the sky been so blue, the air so soft, the woods so enchantingly beautiful. And he was so glad that they were thus—for her. She was enjoying it so much, and he was so glad that he could give this happiness to her! Enthusiastically he pointed out here a bird and there a flower; carefully he helped her over every stick and stone; determinedly he set himself to making her forget her dreary daily tasks. And when she lifted her wondering eyes to his face, or placed her half-reluctant fingers in his extended hand, how he thrilled and tingled through his whole being—he had not supposed that unselfish service to a fellow-being could bring to one such a warm sense of gratification.

ON the top of the hill they sat down to rest, before them the wonderful panorama of grandeur—the green valley, the silvery river, the far-reaching mauve and purple mountains.

"My, isn't this real pretty!" exclaimed the girl.

The young man scarcely heard the words, else he would have frowned unconsciously at the "real pretty." He was looking at her lovely, glorified face.

"I thought you'd like it," he breathed.

"Oh, I do."

"I know another just as fine. We'll go there next."

A shadow like a cloud crossed her face.

"But I have so little time!"

The cloud leaped to his face now and became thunderous.

"Shucks! I forgot. What a nuisance! Oh, I say, you know, I don't think you ought to be doing—such work. Do you—forgive me, but do you really—have to?"

"Yes, I have to."

She had turned her face half away, but he thought he could see tears in her eyes.

"Are you—all alone, then? Haven't you any—people?" His voice had grown very tender.

"No—no one. Father died, then mother. There was no one else—to care; and no—money."

"Oh, I'm so—so sorry!"

He spoke awkwardly, with obvious restraint. He wanted suddenly to take her in his arms—to soothe and comfort her as one would a child. But she was not a child, and it would not do, of course. But she looked so forlorn, so appealing, so sweet, so absolutely dear—

He got abruptly to his feet.

"Come, come, this will never do!" he exclaimed blithely. "Here I am—making you talk of your work and your troubles, when I took you up here with the express intention of making you forget them. Suppose we go through this little path here. There's a dandy spring of cold water farther on. And—and forgive me, please. I won't make you—talk any more."

Easter Lilies

By Ralph M. Thomson

No wonder that the lilies toss aside
Their coverlets of snow when winter dies,
To contemplate the everlasting skies,
Which smile down on them in celestial pride!
No wonder that, in beauty glorified,
They lift up to the heavens grateful eyes,
And from their humble beds of earth arise,
To blossom sweetest at the Easter-tide!

In consecrated moments which have fled,
When Christ, the Master, dared to face each ring
Of money-changers and of Pharisees,
Was it not He, the Son of God, who said
That even ancient Israel's wisest King
Was in no sense arrayed like one of these?

And he would not, indeed, he vowed to himself. She was no child. She was a young woman grown, and a very beautiful one, at that. He could not console her with a kiss and a caress, and a bonbon, of course. But he could give her a bit of playtime, now and then—and he would, too. He would see to it that, for the rest of her stay under his father's roof, she should not want for the companionship of some one who—who "cared." He would be her kind and thoughtful good friend. Indeed, he would!

Burke Denby began the very next morning to be a friend to Miss Barnet. Accepting as irrevocable the fact that she could not be separated from her work, he made no plans that did not include Masters Paul and Percy Allen.

"I'm going to take your sons for a drive this morning, if you don't mind," he said briskly to his aunt at the breakfast table.

"Mind? Of course I don't, you dear boy," answered the pleased mother, fondly. "You're the one that will mind—as you'll discover, I fear, when you find yourself with a couple of mischievous small boys on your hands!"

"I'm not worrying," laughed the youth. "I shall take Miss Barnet along, too."

"Oh—Helen? That's all right, then. You'll do nicely with her," smiled Mrs. Allen, as she rose from the table. "If you'll excuse me, I'll go and see that the boys are made ready for their treat."

BURKE DENBY took the boys for a drive almost every day after that. He discovered that Miss Barnet greatly enjoyed driving. There were picnics, too, in the cool green of the woods, on two or three fine days. Miss Barnet also liked picnics. Still pursuant of his plan to give the forlorn little nursemaid "one good time in her life," Burke Denby contrived to be with her not a little in between drives and picnics. Ostensibly he was putting up swings, building toy houses, playing ball with Masters Paul and Percy Allen; but in reality he was trying to put a little "interest" into Miss Helen Barnet's daily task. He was so sorry for her! It was such a shame that so gloriously beautiful a girl should be doomed to a slavery like that! He was so glad that for a time he might bring some brightness into her life!

"And do you see how perfectly devoted Burke is to Paul and Percy?" cried Mrs. Allen, one day, to her brother. "I had no idea the dear boy was so fond of children!"

"Hm-m. Is he really, indeed," murmured John Denby. "No, I had not noticed."

John Denby spoke vaguely, yet with a shade of irritation. Fond as he was of his sister and of his small nephews, he was finding it difficult to accustom himself to the revolutionary changes in his daily routine that their presence made necessary. He was learning to absent himself more and more from the house.

For a week, therefore, unchallenged, and cheerfully intent on his benevolent mission, Burke Denby continued his drives and picnics and ball-playing with Masters Paul and Percy Allen; then, very suddenly, four little words from the lips of Helen Barnet changed for him the earth and the sky above.

"When I go away—" she began.

"When you—go—away!" he interrupted.

"Yes. Why, Mr. Denby, what makes you look so—queer?"

"Nothing. I was thinking—that is, I had forgotten—I—" He rose to his feet abruptly, and crossed the room. At the window, for a full minute, he stood motionless, looking out at the falling rain. When he turned back into the room there was a new expression on his face. With a quick glance at the children playing on the rug before the fireplace, he crossed straight to the plainly surprised young woman and dropped himself in a chair at her side.

"Helen Barnet, will you—marry me?" he asked softly.

"Mr. Denby!"

With a boyish laugh Burke Denby drew his chair nearer. His face was alight with the confident happiness of one who has never known rebuff.

"You are surprised—and so was I, a minute ago. You see, it came to me all in a flash—what it would be to live—without you." His voice grew tender. "Helen, you will stay, and be my wife?"

"Oh, no, no—I mustn't, I can't! Why, of course I can't, Mr. Denby," fluttered the girl, in a panic of startled embarrassment. "I'm sure you—you don't want me to."

"But I do. Listen!" He threw another quick glance at the absorbed children as he reached out and took possession of her hand. "It all came to me, back there at the window—the dreariness, the emptiness of—everything, without you. And I saw then what you've been to me every day this past week. How I've watched for you and waited for you, and how everything I did and said and had was just—something for you. And I knew then that I—I loved you. You see, I—I never loved any one before,"—the boyish red swept to his forehead as he laughed whimsically,—"and so I—I didn't recognize the symptoms!" With the lightness of his words he was plainly trying to hide the shake in his voice. "Helen, you—will?"

"Oh, but I—I—!" Her eyes were frightened and pleading.

"Don't you care at all?"

She turned her head away.

"If you don't, then won't you let me make you care?" he begged. "You said you had no one now to care—at all; and I care so much! Won't you let——"

Somewhere a door shut.

With a low cry Helen Barnet pulled away her hand and sprang to her feet. She was down on the rug with the children, very flushed of face, when Mrs. Allen appeared in the library doorway.

"Oh, here you are!" Mrs. Allen frowned and spoke a bit impatiently. "I've been hunting everywhere for you. I supposed you were in the nursery. Won't you put the boys into fresh suits? I have friends calling soon, and I want the children brought to the drawing-room when I ring, and left till I call you again."

"Yes, ma'am."

With a still more painful flush on her face Helen Barnet swept the blocks into her apron, rose to her feet, and hurried the children from the room. She did not once glance at the young man standing by the window.

Mrs. Allen tossed her nephew a smile and a shrug which might have been translated into "You see what we have to endure—so tiresome!" as she, too, disappeared.

BURKE DENBY did not smile. He did frown, however. He felt vaguely irritated and abused. He wished his aunt would not be so "bossy" and disagreeable. He wished Helen would not act so cringingly submissive. As if she— But then, it would be different right away, of course, as soon as he had made known the fact that she was to be his wife. Everything would be different. For that matter, Helen herself would be different. Not only would she hold her head erect and take her proper place, but she would not—well, there were various little ways and expressions which she would drop, of course.

FILLING UP THE GULFS

A Sermon by Rev. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Eph. 1:10. "That . . . he might gather together in one all things in Christ."

THIS is a gathering together of scattered things, sundered things, things which ought to be living in fruitful harmony, but which are rioting in alienation and revolt. It is the gathering together of distracted and wasteful members round about the governance of a common head. It implies the ending of a riotous independence and of sluggish and selfish apathy, and a welding together of many members into a blessed and prosperous unity.

How is the gathering together effected? Let me illustrate. You take a handful of steel filings and scatter them over the surface of a sheet of paper. There they lie, severed and apart, each one to itself, having no communion with the others. Now take a strong magnet and draw it beneath the under surface of the paper. What happens? Each of the steel filings stands erect, and the whole company moves across the page in orderly and co-operative movement. Each item was first of all pervaded by the common power of the magnet, and then in the strength of the common pervasion all the items moved in fellowship.

And here are the sundered things referred to in my text! They lie apart, with gulfs between them, and sometimes the isolation is not of apathy, but of stern and mutual antagonism. Now, bring round about these sundered things the energizing presence of the Christ, the great Magnet, whose purpose is to "draw all men unto him." And what is the issue? Every one of the sundered members is inspired with life, and pervaded by new and inconceivable strength; and in the power of the common possession they are brought into happy and harmonious fellowship. The isolated members are filled with the energy of the Holy Spirit and by the strength of that pervasive influence they become one. Christ creates unanimity by first of all creating magnanimity; he fills the individual member with his own Spirit, and so makes all the members of one mind. He gathered together in one all things in himself.

Let us look at some of the scattered things which find their unity in him.

I LOOK, then, at my own self. Here is a divided kingdom. It is full of sundered members and powers which often plunge my being into a state of civic insurrection, member fighting against member in dire hostility. There is distraction and division where there ought to be harmony. I think of the many capacities by which I am endowed. There is conscience, there is will, there is imagination, there is desire, there is all the varied agency of passion. And then there are the outer powers, all the means of expression by which I am endowed, the gift of speech, the language of gesture, and all the many agencies by which my thought is conveyed to another. Then I have my senses, and along with these the hungers and thirsts and cravings of the flesh. All these many and varied capacities are often waging warfare in the life, and producing the discord of revolt.

You know how we describe the conditions in which the rebellion places us. We say of one man, "His temper gets the better of him." That sounds like revolt. We say of another, "He lets his tongue run away from him." Again there is the suggestion of rebellion. We say of another, "He cannot control his thoughts," and of another, "He cannot control his appetites." Now, among all these isolated and warring members, how can we obtain unanimity? "All things must be gathered together in one in Christ." The coming of the King into the riven being is the secret of unity.

Before the conductor comes on to the orchestra every member of the band appears to do as he likes. One instrument proclaims one note, and another another, and there is discord and confusion. But when the conductor appears, the individual wills of the members are subdued to his own, and the one will controls the host. And when the Lord Christ comes into my being, where every instrument has been playing for itself, without any cooperation with the rest, and has produced jarring discords and pains, the strength of his own controlling purpose restrains the individual rioting, and brings the disorderly orchestra into fellowship and harmony.

But the illustration is imperfect and inadequate: when Christ comes into the life he not only controls, he pervades the instrumentalists! His Spirit enters the conscience and Christianizes it; it enters the will and Christianizes it; it Christianizes the emotions, the affections, the senses, and even Christianizes the flesh. The Lord Christ cannot dwell in human bodies without the very bodies themselves being sanctified. "Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost?" And so when he comes into the life distraction gives place to unity, discord becomes harmony, and the once alien powers kneel together round a common head. "He gathereth together in one all things in Christ."

NOW, let me turn to another sphere where the individual members are often scattered and in mutual revolt. I turn to the sphere of the home. How frequently home is a divided kingdom, its members severed by deep gulfs, living frequently in a spirit of unlovely isolation! There are many things in home life to create division. There are differences in body. Some members of the family are physically strong and others are physically weak. One member has nerves like steel, while another has nerves like the tenderest strings of a violin. One is comparatively coarse-grained and is untroubled by trifling shocks; another is finely organized and sensitively trembles like an Arab steed. Where there are these differences in bodily constitution there is abundant scope for misunderstanding and strife.

And then there are differences in temperament. One member is of bilious temperament, and is possessed by strong passions. Another is lymphatic; life is heavy and flabby, and all its movements, vital, mental and volitional, are sleepy and sluggish. Another member is nervous, and therefore irritable, alert and superfine in mind and body. A fourth is of the sanguine temperament, active and ardent, full of impulse, but perhaps lacking in tenacity. Where these differences of temperament prevail there is grave matter for the creation of alienation and division.

And then there are differences in gifts. One member of the family has mechanical aptitudes and is little disposed to study; another has no taste for practical workmanship—he immures himself in books. A third member of the family is artistic and gives herself to music or to art, while a fourth has nothing of the artistic sense and is absorbed in purely domestic concerns. Here again the differences may make for cleavage.

The members of a family are like sundered units; how can they be "gathered together"? All things must be "gathered together in one in Christ." The different members of the family must be Christ-ruled and Christ-pervaded. The temperament must be Christianized, the gifts must be sanctified, and in this common spirit the uniting fellowship will be found. Not that all individualities will be erased, and that many lives will be as indistinctive as so many billiard balls! When the Lord comes into the life the individualities are not suppressed; they are illumined and glorified. Christ is the Head of the family; scattered members find their communion in him. The miracle is being worked every day; the coming of the Lord into the home, and the possession by each of its members of the Spirit of Christ, converts the home into heaven.

IT is the same if we turn to another sphere and contemplate the divisions of society. How great and deep are the dividing gulfs! There are social divisions separating men into rich and poor, into employers and employed. There are the gulfs created by culture, dividing society into the literate and the illiterate, the mentally dark and the mentally illumined. And there are the ecclesiastical gulfs separating men into sect and sect, and often placing them in fierce and relentless antagonism. How shall all these scattered members become one, and cooperate in smooth and progressive fellowship? They can only be gathered together in one in Christ. Nothing else can fashion the unity.

Legislation may arrange just relationships, but it can never create the spirit of love. Legislation may create juxtaposition; it is never creative of fellowship. And material forces may coerce, but they can not inspire. And if these united and hostile members are to become one, the unifying minister must pervade the temper and the spirit, and the communion must be accomplished in the secret place. It is even so with the divided sects; we shall become one "in Christ," not in the expression of common dogmas, not in the utterance of precisely similar creeds, and still less in the common observations of similar ceremonies; but one in devotion to a Person, in living fellowship and communion with the Christ.

BUT the unity is to be larger than "the things in earth." It is to be inclusive of "the things in heaven and things in earth." We are to be all one in Christ!

The pilgrim of time, toiling along the stony ways of earth, is one with the dweller in the unseen, who contemplates his Master face to face! The Christian on this side the river and the Christian who has crossed are one. They drink of the same fountain, they commune with the same Lord. Death makes no division here. This is a beautiful and inspiring evangel, which takes away many of the pangs of bereavement, and leaves the blessedness of the deepest communion untouched and undisturbed.

> "One army of the living God,
> At his command we bow;
> Part of the host have crossed the flood,
> And part are crossing now."

The Great Act of Receiving

SUNDAY, April 8. John 20 : 22. "Receive ye." It is a great thing to ask. It is a still greater thing to receive. There are many askers to one receiver. We make our request, but we do not take the answer. We call for the waters, but we do not fill our pitchers. We present the promissory form, but we do not wait for the money. And so we have frequently a maimed conception of prayer. We have regarded it only as petition, while an equally vital content is reception. And therefore it happens that a great many suppliants are spiritual paupers because they are listless or careless about receiving the very things for which they prayed. It might be truly said concerning them, "Ye have not because ye will not take the things ye ask."

And think how many supremely wonderful things are waiting to be received! And it is not as though the rich provisions are waiting on the fields of California while the hungry folk are fainting in New York. The provision is alongside the hunger, the wealth is close to the want. We have no journey to take. We have no indifference to arouse. We have no anger to appease. The heavenly stores are within our gates, just waiting to be received. And think, I say, what some of them are. Recall their evangels. "Receive remission of sins!" "Ye shall receive power!" "Receive ye the Holy Spirit!" All these treasures of grace are not deposited in the inner room of the soul whether we will or no. We have to take them in. We must receive them, and the reception is a deliberate act of the soul.

How do we receive them? "Believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." So that believing is the act of reception. But belief is more than a mental assumption. A mental assumption may rest in the mind as idly and as impotently as marbles in a boy's pocket. Mental assumptions may be like stones, or they may be like seeds. They are like stones when they stand alone; they become seeds when they are wedded to the will and become the faith of positive and practical life. The act of belief is the will acting on the divine answer to our prayers, and working that answer into everything we think and say and do.

When I have prayed for forgiveness I am to receive it, and I receive it when I face the road again as a forgiven man, and shape all my intercourse as one who has been forgiven, and I shall surely experience the reality of it in spiritual joy and peace. And so it is with all the waiting gifts of grace. Let us believe we have them; let us act as though the treasure is already in our wallets, and let us start out upon our journey, giving freely, on the kindling assumption that we have freely received. "When My Heart Is Overwhelmed"

MONDAY, April 9. Ps. 61 : 2. "From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed; lead me to the rock that is higher than I." Troubles are of various kinds. Some merely buzz around our ears like harmless but annoying gnats. Others sting us like mosquitoes. Others, like dogs, bite us. Others strike us like thunderbolts. And still others overwhelm us—take us off our feet, sweep us from our moorings, and threaten to engulf us in utter ruin. What refuge has the heart that is overwhelmed, comparable with God? There is a Rock in the sea. Isaiah called it "the Rock of Ages." It is strong and high. Prayer alone will lead us to it. To it? Rather to him, for God is that rock. The psalmist had found it so, ere he wrote these words.

God is near us even though we be at the earth's end. The troubles that overwhelm us, if we view them rightly, give us a new sense of God's nearness. "Sweet are the uses of adversity" if adversity make us feel our need of God; if it humble us, soften our hard hearts, and show us the way to Everlasting Strength.

How lofty is the salvation we have in God through Christ! There are human saviours, but they do not save. The finite rock is not high enough. This is the glory of our faith, and this is the confidence we cherish, that above all clouds he stands ensphered in light; the surface of all troubled seas he treads, commanding peace. C. C. A.

Giver of Every Good Gift

TUESDAY, April 10. James 1 : 17. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." It is for the purpose of battering down a strange error that had obsessed some Christians of his day that the apostle asserts the immutable goodness and kindness of God. "Whence is the evil in our lives, especially the evil inclinations that lead to sin?" the Christians had asked. They had been told that God tries the faith of his children. Temptations, then, they reasoned, are from God, and if these temptations result in evil, God is the Author of that evil. Already in the preceding verses the apostle has explained the true genesis of sin in man: it is man's own lust. To imagine that God could tempt unto evil would necessitate the assumption that he could be tempted with evil, which is a preposterous thought, destroying his very essence. The very opposite is true: God is an inexhaustible fountain from which blessings, only blessings, flow. He is the one Light radiating cheer and love upon the world that is never eclipsed as the created lights are. Shadows may fall upon our vision, clouding our view of his unalterable goodness, just as the aforementioned error darkened the vision of the early Christians' faith.

But God's loving disposition toward men remains the same in cloud or sunshine. He is ceaselessly bestowing upon men with lavish hand unnumbered kindnesses, and what he gives is good; it always serves the purpose for which he intends the gift; and it is perfect; it could not be improved upon.

All dealings which God has with this world of sinners are through the appointed Mediator Jesus Christ. He is declared to be "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." Let not our fickle hearts become inclined to listen to the whispering of skepticism that fills us with suspicion, doubt, and distrust of our truest Benefactor. W. H. T. D.

The Home

WEDNESDAY, April 11. Ps. 68 : 6. "He setteth the solitary in families." Home is the head of the river of national life. First the individual; then the family, the tribe and the nation. The state is but an aggregation of families; therefore the purity of the church and of the state depends upon the purity of the home. Taking care of the children is blessing all future generations and fitting the little immortals for God's eternal kingdom. It is work like that of the infinite Creator, higher than the mission of angels. What a responsibility, then, rests upon parentage, educating, training, guiding the little beings destined to everlasting development, usefulness and happiness! You are the monarchs of home life; your stewardship is God-given; as patriarchs of the home you have the child before the Sunday school, the church or the pastor. Surely those who rock the cradle rule the world.

The greatest sinners of history have come from ungodly homes, and the greatest Christian heroes from homes like that of President and Mrs. Hayes at the White House, where prayer and praise ascended daily to the King of kings, and where no intoxicating liquors, no social glass disgraced the table.

When a certain hardened sinner yielded to Christ, he said it was the memory of his mother's hand on his brow, when she was dying, forty years before, that finally brought him to his knees. Her last words were, "Son, remember your mother's teachings and love your mother's God." He had felt the touch of that hand all the years of his worldliness, till it brought him to her Lord. E. W. Love in Search of a Soul

THURSDAY, April 12. Luke 19 : 10. "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Sidney Lanier says, "Music is love in search of a word." The Gospel is infinite love in search of all lost souls. This is the philosophy of the Incarnation. It takes nothing from the force of the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation that other religions have believed in incarnations. It rather adds to it. It reveals a primary conviction of the human mind that there is no other way for God to save man but to come to him as man. This is the meaning of the Manger at Bethlehem, of the Judean and Galilean ministry, of the Passion and Death, of the Resurrection and Ascension; this is the meaning of Pentecost and the Holy Spirit, this is the meaning of the Christian Sabbath and the Christian Church and the Christian Scriptures; these can have but one meaning, and that is, God is seeking man.

It is a great thought, that of man seeking, ever seeking God; seeking him in prayers and penances and pilgrimages. Man can climb no higher than he climbs as a seeker after God. This is man at his best. Socrates, Plato, Epictetus are at their best when they are seeking after God. But there is a greater conception—that of God seeking man: seeking him by revelations and inspirations; by admonitions and invitations; seeking him supremely by the Incarnation. What is the explanation of it? This: God is love, and love is not content until all the lost are saved. C. C. A.

When We Need Not Question

FRIDAY, April 13. John 16 : 23. "In that day ye shall ask me nothing." We know of several questions which the disciples asked the Master during the brief season of refreshing that was vouchsafed them between the resurrection and the ascension of the Lord. For instance, Peter desired to know the manner of John's death; all the disciples wished to know whether the kingdom of Israel was to be restored presently. The answer was refused in both instances. Accordingly, the promise made by the Lord to his disciples must be referred to the day of his complete reunion with his believers. When they have entered into that state where their joy can no longer be interrupted by sorrow, when their happiness has become final and absolute, all the questions which so often vexed them in their imperfect state will be found to have been answered. There will be no need of asking any questions. They shall see God as he is, and the inscrutable ways of Providence shall be an open book to them.

While erstwhile they knew in part and prophesied in part, while formerly they asked even their Bible in vain on many a curious topic, while their earthly vision of God and divine things was as when a person sees through a glass, darkly; in that day they shall know even as they have been known, directly, penetratingly, without any intervening mediums, and thoroughly, so that the desire to know is fully satisfied. We put off our children and dear friends with the assurance that we cannot speak to them as yet on certain subjects but will tell them at the proper time. They take our word and are content. Should not we trust the word of our heavenly Father? He has told us all that we must know now to be Christians and to die saved. For the rest we can afford to wait. Perhaps it would not be good for us to know all that we want to know now. W. H. T. D.

The Lord the Keeper

SATURDAY, April 14. Ps. 121 : 5. "The Lord is thy keeper." Would it not be blessed to have a rich, kind friend who promises to care for all your needs in this life? There never would be a real want unsupplied, never a fear of future need, never a doubt regarding his guidance and protection. Let me tell you of such a Keeper who once said, "Let not your heart be troubled." "I, the Lord, am your Keeper." But should we not consider mother and father the keepers of the children? Oh, yes, in all things except in Jesus' coming into your heart. The parents must have his divine presence or become unfit to care for the dear ones God has given them. The first duty of the parent is to lead the children unto Him who never slumbers nor sleeps in his holy watchfulness over his flock. The parent is not strong enough to keep you from all evil and to preserve your soul unto everlasting life, and then mother may be called away to the heavenly home, and father may become ill and helpless; then how much more you will need the divine Helper, to preserve thy going out and thy coming in forever more. He will not only keep you safely in this life, but house you in his heavenly home.

Our Lord is the One to whom we may confide all the inmost secrets of our hearts. He understands us and loved us before we could love him, and no one can harm us in his embrace.

How many children are orphans, cared for by kind friends or by some benevolent institution! Jesus must be Mother and Father to them in their desolation. His everlasting arms and bosom of love is their only real resting-place and refuge. Let us then pray to him as our Keeper, saying, "Lord, keep me from all evil; forgive my sins; guide my steps and bring me to thy rest with thee in the forever land." Though we cannot see him now, we know his dwelling-place is in our hearts, our blessed eternal Friend. E. W. C.

THE DARKEST NIGHT. John 13 : 30. It was night for the disciples. Worn and wearied, they slept while He was in bitter agony. Aroused by the band led by the betrayer, in the weakness of human terror they all forsook Him and fled. They thought that was the end. They forgot what He had foretold them about it. It was indeed night to the disciples! But it was a night that was darkest just before a glorious dawn. The mourning women found bright angels at the empty tomb who said to them, "Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen." Overwhelming defeat had become the greatest victory of all the ages. W. O. HART.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

THE PRESIDENT CALLS CONGRESS. The President, on March 21, issued a proclamation calling Congress to meet in extra session on April 2, "to receive a communication concerning grave matters of national policy which should be taken immediately under consideration." This action is said to have been taken on the urgent recommendation of the whole cabinet. The special session of the Senate adjourned on March 16 without acting on the proposed treaty with Colombia. Pending the return of Congress, various departments of the government were busy preparing for any eventuality which might occur. The Navy Department undertook a nation-wide campaign for enlistments, in order to bring the navy up to the authorized strength, which President Wilson, on March 24 by an executive order increased to 87,000 men and directed the Secretary of the Navy to proceed at once to enlist the necessary additional personnel. This means an increase of 26,000 men. The full number authorized will be required to place in service vessels of the active fleet, those in reserve, and those approaching completion. It is probable that Congress will be asked to authorize a further increase early in the special session.

COURT UPHOLDS EIGHT-HOUR LAW. The Supreme Court, on March 19, divided five to four, upheld the Adamson eight-hour law providing an eight-hour working-day on American railroads. Previous to the announcement of the decision the railways and their employees, urged, upon patriotic grounds, by the Conciliation Committee appointed by the President to compromise their differences, finally reached an agreement through the yielding of the roads to practically the entire demands of the men. The agreement was to be effective regardless of the decision of the court, and in view of the decision it becomes a working basis for the application of the law. In its decision the court indicated that Congress had authority to regulate wages upon interstate carriers and also to prevent strikes, since the interests of the public were held to be paramount to those of any any other parties involved. With this element in the decision organized labor promptly declared itself out of sympathy, claiming that the right to strike was a fundamental right of industrial liberty.

NEW RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT RECOGNIZED. United States Ambassador Francis, on March 22, upon receipt of instructions from the State Department, immediately met the council of ministers in the new Russian government and formally recognized the new régime in the name of the United States of America, this being the first formal recognition accorded the new government. England, France and Italy later accorded the new government formal recognition. It was announced that a new commercial treaty between Russia and the United States would probably be drafted immediately, since the granting of complete freedom in Russia removed the obstacles which prevented an accord between the two governments. It was announced that in the voting for the new constituent assembly the women of Russia as well as the men would exercise the franchise.

FRAGMENTS OF NEWS. An official list of American citizens virtually held prisoners in Syria and Palestine through the failure of the Turkish government to secure safe-conducts for the American war vessels sent to rescue them was made public March 18 and contained 1,000 names. . . . The Oklahoma legislature in the session which adjourned March 17 provided for the submission of a woman suffrage amendment to the voters and for the elimination of the "grandfather "and "literacy test" clauses in the requirements for suffrage. At the same time the legislature of New York was considering the institution of the literacy test. . . . The reports that General Obregon was heading a revolt against Carranza proved false, but the Villistas were recently victorious in several engagements in the state of Chihuahua. . . . Senator Norris of Nebraska, because of criticism of his course in opposing the armed ship bill, on March 18 offered to resign if in a recall election the citizens of Nebraska would indicate that he had failed to represent them. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Harold McCormick, visiting in Switzerland, took charge of the American sailors from the Yarrowdale on their appearance on Swiss soil, entertained them and gave them complete new outfits of clothes. . . . The Board of Missions of the Episcopal Church has been encouraging members of the church to make to missions a special gift of one day's income. In 1916 under this plan debts of seven years' accumulation were lifted from the missionary work of the church. . . . The United States, on March 20, made public the note sent to General Carranza declining his proposal for neutral action to bring peace in Europe by cutting off exports of supplies to belligerents. The reasons for our non-participation were given as the futility of President Wilson's own efforts to secure peace, Germany's attempts to embroil Mexico and Japan in the war, and the belief that any restriction of commerce with the belligerents would be an unneutral discrimination. . . . President Menocal of Cuba on March 20 extended for ten days the time in which rebels could surrender and receive complete amnesty. On the same day 1,500 rebels, the largest group still under arms, were decisively defeated by government troops. . . . On March 16 it was announced that five Latin American governments had accepted a suggestion from Ecuador that delegates from the republics of the Americas assemble to "take necessary measures for securing a continental expression for the guaranty of the rights of neutrality, and if possible for the alleviation of the rigors of war." The United States has not yet indicated its course. . . . Two men accused of being German spies pleaded guilty on March 22 in the United States Court at New York to the charge of organizing a military expedition against Great Britain upon American soil. Each was sentenced to two years in the penitentiary and to pay a fine of $2,500. . . . It was announced in Washington on March 20 that the copper producers of the country had agreed to sell copper for American army and navy uses for a period of one year at approximately 16⅔ cents a pound as against a market price of 38 cents a pound. The agreement involves the selling of about 45,000,000 pounds of copper. . . . Department of Commerce officials announced that the foreign trade of the United States decreased about $190,000,000 in February, the drop being credited to the unrestricted U-boat war, which was held to have reduced merchant tonnage clearing from American ports by 23 per cent. . . . It was announced on March 22 that the United States Government had granted safe-conduct for the German officials in China in order that they might return home by way of this country. . . . A committee of railroad executives on March 22 appeared before the Interstate Commerce Commission, urging the commission to authorize advanced freight rates. . . . A tornado struck New Albany, Ind., on March 23, killing thirty-three persons and injuring more than 100, and doing damage estimated in the neighborhood of $1,133,000. . . . American marines at Santiago, Cuba, turned the city back to loyal Cuban troops on March 25. . . . It is announced that the Administration has determined to provide a naval government for the Danish West Indies. It is expected that the formal transfer of the islands will take place on April 17. . . . Contracts were awarded by the Navy Department on March 24 for twenty-four 35-knot torpedo-boat destroyers, of which ten will be built on the Pacific Coast. The boats are to be built on the basis of cost, plus ten per cent. profit, and each will be about 310 feet long, with a displacement of about 1,185 tons. The Navy Department is reported to have placed orders for more than 200 submarine chasers or coast patrol boats, and to have made a survey of all of the small motor-craft in private hands suitable for conversion into a mosquito fleet. . . . Recent compilations show that since the outbreak of the war America has repurchased $1,578,590,878 worth of her own securities held abroad, also that Europe's debt to America on April 1st was approximately $5,750,000,000.

NEW ARMY DEPARTMENTS. The War Department on March 24 announced the creation of two new departments resulting from the subdivision of the Eastern Department. Major General Leonard Wood was transferred from the Eastern Department to the new military department, with headquarters at Charleston, S. C. Major General J. Franklin Bell was ordered to command the Eastern Department, while Brigadier General Clarence R. Edwards took command of the Northeastern Department, which includes the New England states. Major General John J. Pershing was appointed to command the Southern Department, and Major General Liggett, now in command in the Philippines, was appointed to command the Western Department. On the same day orders were issued for the mobilization of thirty-four units of the National Guard in twenty-seven states and the District of Columbia, the guard to be used for police duty and for the protection of communications and of national and state property. The army is to be recruited at once to its full authorized strength of 250,000 officers and men.

PROFIT-SHARING. Although stock of the company is selling considerably above par, the Firestone Tire Company of Akron, Ohio, as a measure of profit-sharing recently offered stock in the company to its employees at par. On March 21, it was announced that over 11,000 employees, more than 90 per cent. of the total, had subscribed for over $3,000,000 worth of the stock. The stock thus sold is of the same class as the other stock outstanding, and is unrestricted, employees by this plan becoming fully qualified part owners of the plant.

Progress of the War

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

THE outstanding feature of the European war for the past two weeks has been the German retreat in the Picardy and Artois sectors of the western front. This retreat was universal on the hundred-odd mile front extending from a point a little to the east of Arras to the north, as far as Soissons on the Aisne River to the south, and varied in depth from eight to twenty miles. A total area of about 815 square miles was abandoned, leaving about 7,600 square miles of French territory in German hands. None of the coal or iron mines, commercial centers or other seats of industrial activity in northern France are found in the abandoned territory.

There has been considerable speculation as to where this retreat would stop, but the events of the last two or three days seem to indicate that as far as the line south of Arras is concerned, the retreat is ended, and that the Germans have reached the new line which they intend to occupy, and from which as a base they may intend ultimately to launch a new offensive against the Allies. This line runs southward from a point a little to the east of Arras, and thence on southeastward, passing a few miles to the west of Cambrai, St. Quentin, La Fere and Laon, and ending at the Aisne River about eight or nine miles to the west of Craonne. This line is the so-called "Hindenburg line," and is much stronger in natural defenses than the line formerly occupied.

A glance at the topography of France will help us to understand the natural strength of the new line. If we draw a line from Rheims northwesterly to a point to the east of Arras, we have roughly the dividing line between the flat plains of the coast section of France to the west and the hilly section of northern France to the east, which hilly section stretches far to the east to the German border, and rises on the "HOSANNA!"

By

BERTHA BURNHAM BARTLETT

ROBERTA HANSCOMB actually pinched herself surreptitiously as with unbelieving ears she listened to the verdict of the great throat specialist who was daring to tell her such inconceivable things. The pinch being the work of strong young fingers, it brought to her the realization that she was indeed awake, and that the doctor's words, instead of being a hideous nightmare, were a cruel ending to a beautiful daydream. She faced him defiantly, yet beseechingly. It could not, could not, must not be.

"There is no chance—no possibility—that you—have made a—a—mistake—in your diagnosis?" she questioned falteringly. "Oh! I will not—I can't—believe it!"

Dr. Braeme shook his head.

"It is a case of severe strain," he said gravely, "or what might be termed over-training. College boys occasionally experience the same misfortune in their zeal to do exceptionally good work on the athletic field, and are said to have 'gone stale.' If the trouble has not progressed too far, a brief rest, together with a cheerful determination to do and think anything save of the work in question, accomplishes wonders in putting them in condition again. Sometimes, however, they ignore the warnings which the muscles are always faithful in sounding—with the result that such offenders against the laws of self-preservation are forced to a more or less permanent retirement. You admit, Miss Hanscomb, that your vocal chords have more than once uttered their protest at the work you have compelled them to do. Now they have 'struck' and refuse to do your bidding any longer. I am sorry to tell you this, but a physician has to do other things besides healing, sometimes—has to deliver messages that strike despair to the very soul of his patients. I feel that is what I am doing now."

Roberta bowed her head. "I was to have gone into grand opera," she said colorlessly, "provided I made good in the oratorio next week. I've studied. I've worked. I've done everything to make myself perfect in those wonderful solos and arias—they demanded my all—and I gave it. Oh! And I gave it uselessly, for I can't—you say I can't—sing any more—that my voice is gone! And I've been so proud to think that the directors felt that I could be entrusted with such divine music—even though I wanted to be—an operatic star. Oh!"

THE throat specialist's own eyes were clouded with moisture as he saw the girl's despair. He wondered whether the small hope which he felt he was justified in holding out to her would be indeed comforting, or whether she would despise the day of small things.

"There is a bare possibility," he said slowly—"there is a bare possibility that you may yet be known as a 'drawing-room singer,' as they say. For at least six months, however, you should use your voice as little as possible, even in conversation. Then I would suggest your attempting simple, easy tunes requiring small range and no taxation of the chords. I think such music as is usually found in hymn-books will be within your reach. I can promise nothing beyond that."

Roberta turned away. The specialist, watching her face, divined that his well-meant, if mistaken, words had failed to reach the mark, and mercifully rose to cut short the interview by writing a prescription—a prescription which the girl tore bitterly into shreds before his eyes.

"I want no medicine!" she declared scornfully, her lips set in hard, unlovely lines.

In the days that followed the specialist found himself wondering often as to the particular way in which his client was obeying his injunction to rest. That she was doing this in some sort of fashion he knew must be the case, since the strained throat-chords were as useless to her as a singer as the torn ligaments of an injured limb would be to an athlete. But whether the bitterness of her disappointment was being permitted further to injure the delicate mechanism of her voice, he had no means of knowing. A "drawing-room voice" was not so bad—a voice which would give pleasure to scores instead of delighting thousands. Well, yes, of course it would be a disappointment to any girl; but still—and it was possible, as he had told her, if she but cultivated equanimity of mind, and rested. But if she was merely resting and at the same time indulging her grief, the throat tightening as she constantly swallowed those imaginary but nevertheless very real lumps of grief and despair—well, if she was passing through that, there was no hope for her. Perhaps if he looked her up, now that the keen edge of disappointment had—must have—become dulled, why, perhaps he might be able to reason with her a bit.

But specialists are busy people, and somehow the good intentions of Dr. Braeme remained mere intentions; and meanwhile Roberta Hanscomb, as the doctor surmised, was indeed eating her heart out, as, in the little country home where she was born and bred, she listlessly spent the days that might have been so rich in healing. Crushed by the cruel disappointment, too, Roberta had shrunk from the ordeal of telling the old people—whose pride in their daughter's wonderful voice had led them to the renunciation of her companionship—that her voice was gone forever, and had allowed them to believe that, "at the end of the season," she was merely taking a much-needed rest. She shivered drearily, sometimes, as she anticipated the day when she must tell them the truth, that she was never going away again, never going to sing again, never—never! Whimsically she wondered whether even in heaven her voice would ever be heard—perhaps, with such rebellion in her heart, she herself would be absent from the throngs of those who were there to sing the grand chorus of praise to the Messiah!

She thrilled with a new-born longing to sing His praise

The old folks, grieving at the change which was so manifest in their daughter, said little. When she got ready she'd sing for them; perhaps prima-donnas didn't sing for strangers without pay, but she'd sing for them. They wished, almost, that she wasn't a real prima-donna, but just their little girl once more, instead of the tired-looking, woman-eyed creature who had come home to rest up for another "season." They did wish, too, that she'd sing in church—they'd be so proud! But she wouldn't even go to church—just kept saying she needed to rest. Father Hanscomb was sure that was an excuse and nothing else. Most girls—and Roberta was only a girl, if she had hob-nobbed with great singers in the city—liked to be with other young folks. There was some kind of a mystery about it all, and Mother Hanscomb, with a woman's love for such imaginings, immediately suggested a "disappointment," greatly to Father Hanscomb's displeasure. Love affair! Not much! Roberta was only just a child yet!

BUT temporizing must come to an end some time, and one day Roberta, with decision in hand, attempted to divulge her secret. She—she had been at home a long time now, and——

Mother Hanscomb checked the word Roberta was trying to voice.

"Dear heart," she cried, catching the girl to her capacious bosom, "dear heart, you ain't meanin' to tell us you're goin' back now a'ready? We've enjoyed it so, your bein' to home—though we've sort of hankered to hear you singin' to us like you used to do. Have you got to go, Berty?"

And Roberta shook her head. After all, perhaps she would defer telling them the news which would distress them so greatly. And perhaps——

"If you want me so much," she quivered, her face hid on the bosom where so often her childish griefs had been comforted, "if you want me so, I—I'll stay at home until—until the beginning of another season."

Mother Hanscomb's arms tightened about her. "An' perhaps you'll sing once in a while?" she invited. "Seems like your voice'd get all out o' practice, Berty,—of course I suppose usin' it like you did in the city tired it a good deal; but mebbe it'd be a good thing to use it some—jest on hymn-tunes an' little airs—we'd be powerful pleased, your pa an' me, if you'd sing a little to us. It'd be a real charity, deary, though I know you ain't thinkin' us charity objects—no more than I thought you was when you was sick an' like to died with brain fever. Land sakes! I thought I'd die singin' to you the day the doctor said you was dyin'—nothin' to do but sing, an' the same thing over an' over again till it jest seemed as if I couldn't. If I stopped you'd moan 'Sing 'Sanna,' an' so I did—'Good enough, good enough! I long to sing Hosanna!' Jest them words for hours an' hours. An' at last you slept peaceful, an' the doctor said it was the song that done it. But my! for a year I hated hymn-singin' worse than pi'sen. Wouldn't even go into a church for fear I'd hear a 'hosanna' and collapse, I was that sick. If anybody'd told me I'd ever be askin' an' longin' for to hear a hymn sung, I'd fetched 'em a clip, I was that stirred up. So you see I understand jest how you ain't feelin' like singin', or even goin' to church where you'll hear singin', after havin' practiced and sung the great music you have, an' specially the great anthem you used to

THE BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

Conducted By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART D. D.

A Remarkable Conductor

ON a train going from New York to Washington, a conductor entered the car and called out "tickets!" He was a splendid physical specimen. A minister on the end of a seat as he handed the conductor his ticket said: "How tall are you?" He replied, "I am six feet five inches." "How much do you weigh?" the passenger said. "Two hundred and thirty-five pounds," was the answer. "What does that star on your coat-sleeve mean?" The conductor replied, "Twenty-five years; and that gold band means five more years. Another gold band is due me." The minister said, "Does that mean that you have been on this road thirty-five years?" "Oh, no," was the reply. "In three months I shall have had fifty years of continuous service on this road. The badges mean I have been a conductor on this road for thirty-five years." When the conductor had collected his tickets he sat beside the inquisitive passenger, who said, "Who are you, anyhow? Tell me something about yourself." The conductor said, "My name is Thomas Jefferson Sands. My mother was very poor and had to support the children after father died. They bound me out for a term of years to a Quaker farmer for my board and clothes. So I had only a few months of schooling in my life. At fourteen I entered the Union Army in the Civil War in a Pennsylvania cavalry regiment. Returning from the war I worked on a dirt tram three years, then as a brakeman on a freight, and as baggage-master and conductor." The minister said, "To what do you attribute your success?" Mr. Sands said, "To God's providence in giving me health, preserving my character, and directing my temper and actions each day. An old Quaker said to me when I was first made conductor, 'Tommy, be a good boy, do as thee is told, and do not give the passengers any back talk'—good advice that I have kept. I have been very happy in my family life. In a year and a half I shall be seventy and retired on a pension. No man on my train, passenger or employee, was ever killed. My dear mother instilled into me deep religious principles. I was converted at a German Methodist meeting, and for twenty-five years I have been a local preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church. I have preached in churches of all denominations in Philadelphia, where I live." Conductor Sands is a prince. He is the child of a King. All through his perilous and strenuous life he leaned on the arm of his Father for guidance and sought to do his will. "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatever ye do, do all to the glory of God." (I Cor. 10 : 31.)

He Fed the Pigeons

EVERY day several hundred hungry pigeons gather outside the window of an office on the fifth floor of Philadelphia's City Hall. They know they have a friend there who feeds them, and they have learned to distinguish that window from the many others in the building. When Judge Orlady arrives at his office the pigeons are already there to wish him a good morning and beg for their breakfast. The judge has a large box which he keeps filled with cracked grain. He scatters the grain on the window ledge, and replenishes the supply frequently as hundreds of the birds come and go. Sometimes the birds return during the day for a "piece between meals," and if the judge does not happen to notice them they peck the window pane till he comes. There are two important lessons taught in the incident. First, there is the love for the lower animals, which every true man and woman ought to have, not the silly affection sometimes poured out on cats and dogs as a substitute for children, but a genuine feeling of kindness and helpfulness for the dumb, helpless creatures. The thought is illustrated in the verses Burns wrote on the mouse when its nest was upturned by his plow, and by Lincoln when he took up a poor little kitten that had been wounded in the battle and stroked and caressed it, and gave it to the guard to nurse till it got well, and in the story where the dead crew came to life only when the Ancient Mariner looked even at the water-snakes and loved them. The other lesson is that God feeds the birds, and does so by giving them the instinct to find the food themselves. The pigeons that came to the window of the kind judge knew where to go for food. They manifested the same sense that the wild ducks and geese do which, when it freezes so tight that they cannot get water and food, fly to a warmer clime for their supply and do so in a line more accurate than any earthly engineer could lay out, and with organized battalions and a leader at the front. God put the love of the pigeons in the judge's heart and told the birds how to find his grain. God through the fingers of the judge fed his birds. "Your heavenly Father feedeth them." (Matt. 6 : 26.)

Murder Trial Women Jurors

IT is likely that no such picture has been presented in the American courts as that representing six women and six men as jurors in the trial of a murder case in Seattle, Wash. The case is that of Thomas H. Tracy, the first of the seventy-four defendants to face trial for the murder of deputies and citizens in a riot at Everett, Wash., which resulted from an attempt by a party of I. W. W. leaders to invade the city during the strike. Tracy is specifically charged with the murder of Deputy Sheriff Jefferson Beard. People who are old remember when very few doors of employment were open to women. A few taught school and now and then there was a female clerk, but as a rule they were expected to stay at home and mind their own business there, minister to the domestic circle, or prepare for wifehood and motherhood. One after another door of professional, business and industrial life has been pushed open by women, and the trains of the cities are crowded with girls and older women going happily to and coming from their work. Equal suffrage and jury duty all mark the enlarged political activities and responsibilities of womanhood. The women of the land have acted with such wisdom and conscience that society has allowed them nearly all they have asked in the industrial and even in the political world. What effect woman's presence in the jury box at a murder trial would have on the verdict would be, in the absence of experience, a matter of conjecture. It might be guessed that her sympathies would temper justice with mercy, though it must not be forgotten that there is no anger on earth like that of outraged love. While a woman might not be as logical in sifting the evidence of a case as a man, her intuitions, which are stronger than man's, would lead her more directly to the truth. The women in the jury box in Seattle did not occupy so high a political position as the Hebrew women did who were allowed to be judges of one of the highest courts in the land. There is this mention of a woman in judicial office: "Now Deborah, a prophetess, the wife of Lappidoth, she judged Israel at that time. And she dwelt under the palm tree of Deborah between Ramah and Bethel in the hill country of Ephraim; and the children of Israel came up to her for judgment." (Judges 4 : 4, 5.)

Damages Against Saloon

THE saloon men are catching it from all sides. Justice Guy in the Bronx County Court the other day awarded $20,000 to a woman who sued a hotel-keeper for selling liquor to her husband. The woman, who is Mrs. Ida Heaton, testified that her husband was a wealthy man, the owner of a chain of grocery stores in and near Beacon, New York, and also a paper-bag factory; that he was prosperous; that she lived in luxury and had three servants; that her husband was affectionate and considerate, and that they and the three children had an ideal home. Then he began to patronize the bar of a hotel near one of his stores in Beacon; he drank moderately at first, then to excess; he used to come home drunk and beat her cruelly, he let his business go to the dogs, and lost his stores, his paper-bag factory and at last the home, and died in disgrace, a drunkard, leaving behind a wrecked drunkard's family. Mrs. Heaton testified that she had written the proprietor of the hotel not to let her husband have any more drink; that she had told him she would make him legally responsible for the ruin of her husband, but no attention whatever was paid to her notes or pleas or threats; and at his death she sued the man for the murder of her love and support. If the verdict shall be sustained, it will take the saloon-keeper a good while to make that $20,000, and very likely it will put him out of business, as it should. The workingman's liability act has arrayed big business almost solidly against the saloons of the country. The laws of many states give to the drunkard's wife and the drunkard's widow money damages against the saloon-keepers for the ruin they cause. There ought to be a law that would put a part of that $20,000 damage on every one who had any share in licensing the man to do his work of death in Beacon. The penalty visited on this wrongdoer by the judge calls to mind these words of David concerning one of his persecutors: "His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate." (Ps. 7 : 16.)

"Traveler" Brings $1,155

OLIVER GOLDSMITH'S "The Traveler" was sold at auction the other day for $1,155. The money value was in the autograph inscription in the author's handwriting on the title page. Oliver Goldsmith was so poor and thriftless that at one time he was glad to sleep in the municipal lodging-house of London, among the down-and-outs. It was while he was a traveling minstrel, pretty close to a tramp, that he gathered the data he worked into "The Traveler." For the first half or even two-thirds of his life he was an object of charity, and now, after three generations, over a thousand dollars is paid for his name, written by himself! The immortality of literary influence is important and beautiful, but still more so is the immortality of good deeds, and service for the Master thus referred to: "Wherever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her." (Mark 14 : 9.)

THE GUEST

A VISION ON EASTER EVE

BY Augusta Albertson

I

IN JEWRY HAD I DWELT OF OLD,
THE MASTER WOULD HAVE SUPPED WITH ME,
AND I HIS HANDMAID WOULD HAVE BEEN,
LIKE MARTHA-- SHE OF BETHANY;
FOR HIM THE TABLE HAD BEEN SET,
FOR HIM THE UPPER ROOM PREPARED,
AND ALL MY BEST OF OIL AND NARD
WITH HIM HAD WILLINGLY BEEN SHARED.

II

THEN, WHEN HE LEFT MY COTTAGE DOOR
AND TO THE TEMPLE MADE HIS WAY,
I, WITH THE CHILDREN WOULD HAVE STREWN
PALM-BRANCHES IN HIS PATH THAT DAY;
MY VOICE WITH THEIRS HAD BEEN UPRAISED
TO LIFT THE ANTHEM CLEAR AND SWEET,
TO DAVID'S SON AND DAVID'S LORD,
ALONG THE CROWDED CITY STREET:

III

AND WHEN, THROUGHOUT THE STARRY NIGHT,
AMIDST THE OLIVE TREES HE WEPT,
NOT FAR AWAY WOULD I HAVE PRAYED,
AND WITH HIM WOULD HAVE VIGIL KEPT.
AND WHEN THE DOLOROUS PATH HE TROD
UP THE STEEP ROAD TO CALVARY,
LIKE SIMON, AT HIS SIDE, WOULD I HAVE BORNE FOR HIM THE HEAVY TREE.

IV

SHAMEFAST, HEART-BROKEN, I HAD STOOD
BENEATH THE CROSS WHEREON HE DIED,
THE WHILE THE SUN LOOKED DOWN AGHAST
TO SEE ITS MAKER CRUCIFIED;
AND HOPE WITHIN MY HEART HAD SPRUNG
TO SEE, LIKE AARON'S ROD OF OLD,
BESIDE THE ROOD ON WHICH HE HUNG,
THE FLOWER OF PENITENCE UNFOLD.

V

PERHAPS THE HONOR HAD BEEN MINE
TO GIVE THAT PRECIOUS BODY ROOM
FOR SEPULTURE, AND TO HAVE BEEN
AMONG THE EARLIEST AT THE TOMB,
WHEN, BEARING SPICES RARE, THEY CAME,
ERE YET THE SHADOWY NIGHT HAD FLED,
AND FOUND, AMAZED, THE BROKEN SEAL, AND SEEN, WHERE THEY HAD LAID HIM DEAD,

VI

ANGELIC GUARDS, IN GLISTENING WHITE,
AND HEARD WITH JOY THEIR MESSAGE SWEET;
THEN, IN THE GLOWING EASTER LIGHT,
I WOULD HAVE FALLEN AT HIS FEET
WITH MARY, WHOM HE CALLED BY NAME, OR JOURNEYED WITH THE TWO WHEN HE
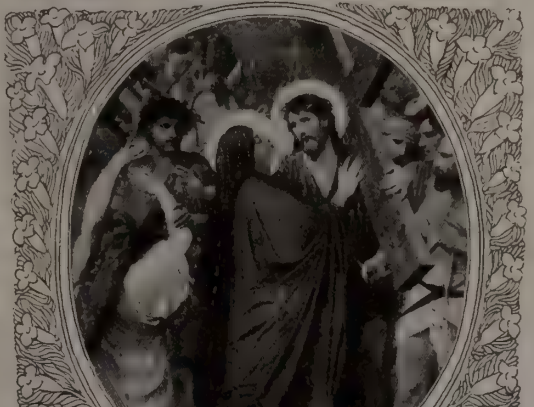
THEY LOVED AND MOURNED AS LOST DREW NEAR,
AND MADE IT PLAIN THAT CALVARY—



THE BLOODY SWEAT-THE CRUEL SCOURGE-
THE BITTER CROSS ON WHICH HE DIED-
WERE BUT THE LOT THE PROPHET SAW FOR HIM WHO MUST BE GLORIFIED.

VII

THIS TO MY HEART I OFT HAD SAID,
AND ONCE AGAIN THUS RAN MY THOUGHTS:
HAD I BEEN THERE IN JESUS' DAY,
HOW WILLINGLY I WOULD HAVE WROUGHT
FOR HIM, AS DID THE FAITHFUL FEW,
HOW GLAD TO SEIZE THE CHANCE TO PROVE MYSELF A FOLLOWER OF THE LORD, WITH ALL MY GOODS AND ALL MY LOVE.

VIII

'TWAS EASTER EVE; THE FIRST BRAVE FLOWERS
OF SPRING WERE BUDDING 'NEATH THE SNOW;
THERE LINGERED YET THE WINTRY CHILL
THAT NORTHERN CLIMES IN APRIL KNOW.
I SAT BESIDE MY COZY FIRE,
THE FLAMES CAST SHADOWS ON THE WALL,
WHEN SUDDENLY-I KNOW NOT HOW-
I SEEMED TO HEAR MY MASTER CALL:-

IX

HE CALLED MY NAME; I THRILLED TO THINK
THE RISEN CHRIST HAD COME TO BE MY GUEST. IN ACCENTS LOW HE SAID,
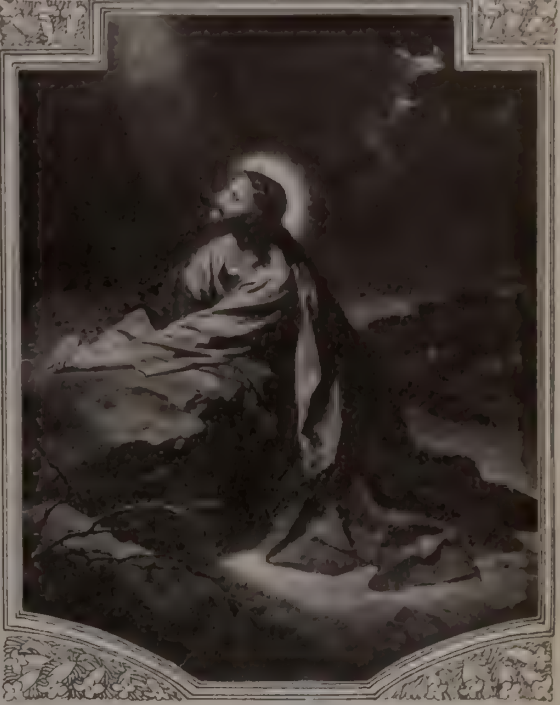
"AND WOULDST THOU MINISTER TO ME?"
"YEA, LORD, THOU KNOWEST THAT I WOULD,
"IF THOU WILT ONLY SHOW ME HOW."
TENDER, AND LOW, AND LOVER-LIKE,
HE ANSWERED ME: "I NEED THEE NOW;

X

"LIFT UP THINE EYES-THE WORLD IS SAD-
"ITS CUP OF SORROW OVERFLOWS;
"TODAY IS MY GETHSEMANE,
"THE NATIONS' SORROWS ARE MY WOES.



"I WEEP ALONE WHERE WIDOWHOOD
"AND ORPHANAGE LIFT UP THEIR CRY;
"I GROPE IN DARKNESS, BEING BLIND;
"THAT LONELY PRISONER IS — I;

XI

"I TOSS IN SPEECHLESS AGONY
"OR MOAN UPON MY NARROW BED;
"I WEEP BESIDE MY RUINED HOME;
"I PERISH FOR A CRUST OF BREAD.
"THINK NOT WHAT ONCE THOU WOULDST HAVE DONE
"HADST THOU BEEN THERE IN GALILEE,—
"WHERE ANY CHILD OF EARTH HAS NEED,
"THERE THOU CANST MINISTER TO ME."

XII

WHILE THUS HE SPOKE, MY LITTLE ROOM
GREW STRANGELY LARGE AND STRANGELY BRIGHT,
AND WHEN HE VANISHED, A PERFUME,
LIKE EASTER LILIES, FILLED THE NIGHT.
THE LIGHT HAS VANISHED; THE PERFUME
IS MINGLED WITH THE BREATH OF SPRING;
BUT LIFE CAN NEVER BE THE SAME
AND SERVICE IS A NOBLER THING.
I SEE THE WORLD WITH OPEN EYES—
THE WORLD OF NEED, THE WORLD OF SIN,—
AND WHEN THE VOICE OF DUTY CALLS,
I BID THE LORD CHRIST ENTER IN.

The TEMPLED SHRINES of NIKKO

BY MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS

FOR many years, with the unthinking loyalty and fervor which we often have toward favorite hymns, I have sung:

> "I love thy rocks and rills.
> Thy woods and templed hills,
> My heart with rapture thrills," but I had to go to Nikko to know what it meant. Rocks and rills are rare enough in some parts of America to make people love them as curiosities, and templed hills are about as common in Kansas, say, as telephones at the North Pole. But at Nikko the whole combination is right at hand, ready and waiting to be admired. Judging from the difficulty I had in securing a room there, they are successful in their mission.

Ordinarily, temples and shrines bore me. I have much the same feeling toward them that Mark Twain had toward the "old masters." In fact, the more I read Twain the more I seem to think like him. In travel matters, Twain said a whole lot that I should like to say myself, or if not actually say, at least be able to say.

One does not have to rave over shrines and philosophy and "aht" to appreciate Nikko. There are some temples and shrines there, and lest some reader think I am writing this from a hotel room on the Yokohama Bund without ever having seen Nikko, I am tempted to copy a few pages out of my guide-book, telling how the temples cost $10.000.000 and required the services of fifteen thousand men a day for twelve years; and the learned names of the gates. But if you want temples described, you will have to get a professional temple-describer to do it. The brightest remark I saw in the Imperial Japanese Government Railway Official Guide Book of Northeastern Japan was that one should visit some of the scenes of natural beauty between days spent at the temples, in order to relieve the monotony of seeing too many temples in succession. The writer of that sentence has a lack of reverence for "bloomin' idols made o' mud" and lacquered temples, that makes me want to shake his hand and call him brother.

These big stone lanterns light the way to the idol set in its high place in the grove, but a greater light, the light of the risen Christ, is breaking over the templed hills of Japan

There are enough temples and shrines tucked away in the forests and valleys of Nikko to occupy a man's time for a month. In one of them they will show you four lacquered door-posts as big as my leg, which cost $40.000 each. I see no reason why they should lie about it. They admit having used up twenty million yen's worth of material and enforced labor in their trumpery, and forty thousand dollars is a small amount in a total of ten million. There is nothing about the posts to show that the lacquer is more than skin deep; but I suppose it is, as these posts have survived three hundred years of sightseeing and are still in first-class shape.

On the ceiling they show you a hundred dragons—all different. The guide made a big point of that. I see nothing in that worthy of remark. If I had painted those hundred dragons, they would have been still more diverse. Some of them would look like centipedes, some like elephants, and some like submarine boats, if I had been the artist.

There are three halls, the inner one being called the "Holy of Holies," which did not seem at all heathen to me. It costs five dollars gold to be considered holy enough to be allowed to enter.

The first hall was enough for me. I can have some reverence for a great cool mosque in the noonday heat of Damascus, or for the massive simplicity of the half-buried temples beside the Nile; but for the over-decorated gopurams of South India or the Buddhist temples of Japan I have little feeling of respect.

The ornaments in the main temple at Nikko consist of a bronze mirror plated with mercury, some gold-paper fly-switches, and the pictures of some of the famous poets of the good old days when, I judge, poets were even homelier than they are now. The mirror has a special significance, and so have the awkward-looking and rather garish fly-switches made of goldfoil. At present, as the priest told me in carefully memorized sentences, the royal family gives coin instead of fly-switches, which is just as acceptable to all concerned, including the flies.

First impressions are lasting, and my first impression of Nikko on this visit was that of bare stagings, matting sheds and repairs. If the Nikko temples are to continue to attract pilgrims and tourists, they must be repaired and togged out in fresh paint, which is as garish and colorful as the decorations of a circus chariot.

In its older parts, the temples are truly wonderful. Examine the carvings with a microscope, and they test perfect. Run your hand over a three-hundred-year-old column, and it is as hard and smooth as glass, with its lacquer surface glistening like ivory from months of rubbing and polishing. But the repairing is of a very inferior order. The repaired sections will be the first to decay.

But if Nikko temples are confessed to be monotonous even by their own publicity bureau, Nikko itself is a veritable paradise of emerald green and diamond-glinted streams. One approaches the town between fields of paddy, lush green with the newness of verdant life, and within view of hills whose slopes are clothed in the greenness of countless maples, velvet-soft in the distance. Here and there giant cryptomerias rise majestically above the plain, and everywhere there is the sound of rushing water. It is such a place as would make the desert Arab forswear Damascus as his paradise, to sit with deepest enjoyment beside these talking waters in the pleasant shade of towering trees.

The mightiest of temples cannot mar such grandeur, and their ornate decorations are hidden in the depths of a primeval forest, which makes one remember the saying that "the groves were God's first temples." Who knows but that the splendor of Nature in this paradise of cooling green inspired the early temples that first rose here in centuries now long past?

Down through the valley runs a sparkling river. Up the river a short distance is a place where there are a hundred images and one whirlpool. I started out to see the whirlpool. After walking a little way I met a soldier, who addressed certain words to me. I knew that he was trying to dissuade me from what was for the moment my favorite walk. But I am unable to speak or understand Japanese, and I told him so in English, and started on.

But the Japanese are a resourceful people. Tourists at Nikko pay well and must not be offended, but they must obey. Out of his pocket he drew a paper which caused me to bow, apologize, and stop and talk. It read, "The emperor is taking a walk over there. Please return." All that foresight to protect the emperor from prying eyes and the visitor from inconvenient enforcement of order.

It is ten glorious miles from Nikko to the lofty Lake Chuzenji. Over five of these one may be carried at a snail's pace by a small electric tram, whose fare charges are in indirect ratio to its size. On one side is the river, dashing its way over the rocks to the sacred bridge below. On the other side rise green hills, wooded to their tops and usually surmounted by thick clouds, which make Nikko cool, and allow its hotels to charge fancy prices for a few days' residence among the "templed hills." The second five miles to the lofty lake which is situated at a level two thousand feet higher than Nikko, are traveled by an excellent zigzag path with hairpin turns and with the most exquisite views of hills, valleys, rushing water and the other typical furniture of the district, one glance at which would have made the children of Israel, in the desert wastes south of the Dead Sea, think that they were in paradise itself.

As one nears the top there is a splendid waterfall framed in the dark green of heavy woods, and the backward look over the white-stoned valley and the silver streams below is such a one as makes a man stop and look long with praise on his lips and awe in his heart. If he speaks, his words are apt to imply that that is some scenery, and he struts up and down admiring it as though he had created it himself, and just as though hundreds of men had not worked for months to make his walk easy from the tiny tram-station so far below. One of the fine things about such scenery is that it belongs to the man who is hardy enough to climb to the lofty lookout and survey the land which, for purposes of esthetic gratification, belongs to him.

The kinesthetic sensation, however, is so closely allied to the esthetic that, unless a man feels a scene in his legs, heart and lungs, he cannot feel it in his brain. There is something in the supreme joy of conquering mountains and putting precipices under foot that the lazy traveler can never have, because he never earns it.

On the morning of the day I went to Chuzenji, I felt the need of exercise, so I walked twelve miles, most of it in the shade of the great cryptomeria avenue which was planted by an old fellow some centuries ago. He could not afford the cheap trumpery with which other nobles were endowing the temples, so

There will soon need to be some shortening of sail or this sailor on Lake Chuzenji will be well landed he provided this triumphal gateway to the shrines by planting little trees and letting time and nature do the rest.

Arriving at the hotel just in time to prevent losing my tiffin, I leisurely dined, and just before tea-time a telegram came saying I was welcome to visit the great Ashio copper mine, sixteen miles away across the hills. So I squirmed back into my flannel shirt and riding breeches, and started for Chuzenji, as the first leg in the journey. As I approached the top of the climb to the four-thousand-foot level, I met some missionary friends, with Mr. Buchman of State College, Pennsylvania. The hotel at Chuzenji is quite famous among the foreign traders, diplomats and other solid representatives. I had no coat and my hill climb had almost reduced me to the melting point. Mr. Buchman kindly came to my rescue. Above khaki riding-trousers and an olive-drab shirt I wore a white duck coat, wrinkled with long travel and a trifle pinchy in the shoulders, but sufficiently correct to make some of the servants think I was English and that this was some new kind of full-dress uniform.

By sunrise next morning I was up and starting on my twenty-four miles of travel with three miles of riding over the clear waters of the lofty lake, with eight-thousand-foot Nantaisan as a back drop, and the sparkling waters as a means of support.

Asegata-toge is the pass above the small village of Asegata, and as I left the blue waters of Chuzenji behind and climbed to the top of the rise, a wonderful picture appeared. Far away in the hazy distance, past the yellow smudge from the smelting furnaces toward which I was going, rose the peak of Fujiyama, more than a hundred miles away. At my feet the steep sides of the converging hills sloped away into a valley which seemed to have no bottom. Behind me the wooded slopes and clear blue, sprinkled with sunlight jewels. Before me lay the naked slopes of barren hills, gashed and wounded by landslides, one of which had the day before destroyed several houses and damaged much property. I had left the realm of emerald and diamond and entered the domain of copper, with its sulphurous smudge soiling heaven itself.

Copper had a humble birth, a little above the class of common iron, but very humble compared with ruddy gold and useful silver. But war came along with its thousand-mouthed dragons and belching fires; the nimble electric current demanded a royal road to work; mother's washboiler needed quick heat and the ice-cream freezer belonging to the fruit-vending descendant of Solon and Miltiades needed quick cold; the beauties of the world needed some means of expression in copperplate and halftone, and useful copper rose in man's esteem, until now it ranks with the nobility of metals.

For $250, a ton of copper can be dug from the dark pits of the mines, sorted and sifted and washed and combed, smelted and molded and refined and remolded, and stored in the hold of an ocean liner. Six hundred dollars is the price it brings where wire is wound or ammunition made, and this one Japanese mine produces forty tons of the precious metal every day. Well can the mine-owner ask, "Oh war, where is thy sting?"

Twelve thousand men are employed by the company operating the Ashio mines, and when the price of copper rose very rapidly two years ago, the wages were increased eleven per cent. The houses of the laborers are humble enough according to our standards; but living conditions seem to be better, and are said by the officials to be better, than among laborers of like grade in other pursuits.

The ore-pickers, who are girls, were taking their noontime rest when I was there. Though their wages are only ten cents for a ten-hour day of bending over the ore-belts, at noon they were happy and full of play and seemed to be well fed. Nowhere was extreme poverty to be seen. The officers told me that a really industrious man could earn $1.50 a day, which is a very high wage in Japan, but that the average man earned one-fourth that amount. They did not tell me of the custom in certain factories of making a man pay foremen and others for the chance to work in a place where a high wage was possible. And I had not heard of that bit of cleverness at that time.

I cannot, of course, pose as an expert on Japanese labor conditions. The average factory in Japan is a closed book, not only to foreigners, but to any one outside the company; but conversations with those whose long residence and interest in such matters has given them a basis of judgment have brought out a few pertinent facts. The Japanese work seven days a week, and many work from sunrise to sunset. But three meals, a few teas and a rest or so are included in those long hours. At no time is the labor as strenuous or done under such pressure as the American laborer is accustomed to for his shorter day.

Although the Japanese worker has no Sabbath, he gains nothing in the long run, for in one case in which figures were available and which may be considered fairly typical, the laborers only worked from 22 to 27 days a month, the rest of the time being either indisposed or actually too sick to work. The number of "substitutes" hired by the factories is very large, and few laborers

Shake the string, ring the bell, drop a copper in the slot, and your soul is safe till next time. That is one of the details of the ancient religion of Japan

Get Your Reo No

AGAIN WE CAUTION YOU—as we did last Ap and the year before and each year before tha that there won't be, can't be, enough Reos to round. Many must be disappointed.

THAT ONLY THOSE who order now and t delivery as soon as the local dealer can sup them, can hope to be numbered among the "Lu Ones," who will drive Reos this season.

APRIL ALWAYS BRINGS the biggest demand the year—the big Spring demand starts then. M and June only accentuate it.

OBVIOUSLY, IT IS IMPOSSIBLE for any tory to manufacture in those months enough to fill the orders that dealers will book in t period.

IN THE CASE OF REO, it has never been poss for us to make enough cars in the Winter mon to supply the Spring rush.

IN FACT, NEVER since the first Reo left the tory has there been a time when it was poss to make enough cars to supply all who wan Reos.

OF COURSE WE COULD have more nearly ca up with the demand, did not the Reo policy vent. Were we, in short, willing to sacrifice qua in favor of mere quantity considerations.

FINANCIALLY, REO IS one of the strongest cerns in the world. Among manufacturers Reo plant is regarded as the "Model Automo Factory."

SO YOU SEE THERE'S NO OBSTACLE in way of large quantity production, save that wh we have deliberately placed there ourselves.

Six-Cylinder Reo
Seven Passenger Touring $1250

—It Is Imperative

THAT REO POLICY, established at the inception of Reo, has never been changed. Exigencies of the moment influence that plan not at all.

WE REO FOLK are not, never have been, ambitious to make all the automobiles—only the best.

MERE VOLUME does not appeal to us. We covet a reputation that to our way of thinking is far beyond that.

THE QUALITY THAT IS REO is the result of that policy. And it is also the cause of the effect that manifests itself in the form of a constant over-demand—a demand for Reos of all models, that is almost hopelessly in excess of the factory output.

THAT YOU KNOW REO QUALITY—that it is splendidly appreciated by motorists generally—is amply evidenced by that very demand.

SO AT THIS TIME, 'twould be a waste of words to tell you more of Reo quality.

OUR MESSAGE TO YOU—a suggestion of most vital import at this time—is to delay not another day the selection and ordering of your automobile.

AND IF YOU'VE DECIDED to cease experimenting and buy a Reo, see to it that your Reo dealer is advised in the form of an actual order—else you may again be disappointed.

THERE WON'T BE—can't be enough Reos to go round. Reports from Reo Dealers everywhere tell the same story, sound the same warning.

SO DON'T DELAY—today won't be a minute too soon.

Saving Precious Lives

WHAT has been truthfully described as "the most terrible winter the world has ever known" is nearing a close, but the great war still goes on. During the last three months, the suffering in Armenia, Syria, Caucasus, Persia and Palestine has been almost beyond belief. At no time during that period has there been less than a million actually starving. What has been accomplished by the relief already sent from the United States and other lands, has been to modify the suffering and privation in a number of localities, but there are many others that have not even been reached.

The American Consul in Tiflis cables that 40,000 fatherless children are in need of immediate help; four American missionaries at Erivan in Armenia put the number of destitute orphans in that district at between 15,000 and 20,000, only 7,000 of whom can now be helped. Another cable dispatch from a central station in Armenia, in which names and locations have been deleted by the censor, but which is known to be from the missionaries, says, "We have now upwards of 300,000 Armenians on our relief lists, and probably 250,000 more from the Greek community, making upwards of half a million women and children—all in need of immediate help." Similar appeals have come from Damascus, where 120,000 have died of hunger and exposure since the beginning of the war; from the Lebanon, Syria, where 200,000 have perished; from Tabriz, Persia, where the army of destitute is steadily swelling; and from Urumia, Persia, where there are now 30,000 refugees, and where food is scarce and at famine prices.

Everywhere the missionaries and relief workers are casting anxious eyes toward America, as the only country in a condition to extend help in the present crisis. Some idea of the extreme economy with which the relief funds are being used may be gathered from the statement of the Committee that the average support, per capita, is now necessarily reduced to 1½ cents per day. Life can not be maintained on such a pittance; yet it is all that can be done with the funds at hand.

A careful estimate shows that it requires about three dollars a month per person to sustain life, which means that the committee must have an income of $5,000,000 a month in order to keep 2,000,000 destitute people alive. The Christian Herald has recently sent a check for an additional $5,000 to this committee, whose receipts to date from the beginning of their work have passed $2,800,000.

It will be good news to readers of the Christian Herald that up to the present time, notwithstanding many difficulties in the way, we have the assurance that the relief work has been going on uninterruptedly. The Committee has arranged that, even though the last American should leave the Turkish empire, the work would still be carried forward by other reliable, sympathetic neutrals, who are now cooperating with the American Committee and are prepared for such an emergency.

Money contributed now, through the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans, is helping to relieve distress, and to save precious lives. Do not forget the Monthly Offering Clubs. There is one for you, and we know that you will find great happiness in regularly sharing of what you have with those who have nothing.

Address all gifts to War Widows and Orphans Relief Work, Room 93, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City. In due course acknowledgment will appear in the paper. State any preference you may have as to the use you wish made of your gifts.

A Missionary Trip Through Venezuela

By REV. T. J. BACH, Maracaibo

EACH missionary who is working in new territory, as a rule, must consider it his duty at certain times to travel about among the neighboring towns which have no missionaries. Such a trip I have recently completed, during which, starting from Maracaibo, I visited forty different villages and towns, of which but one had any workers. First I visited El Banco and Bobures. Many had warned me not to make the trip because of the very great risk of contracting a fever or malaria. At both places I sold a few New Testaments and evangelistic books, besides acquiring several subscribers for our monthly evangelical paper. The condition of the people here made me sick at heart. Few are they who have no fever or other dangerous sickness so common here. And in all their wretchedness they are without the Gospel. I was thankful for the chance to visit them, and God saw to it that I contracted no fever. Now I began my trip up the Zulia River in a little steamer. The first city I visited was Santa Barbara, where we, through our paper, have sought to spread the Gospel message.

During the journey to San Cristobal and Rubio, I had excellent opportunities to work for Christ, particularly in Tovar and La Grita; but I had also experiences of a less delightful character. One day I encountered four large snakes in less than two hours; they were just on my path, but I escaped them without harm. Another day as I was climbing a high mountain I was overtaken by another traveler, who asked me if we might not journey together. I assented. After a short while he suddenly asked me: "Have you a revolver?" Somewhat astonished, I answered ,"No," but added that I had something more efficient. When he asked to see it I showed him my pocket Bible. At the summit of the mountain we were alone. Here we dismounted, and drawing forth some bread and fish I asked my companion to join me in a slight repast. Just as we were ready to resume our journey, he pulled out a huge revolver and began examining it. While I was wondering what his intentions were he abruptly broke the silence with the question, "Have you any American gold?" I looked at the shining revolver and, lifting my heart in prayer to God, answered, "No; but I have that which is better." At that time I handed him a Gospel according to St. Luke and continued: "Read this and you will find a treasure of greater value than gold." Accepting it, he returned his revolver to his belt, shook hands with me, and departed. Had I this time had American gold instead of a divine Gospel, who knows but that it might have been my last trip? In San Cristobal I sold practically a whole box of Bibles and other books.

In Rubio I met my co-workers. Very encouraging it was to discuss with them the work and together present our petitions to the Master for new victories. Brother Christiansen accompanied me to Cucuta, Colombia.

After an absence of almost two months, during which I visited four states and worked for our Lord and Master in forty different towns, of which nine had never before been visited by any missionary, I arrived in Maracaibo again. During the whole trip Brother Christiansen was the only missionary I met. Truly the field is large but the workers few.

ALTHOUGH an odd fellow for 71½ years, Mr. Richard J. Jones of Wilmington, N. C., joined the church only last year. Mr. Jones joined the church during the Chapman Alexander meetings. He then showed to friends a letter from his mother, written over sixty years before, urging him to become a Christian. He had treasured the letter meaning to take the step it prompted, but had put it off from year to year. On February 5 he was ninety-five years old, and still active in business, being treasurer of three organizations, positions which he has held since 1855, 1867 and 1868 respectively. He seems to be the American champion holder of a steady job.

THREE IN ONE OIL COMPANY

The Handiest Thing on the Shelf

The Handy Oil Can, filled with the famous 3-in-One Oil, has 79 separate and distinct uses. It is indispensable to the efficient housewife.

A little 3-in-One on cheese-cloth makes a perfect dustless duster. A little on an ordinary, inexpensive floor mop turns it into a fine polish mop. A little more oils the sewing machine, the lawn mower, squeaky door hinges or locks that aren't working right. A little more prevents rust on bathroom fixtures, on the gas range and on any metal surface.

A little more—but space prohibits, and because it does, we have published the whole 79 uses in a booklet called the "3-in-One Dictionary." Write for it now and make your housework easier.

HERE we graphically portray the Willys-Overland progress which has made possible the stability of the Willys-Overland industry as it stands today.

You have a very real personal interest in Willys-Overland progress because it has been the factor that has largely determined automobile values.

And it is today a stabilizing influence — which keeps automobile values from soaring in keeping with tremendously increased costs.

Broadly speaking that producer has the lowest cost per car who has the courage to produce the largest output and the reputation which makes a ready market for that output.

For years Willys-Overland output has been the largest in its class —and Willys-Overland costs have been relatively the lowest.

The steadfast Willys-Overland policy has been to use this advantage of lower costs to increase value in the Willys-Overland product by both improved quality and lower price.

That policy today is applied to the most comprehensive line of cars ever built by any one producer.

Touring car prices range between $695 for the roomy, easy riding, 106-inch wheelbase, five passenger Light Four and $1950 for the big, luxurious, 125-inch wheelbase seven passenger eight cylinder Willys-Knight.

In between there are Big Fours, Light Sixes and the Willys-Knight Fours and body styles ranging from roadsters and sport models to sedans and limousines.

And every car has shared in the savings and economies of our greater production—every car is, we believe, value pre-eminent among its kind.

Let the Willys-Overland dealer help you from his rich experience, to decide which Overland or Willys-Knight will best serve your particular need.

Questions and Answers

J. N. G., Worcester, Mass. 1. Are Matt. 5 : 23–24 and Matt. 6 : 25 lived up to today, and are they binding? 2. Shall we in our prayers continue to ask forgiveness, even after we have accepted Christ?

1. In reading the Scriptures we must ever have the deeper spiritual meaning in view. All of us, no doubt, might at the time of offering our sacrifices on the altar be reminded of one or the other brother with whom we are not entirely in accord, and who may, therefore, have aught against us; but that is not what Christ meant. He had in view a condition of mind that was stubborn or unforgiving, and one that harbored enmity. In Matt. 6 : 25 we have again a figurative way of putting a truth. Because God promises to care for us is not a reason for us to stop caring. We must work, labor and plan to the best of our ability and strength, but when we have done that we are not to worry. When we have done our share, God will do the rest. 2. We continue to ask forgiveness because we continue to transgress. If we were perfect, we would need no Saviour; but being still imperfect, we daily need regeneration and forgiveness.

J. T. S., Bemidji, Minn. 1. The discussion of I Cor. 10 : 23 would lead to controversy. 2 and 3. There is no inherent harm in such games as basketball, football and baseball, but there is rather good in their tendency to give our young people much needed out-door exercise and freedom. Our bodies need exercise to keep them in trim, and we feel sure that when rightly conducted these games mentioned have not only nothing against them from a Christian standpoint, but on the contrary, much might be said in their favor.

C. W. C. Is there any significance in the name "Adam"?

By reference to our book "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" you will see that Adam means "red" and so also does the word Edom, both having relation to the ruddiness of flesh and the color of the clayey soil (see Gen. 2 : 7). Some commentators hold that Adam, the first man, was probably of the complexion of the Arabs or Edomites, ruddy though dark, while others take a different view. No definite theory can be formed on the subject.

Subscriber, Dural, Canada. Please explain Matt. 23 : 9.

By forbidding his followers to call any man "father," Jesus did not intend to interdict applying this term of endearment to a natural father, nor the title of respect to the aged and to dignitaries. There is authority in Acts 7 : 2 and I Cor. 4 : 15 for calling elders in the church by that name. What this passage specially prohibits is honoring any one as an absolute spiritual authority, because doing so opposes the authority of our heavenly Father, to whom alone that honor belongs.

M. J. 1. We cannot conceive of any one claiming to be divinely inspired to do wrong. 2. We cannot express an opinion on any specified case of the kind you indicate.

Miss E. A., Tannery, Md. One of the units of Mr. Sunday's evangelistic system is a post-office department in connection with each of his tabernacles. A letter addressed to him in care of the Tabernacle, New York, will certainly reach him.

A. V. DeJ., Richmond, Ky. 1. Every minister must be governed by his own conscience and the dictates of his particular church body in these matters, in view of the varying ideas on the subject. 2. There is every reason for turning the remarriage of divorcees over to the civil authorities.

L. C., New Orleans, La. What is meant by the unpardonable sin?

In ancient times it was generally held that the unpardonable sin (Matt. 12 : 32) was attributing the works of the Holy Spirit to Satanic agency. If there be a modern counterpart of the unpardonable sin, we should think it is to be found in the case of the person who uses the livery of God to serve the devil in; who enacts the rôle of the shepherd of the sheep, while he is nothing but a ravening wolf in disguise; who assumes the attitude, language and demeanor of a saint, while his exterior covers a heart black with sin and foul with guilt; who brings to the altar of God's house hands that are stained with crime, and keeps up this show of religion and utters the language of Christian invitation while he himself is not a Christian. It is a terrible picture, and one which is almost unimaginable in the case of any sane and responsible person.

A lady reader of the Christian Herald in Arizona, who has given a subscription to another woman, writes this interesting letter: "You may be pleased to know that the woman to whom I am presenting this subscription is a full-blooded Navajo, very bright and intelligent, an earnest, active Christian worker among her people, personally instructing them in religious matters, translating numerous Christian hymns, the Lord's Prayer and so forth, into their native language, and then teaching these to them. She is a fine translator, an excellent Christian mother, her home and her family doing credit, in neatness and cleanliness, to the average white family. She is doing all this Christian work without remuneration and in addition to her regular round of home duties, which I assure you are many. Her husband, also a Navajo, is proprietor of an Indian trading store, and as it is quite an asset to the cash drawer to sell white bread, this woman makes 300 loaves of white bread each week. Perhaps you may think she is highly educated to do all the religious instruction and translation which I mention; but, on the contrary, she has only completed the fifth grade course in an ordinary Indian boarding-school. I was amazed, after meeting and talking with her for parts of two or three days, to learn this fact, and also that she had had nothing in her girlhood life at home to help her, her parents being entirely uneducated."

Mrs. C. B., Coon Rapids, Iowa. The last chapter of Ecclesiastes is a contrasting picture of youth and age, and a plea for the young to devote their lives to the service of God and not to delay until the infirmities of age overtake them. Some of the metaphors employed in the chapter are very beautiful. The darkening of the moon, sun and stars implies the failure of the eyesight of the aged; the clouds after the rain mean one trouble following another; the keepers of the house are the hands and arms, which are now palsied; grinders are the molar teeth, which are insufficient for masticating the food; the windows are the eyes; doors, the lips; the daughters of music are the voice and ear, which also fail to give service. The feeble, aged ones can no more ascend that which is high, meaning they are in constant fear of falling. The almond tree with its white blossoms symbolizes the snowy locks of the aged. The old, feeble, shriveled and dried-up man is likened to the grasshopper, whose limbs move slowly and painfully. "His eyes shall fail" means that no satisfaction can now be found in any physical thing; the golden bowl and broken pitcher are the double symbol representing death in old age. It should be remembered that this gloomy picture of old age applies to those who have not remembered their Creator in their youth. Having none of the religious consolations which they might have obtained, it is now too late to seek them according to standards obtaining at the time of Ecclesiastes. A good old age is a blessing to the godly (See Gen. 16 : 15; Job 5 : 26; Prov. 16 : 31, 20 : 29). To the ungodly who have neglected their opportunities it is a tragedy. But even to those who seek the Kingdom in age the infirmities may prove a good blessing.

Miss B. G., Menomonie, Wis. 1. The passages you quote are not in the Bible. 2. You will find the Scripture passages on the subject in Revelation, chapters 16 to 20 inclusive.

Reader, Garfield, N. Y. "Them that honor me I will honor" (I Sam. 2 : 30). Those who live for this world and shut out the vision of the next, who prefer gold to God or make it their god, whose lives are keyed on lines of selfishness, heartlessness and injustice, who never think of honoring God either with their substance or their hearts by worshiping in his house or by obeying his commandments—such people may prosper for a time, but at the end of life they will find the bitterness of disappointment, having no hope for the hereafter. Contrast such a life with that of the Christian who "puts God first," who is kind and considerate toward others, whose religion is a part of his daily and hourly experience, and who, all through to the end, enjoys the assurance of the divine blessing and final acceptance.

Mrs. M. W., East Middleboro, Mass. 1. There are some of the warring countries to which, owing to existing conditions, it is practically impossible to send relief ships, although money can still be used there for relief purposes. The missionaries, being thoroughly familiar with conditions, know how to carry on the work far better than we at this distance could advise them. It is always their policy to give spiritual as well as material aid. 2. The "gift of tongues" was conferred in apostolic times, and there is no reason to doubt that, if God saw fit, it would be conferred today. One thing is certain, however. God never gives a message without giving also the power to some to understand it; otherwise the gift would be in vain, and those claiming to possess it would be liable to just suspicion in consequence.

G. B. H., Geneseo, Ill., writes: "In your issue of September 13, you reply to 'Old Subscriber' as to the meaning of I Cor. 15 : 29. The passage should be read in the light of Rom. 6 : 4 and Col. 2 : 12. Baptism related to a faith that the dead should rise. It signified death to sin and a resurrection to newness of life. Paul means, 'What shall they do who are baptized because of the dead, that is, because Christ died to rise again and those who are his are also to rise again?' They remain dead forever, if there is no resurrection, and baptism as a type of the Christ, dead and risen, is of no use. Immersion, the original mode of baptism, best expresses this symbolism. Neander speaks of baptism in the place of dead people as a superstition introduced in a later age. In the time of the apostles, believers were baptized at once, on confessing their faith in Christ. Neander says that in the beginning those who confessed Jesus as the Messiah 'were immediately baptized, as appears from the New Testament.' In the fourth and fifth centuries many began to delay baptism, with the thought that they might devote their lives to sinful indulgence, and at the close of life have all their sins removed by baptism."

Reader, Haddonfield, N. J. I have been deeply grateful for the strong sentiments favoring peace and against the spirit of militarism which have from time to time appeared in the Christian Herald. May I plead with you to exert your influence in opposition to the universal military service measure, and to keep the matter before your readers. My heart aches as I think of thousands of boys, made in the image of the Lord, and created for his honor and glory, being asked to train for the purpose of killing some other innocent boy, who is no enemy of theirs. Oh, the wickedness of it all!

We can readily believe that there are hundreds of thousands of other parents who have the same feeling toward national militarization as our friend expresses.

F. M. F., Montgomery, N. Y. Today I received a letter from Nolan, in Alaska, 470 miles within the Arctic Circle, where they have a monthly mail. I send the Christian Herald to the postmistress, also other papers. Mrs. Flower tells me she enjoys reading every bit of them. They pass the papers around, then, she tells me, she passes all reading matter out to the prospectors, some of whom come in only once a year for mail. She tells me that the papers are circulating within a radius of from eight to eighty miles. They are so glad of reading matter out there. Any mail can be addressed to Daniel Webster, Secretary of Igloo 8, Pioneers of Alaska, Nolan, Kuyokuk, Alaska, or to Mrs. John Flower, postmistress, Nolan, Alaska. It seems to me this is a pleasant way to help our brothers far from home, from friends and religious influences. One never knows the result of sowing the seed until the harvest.

Our correspondent's suggestion may induce others to help in the good work of spreading the Gospel among our brothers in that far-off, lonely section of the world.

Subscriber, Danville, Ala., writes: "One among the many facts that impress us with your paper is that you magnify the Word of God, and make it so attractive that your readers are becoming more interested in it and living the Bible in a way that they didn't do before they became acquainted with the Christian Herald."

M. E. B., Milton, Pa. "Fetching a compass" means sailing in a circuitous course, either to encompass islands or coast, or to tack against the wind. The American Standard Version renders Acts 28 : 13 thus: "And from thence we made a circuit, and arrived at Rhegium." The mariner's compass was not then known, and steering was by the sun and stars and by "dead reckoning."

H. G. S., Penn's Station, Pa. From the first dawn of Christianity there was observance of the first day of the week as the Lord's Day by the disciples and early Christians. Constantine in A. D. 321 issued an edict recognizing that day as the one sacred to the Christians and ordering that it be kept holy.

G., Murungau, Ceylon. As far as is known, Bishop Siricius, in the fourth century, was the first to use the word "Pope" as a title. His accession, according to Roman Catholic authority, was in A. D. 384, and his death in 398. The title was expressly made the exclusive prerogative of the Roman bishops by Gregory VII (1073–85).

The concrete road between Easton and Allentown, Pa., is eight miles long. It was built by the State Highway Department, of which Wm. D. Uhler is Chief Engineer.

Transportation Goes Back to Public Roads

Railroads built up a great commercial empire in this country and developed a volume of traffic which has outgrown their facilities. Our country requires greater flexibility in its transportation facilities. It cannot be limited to tracks, yards and trains. It must have broader avenues of traffic—country roads strong enough and extensive enough to carry the short distance traffic which is least profitable to the railroads. Already there are three million motor cars in the United States with a carrying capacity in passenger miles far in excess of the railroads.

The Building of Permanent Roads

in connected systems, is one of the most important undertakings confronting the American people. The nation is awakening to its needs. The good roads movement is growing. The national government has appropriated $75,000,000 for federal aid. States are spending millions to improve highways.

People are realizing the need for immediate action, the building, not only of county roads, but also of state roads which connect important towns by a continuous highway system. A bond issue, preferably a state bond issue, is the adequate and fair method of financing the undertaking.

Concrete Fulfills All Conditions

This is just as true of concrete for roads as it is of the use of concrete in many other forms of engineering construction where strength and durability are necessary. No road surface less durable than concrete will stand the constant pounding, thrusting and shearing of power driven vehicles. It is hard and unyielding; even, but not slippery; rutless, dustless, mudless. Concrete roads have the added advantage of moderate first cost, being within the financial reach of any community. They require very little maintenance; the maintenance is built into the road.

This Association has facts and figures about the construction, service, and financing of concrete roads. Some of them are given in the interesting illustrated booklet, "Concrete Facts About Concrete Roads." A free copy will be mailed to you on request. After you have read it pass it on to your neighbors or road officials, or send us their names and we will take the matter up with them direct. Write today for Bulletin No. 136.

CONCRETE FOR PERMANENCE

Jesus, the Good Shepherd

International Sunday School Lesson for April 15
John 10:1-18

Safeguarding the Christian Flock

By George D. Allison, Ph. D.

THERE is something appealing and beautiful in the relation of a true shepherd to his flock. They are so weak, so foolish, so dependent. He is so strong, so wise, so careful of their welfare. Paintings of sheep have always been favorites with artists and public alike.

We must not take it for granted that the boys and girls see all the meaning in the parable of the Good Shepherd. Explain to them the danger of wolves and sheep-stealers. Picture a sheepfold to them and tell what you know of the peculiarly tender feeling of the Oriental shepherd for his charges. It is too bad that so few of our scholars have so much as seen a flock of sheep.

Our Need of Shepherding

However, we can probably get the class to tell us what the needs of sheep are, and then draw the parallel of our own relation to the Saviour. Sheep easily go astray from the right path—so do boys and girls, as they will be frank to admit. Sheep are all too ready to follow one another blindly over the stone wall into dangerous territory. Just so will a crowd of young people "follow the leader" thoughtlessly. We all stumble and fall, and need to be lifted up. We all need to be led into green pastures and beside still waters and into paths of righteousness.

"All we like sheep have gone astray" is the general confession of mankind. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do" is the intercessory prayer of the Master. God sends forth his Holy Spirit again and again to seek and to save that which was lost.

Thieves and Robbers

The bane of sheep-raising in Palestine has always been the marauding spirit of the desert Bedouin. Sometimes one or two sheep at a time will be stolen; more often a sudden raid and half the flock will be driven off. There are wicked men who ravage the flock of Christ to-day. The liquor industry is such an organized Arab band preying on men's bodies and souls. Make your boys see this plainly. There can be no truce between the Good Shepherd and those who have created such havoc among his people.

In the Bible Class, let us raise the question of the guilt of the food-speculators, of those who oppose child labor restrictions, of corrupt political leaders. Let us see the grasping ambitions of the military and commercial leaders of Europe as the true cause of the frightful sufferings of millions for whom Christ died. Not shepherds but wolves!

Hireling Shepherds

The man who has the shepherd's place without the shepherd's heart is a despicable figure. The priest or minister who uses his position selfishly instead of in the Christ spirit, for example. "The hungry sheep look up and are not fed." What a tragedy if in the house of God a hireling fails to feed the souls of the people with the Bread of Life!

Picture the hireling fleeing in time of danger. And in time of ease, he does not care. He does not make the sheep his own. He does not know them and love them. This strikes home, Sunday school teacher! The teacher who does not know his class, their homes, their needs, their dangers, is a hireling, not a shepherd.

The Good Shepherd

Christ sets the example of shepherding. He is to us all, great and small, rich and poor, the All-Loving Guide. He is tender, ruling in love, knowing us by name, leading us forth. We can have absolute confidence in him: "Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you" (I Peter 5 : 7).

He is self-sacrificing. His body is the door, standing like a shepherd at the entering-in of the fold. The good shepherd would die before he permitted the robber to enter. Christ gave his life to save his sheep.

He knows the robber passions that assail our souls. When anger like a wolf convulses that eager boy of yours, Jesus comes to the rescue. You must teach the boy to know that Jesus will help him to self-control.

He is all-wise. He knows the way better than we—let us follow. Death itself is safe ground if he leadeth me.

A Lesson in Missions

"Other sheep I have which are not of this fold." Even then the world-vision was before the Lord Jesus. There are no limits in the shepherding of our God.

"Other sheep"—was Christ's thought of the Romans and the Greeks. The Jews had risen to the conception of Israel as a flock and Jehovah as the "Shepherd of Israel." But to them the men of Rome were wolves. Christ saw them as capable of responding to his leadership, as really in need of his grace and guidance.

"Other sheep" transformed the barbarians into brothers beloved. "Other sheep" made the Gentiles the sacred charge of God upon the soul of Paul, the Pharisee of Pharisees. "Other sheep" made the cannibalistic dwellers of the South Sea Islands fit material for the temple of the Holy Ghost in the sight of John G. Paton and missionaries like him.

"Them also I must bring." Missions is the chief business of the Christian church. "Go ye into all the world" is our Great Commission. "Gather them in" is the song of the shepherds of the Kingdom.

Bitter hatreds tear the Christian world asunder to-day because there has not been a really international Christianity. Strong dominant nations override small weak peoples because there is no powerful motive of Christian brotherhood at work to hinder it.

There is an eternal conflict between the spirit of missions and the spirit of conquest. One seeks to serve and to bring into the unity of the children of God. The other seeks to use and exploit and rule without regard to justice and fraternity. Missions are constructive, unifying, brotherly. War is only the extreme manifestation of the spirit of the robber and the hireling at the helm of affairs.

A Lesson in Unity

The world is where it is to-day largely because of a lack of real Christian unity. The Pope, church conferences, and every little group in a class for the study of the Bible are agreed on that. There is a new longing for real vital cooperation upon the principles of Jesus by all lovers of peace and good will among men.

Christian unity is the watchword of the hour.

But how is it to be attained? By one great organization? We had that once and men call that time the Dark Ages. One great religious "trust" means oppression and worldliness. Shall we get together and try to agree on a creed? It could hardly be done, except by reducing it to the lowest minimum. Who wants a Christianity reduced to its lowest common denominator?

The Revised Version translates: "They shall hear my voice; and they shall become one flock, one shepherd." This is more accurate than "there shall be one fold." Christ does not care to have all of his sheep herded into one uniform religious corral.

But when they all hear his voice, and all obey and follow, they become one flock. The unity is in loyalty to one Shepherd.

A united Christendom alone can reach all of his "other sheep" in the wide mission fields of the earth.

A united Christendom will see in war an unendurable denial of all that Jesus stands for. It will say with one voice, at the close of the Great War, "This thing shall never happen again."

The Joy and Freedom of the Christian Life

Saved men go in and out of Christ's fold in joyous liberty. There is no bondage nor sloth in obeying him. Instead, eager, happy activity. Too many of our pupils think of the church as a prison pen and fear to surrender their freedom by becoming members.

If we are able under-shepherds we too will lead them out into wide spaces. Do not preach negatives. Show fine opportunities. Give plenty to do. That our boys and girls must have. I wish you could have seen a twelve-year-old boy take the principal part in a presentation of Home Mission possibilities called "Just Plain Peter." We have found that a busy wide-open church makes our youngsters respond to the vision of joyous fellowship in Christ.

A church building with Christ's welcome and the privilege of coming in and out many times during the week will help to bring people into the shepherding of him whose law is perfect liberty.

The Shepherd Heart in the Christian

With the shepherd heart, a Christian may become an apostle of grace though he be less than ideal in many ways. Without the shepherd heart the most correct and chaste life lacks its distinctively Christian glow of glory. We are to be not mere sheep, silly sheep, always in trouble. We are to rise into the joy and dignity of shepherding together with Christ.

We too must see when the multitude around us are distressed like sheep not having a shepherd. We too must remember that a Sunday school class in our charge is a little flock to which it is the Father's good pleasure to give the Kingdom through our faithfulness. We must also be willing like the Good Shepherd to go after the lost lamb, patiently and persistently, until we bring it back into the fold.

The loss and leakage of our Sunday schools is a disgrace. If all teachers had the shepherd heart it would be almost eliminated.

What sort of shepherds are we when we let one of our sheep stray out into a spiritual desert and, without one effort, abandon that sheep to spiritual death? Remember, Christ shepherds through you. If you are faithful he loves you with, that same love wherewith the Father loved him for his fidelity. Christ loves us all in pity. Some of us he loves in appreciation. These know the secret of the joy of their Lord.

The Lord says, "I will set up shepherds over them which shall feed them." He is calling us to service. "Feed my sheep," says Jesus to the church of today. Are we obeying his voice?

Sunday School Methods

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Illustrate the Lesson

IN addition to the newspaper, the religious and Sunday school press, the book of nature and the incidents of daily occurrence about us, we can draw for our illustration from a rich literature on illustration. Some of these books are:

"Illustrations for Public Speakers." An Encyclopedia edited by Robert Scott and W. C. Stiles. $5.
"Windows for Sermons," by Louis Albert Banks, D.D. $1.20.
"Children's Missionary Story Sermons," by Hugh T. Kerr, D.D. $1.
"Illustrations from the Great War," by J. W. W. Moeran, M.A. $1.25.
"Treasury of Illustration." $2.50.
"Illustrations from Art for Pulpit and Platform." $1.
"Anecdotes and Morals," by Louis Albert Banks, D.D. $1.50.
"World Stories Retold," by W. J. Sly. $1.
"Five Hundred Scriptural Anecdotes." 25 cents.

That illustrated material must be selected according to the age and environment of our scholars is a matter of course. That the best illustrations are those drawn from the common experiences of life is testified to by many teachers. A teacher of boys in the early 'teens uses "stories that appeal to a boy's better nature."

A teacher of girls draws her material "from familiar objects that all are interested in."

In a class of young women the teacher uses "mostly the everyday themes of their own lives."

A teacher of women says: "I use an illustration, if it is a good one—something I have seen or read. I prefer sticking to the text and practical lessons."

A teacher of fifteen boys in the early 'teens has this plan: "I use a great many illustrations. I have a card catalogue of all the best ones I hear or read and I use as many as possible right from the everyday life of the boys."

A teacher of a large class of married men: "I use very little, mostly from everyday life gleaned from the daily papers or periodicals—familiar things well known to every one."

Another uses "anecdotes, personal experiences, current events."

A teacher of girls uses "illustrations drawn from home and school life."

Another uses illustrations "from everyday life and history to bring home the main lessons."

A teacher of seventeen girls about sixteen years of age says: "I use stories a great deal; also facts from my own experience. As I am a kindergartner, I find these girls interested in stories about my children and also children's stories."

A teacher of boys "calls out experiences of the pupils as much as possible. True stories appeal and are enjoyed. They like 'when I was your age.'"

With a class of seventy-five women, the teacher says: "I seldom use anything outside of the time and people under consideration, as it distracts attention from the real subject matter, with consequent loss of time."

A teacher of high school girls illustrates "with the association of familiar things whenever possible."

An intermediate girls' teacher uses "lives they know about and those in the history of church and state."

A teacher of young men says: "I employ illustrations largely from history, biography and missions, and also from science and nature study."

A teacher of young ladies draws "from current events, if possible; from travel, from literature, from science, from Scripture, from hymns, from nature studies, from scholars' experiences."

Another uses "situations and conditions known to the class."

Another believes "in story-telling. I have taken a course in story-telling, and every teacher needs it."

A teacher of young boys illustrates by "pictures pinned on the board or objects—an occasional experiment, such as putting the white of an egg in a glass and pouring alcohol upon it, and letting them see it cook, to illustrate the effect of alcohol on the albumen of the brain."

A teacher of girls has as a plan of illustration "one that might occur in their lives; illustration from my own experience; contrast; saving and classifying illustrations is a great help—from Christian Herald, etc."

A young men's teacher: "As far as possible use illustrations from everyday familiar incidents or facts. Don't care for strained illustration."

Another "always by using familiar things or characters." Another "by story, blackboard and things that occurred in the past week."

Several teachers speak of using the scholars. "Sometimes a member of the class will supply an illustration. The girls talk freely with me of their everyday life and will often illustrate for me."

Sometimes schools furnish Underwood stereoscopes with pictures of actual scenes in Palestine illustrating the lesson. These are passed around.

The Lesson of Predominance

The growth or decline of any business depends inevitably upon the character of the article produced.

The public is not slow to appraise this character, and to reward it in just proportion to its excellence.

Thus, to the discerning person, the fact that more Goodyear Tires are sold in the United States than any other brand is deeply significant.

And as deeply significant is the further fact that the margin of Goodyear leadership is widening every day.

The first fact admits of but one conclusion: Goodyear Tires more ably than any others meet the wish of the average motorist.

The second fact supplements this conclusion with evidence that Goodyear Tires consistently are preferable, and as such are coming into wider and wider use every day.

Both conclusions should bear heavily with you in the selection of tires for your car.

Both recommend directly that your selection should be Goodyear Tires.

Goodyear Tires, Heavy Tourist Tubes and "Tire Saver" Accessories are easy to get from Goodyear Service Station Dealers everywhere.

Zella May and the Easter Service

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE orphans marched down the street, stiffly starched ginghams crackling in the breeze, round straw hats set at uncompromising angles on round little heads. It was Easter Sunday, and the orphan asylum was attending church in a body.

Zella May brought up the rear by reason of her name. For the matron, who had no eye for symmetry, grouped the orphans alphabetically when she took them for an airing. "Some," said the matron, "would have 'em walk accordin' to size, two by two, but not me! Have 'em walk from A to Z, I say. An' then I can keep their names t' mind!" So said the matron, and so Zella May always brought up the rear.

It was springtime, and early lilacs and tulips nodded at the orphans from between the palings of each picket fence. The sky overhead was gloriously sapphire, and one or two featherbeddy clouds floated leisurely in the depths of it. The breeze, the same breeze that rustled among the starched ginghams, sang a gay little song into the ear of Zella May, and she skipped—a dancy little skip—out of her place in line.

"Zella May!" It was the matron's voice—shocked, scandalized. "It's Sunday!"

Zella May, the throb of spring deadened in her heart, fell back dejectedly into line behind the rest of the orphans. Only once again, on the way to church, did she move impulsively. It was when a jonquil, gold-yellow, smiled at her from the garden plot of a stately white house. The garden plot was so near the fence that the jonquil's sunny face touched the palings, and Zella May's chubby hand reached eagerly toward it.

"Zella!"—the matron's voice was angry—"Zella May! Don't you touch that flower. That belongs to"—she paused impressively—"Mr. Smithers!"

Mr. Smithers! Zella May's little heart skipped a beat, for every one in the orphan asylum feared Mr. Smithers. It was Mr. Smithers who sent a collector for mortgages, and demanded taxes. It was Mr. Smithers whose insistence sometimes cut off the supply of stewed prunes (unconsciously, perhaps, for Mr. Smithers never visited the orphan asylum in person). It was Mr. Smithers who, the matron crossly averred, "owned th' whole town an' kept it under his thumb."

No wonder Zella May drew back her hand sharply and walked on, in stiff primness, to church.

THE church was a solemnly beautiful place. Zella May, who loved any sort of beauty, always caught her breath as she stood on the threshold. It was only twice a year—on Christmas and on Easter—that the orphans worshiped at the village church. For the orphan asylum stood on the outskirts of town, and it had a chapel of its own. So Zella May, eyes wide and awe-filled, was enchanted at the fragrant, flower-filled room, at the dim lights that filtered through the stained-glass windows, at the pulpit with its gleaming gilt-edged Bible and embroidered cloth.

The orphans began to file into their allotted pews. Zella May, being a Z and therefore last, waited in the background as the others, alphabetically more fortunate, were given seats. And then occurred the tragedy; for an usher, flustered with the rush of Easter morning, came hurriedly up to the matron.

"There's one child too many," he informed her. "There's room to seat all the rest and you, but——"

The matron was flustered too. "I must sit near them!" she told the usher. "There are so many that they'd surely get laughing or fidgeting if I wasn't where I could see them! Can't you find one other place in another pew?" Her worried glance fell on Zella May.

"Mr. Smithers never comes to church," said the usher after a bothered look over the crowded place, "and he has one of the small pews down front. She can sit there," he told the matron. "An' she'll be where you can keep your eyes on her."

Zella May had always, for as long as she could remember, traveled at the end of a long line. It was with a strangely solitary feeling that she felt herself being escorted down the long flower-hung aisle to the front of the church. The usher gave her a friendly if hurried pat on the shoulder as he deposited her in the little pew down front. "Be a good girl," he told her as he hastened back up the aisle.

ZELLA MAY settled her stiffly starched gingham skirts and pulled her round little hat straight over the round top of her bobbed head, and waited. And then, suddenly, from somewhere, music started; soft, thrilling music that was as deep as the purple twilight shadows even in its very softness. Zella May shut her eyes to drink in the beauty of it, and then, just as the music had reached one glorious, crashing chord, she heard a heavy step at the entrance of the little pew, and felt the brush of garments against her own. She opened her eyes.

Mr. Smithers had fooled the usher and the matron—that was Zella May's first thought. Mr. Smithers, a stern, portly, awful figure, had come to church. Zella May wiggled nervously to her feet and sank back again as an Easter anthem began to swell down over the flowers from the organ loft.

"Christ the Lord is risen today—" sang the choir, and, under cover of the music, Zella May glanced up at Mr. Smithers and found him looking down, crossly, at her. His lips moved.

"What're you doing here?" Zella May made out.

"There wasn't room for me," Zella May whispered back, "anywhere else! And," she added after a breathless little pause, "they didn't know 'at you was comin'!"

Mr. Smithers laughed—an unpleasant laugh. Zella May was glad that the anthem was fairly loud.

"But I did!" said Mr. Smithers, and, "Alleluia, Alleluia!" thrilled the choir.

Music spoke with a language of its own to the soul of Zella May. Looking up into Mr. Smithers' face she forgot, all at once, that his laugh had been unpleasant, and she smiled sweetly at him.

The choir was beginning on the second verse. Mr. Smithers bent down from his impressive height.

"Know who I am?" he questioned gruffly.

"You're Mr. Smithers," she informed him in her slight whisper. "You live in a white house, an' you take our rent money, an' you have yeller flowers in your yard!"

Mr. Smithers tried hard to frown. But he didn't succeed—quite.

"And who," he questioned at last, "are you?"

"I am a orphan!" Zella May whispered.

The minister began his prayer.

Zella May liked prayers. The words were so hushed in them, and so reverent, and yet so friendly. She shut her eyes again, and sank, with a rustle of stiff gingham, to her knees. Mr. Smithers sat bolt upright, his hard eyes looking straight ahead. And then he, too, bowed his head.

After the prayer there was a hymn, and the congregation stood up to sing it. There was only one hymnbook, and Zella May, quite as a matter of course, when Mr. Smithers found the place, held one corner of it.

"Don't you," questioned Zella May, blissfully unconscious of the matron's all-observing eyes, "like to sing?" She tugged at her corner of the book.

Mr. Smithers looked down, grimly smiling. "If you were me," he questioned back, "would you?"

Zella May had begun to sing, but she stopped in the middle of a sentence.

"Yes," answered Zella May, "you ain't a orphan!"

THE minister of the village church was a brilliant fellow, and his Easter sermon was especially good, although it was almost dramatically simple. For he told his congregation the story of a friendly Saviour who had been scoffed at, and wounded, and crowned with thorns. He told of a night in the garden of Gethsemane, and as he talked the small girl in the front pew moved nearer to the large stern man—moved so near that her round little hat rested against his shoulder. The minister told of a cross, painfully carried up a steep hill, and the small girl's hand crept into the great hand of the large stern man. The minister, with his voice hushed and a hint of tears in his fine eyes, told of a broken form, bleeding, dying, on Calvary, while a gentle voice said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" And in the front pew the small girl flung herself, weeping, on the broad and surprised chest of the large stern man.

"Oh, Mr. Smithers!" she sobbed, and her voice echoed forlornly above the minister's, "an' to think he died for us!"

It was very still in the church for a moment—very still indeed. Nobody laughed, however, for the small sobbing girl in the crackly gingham was so very serious! And then, a bit shakily, the minister took up his unfinished sermon. Under cover of his voice the large stern man whispered in the small girl's ear.

"Don't you cry!" whispered the large man gently—and no one would have guessed from his tone that he was not a church-goer, that he was hard on folk who didn't pay their mortgages, that he often financially embarrassed orphan asylums. "Don't you cry," he repeated, and his surprised arm tightened its clasp on the small gingham-gowned girl. "He was glad to die."

The small girl, whose knowledge of theology was not very great, snuggled her head into the black cloth of the large man's coat.

"Why, Mr. Smithers," she whispered tremulously, "why was he glad?"

"Because"— answered the large man, and though his arms drew her even closer his eyes gazed far away, past the walls of the village church, past the village itself, past the present—far back into a past that the town which knew him as a hard, cold man couldn't even guess, a past that held only a large grave and a smaller, narrower one—"because," answered the large man, and his whisper was very low indeed, and his voice hesitated over a word that, for a score of years, had not passed his lips—"because he loved us!"

MUCH later, after the final joyous Easter hymn had been sung and the benediction had been pronounced, the matron bustled down the aisle to the small pew.

"Oh, Mr. Smithers," she said ingratiatingly to the large stern occupant, "I'm so sorry t' have this happen. I wouldn't have had you bothered for anything." But when she turned to the small girl in the now crumpled gingham dress—the small girl who clung to the large man's hand—her tone was not ingratiating. "Zella May!" she said bitterly, "you come with me! How dared you make such a noise here in church? Aren't you ashamed? When we get back to the asylum you shall be—"

The large stern man interrupted, and his voice was surprisingly low and happy.

"Zella May," he told the matron, "is coming home with me."

The small girl clasped his hand with ecstatic little fingers, and the matron gasped.

"You're inviting her for dinner?" she stammered. "For dinner, Mr. Smithers?"

Mr. Smithers smiled, and that smile which was neither sarcastic nor unpleasant, melted the cold in his eyes as the April snow melts the ice out of the frozen ground.

"No; for always!" he said.

Wants Both Volumes

I RECEIVED the book, "445 Additional Bible Questions Answered," and I am so well pleased with it that I would like to have the first volume. G. R.

Madison, Ind.

The new volume, which is supplementary to the first and completes the total of 1,000 difficult Bible questions dealt with, should be in the hands of every one who has the earlier volume. The two together are indispensable to those who desire to have accurate knowledge of the Scriptures and who have found it necessary to have a helping hand over the "hard" places. The Christian Herald can supply these books promptly on demand.

Suppose All Could Use the HUDSON SUPER-SIX

Would Other Types Remain?

In the present conflict of types—Fours, Sixes and V-Types—it is well to consider what would happen if the Super-Six were free. Our patents confine it to the Hudson.

As it is now, numerous fine-car makers advocate other types. And tell you reasons for it.

Some still cling to Fours. Some urge Eights and Twelves. But the weight of opinion favors the small-bore Six.

What would become of this conflict—think you—were the Super-Six not patented.

These Are the Facts

The Super-Six last year won all the worth-while records. In a hundred hard-fought contests, against all types, it proved itself supreme.

As for the Light Six, in our final perfection, the Super-Six invention increased its efficiency by 80 per cent.

As for Eights and Twelves, our experience with motors of that type which we built made them seem to us, unnecessary.

And the Super-Six has made the Hudson the largest-selling front-rank car. Last year it outsold any car with a price above $1100.

The Vital Supremacy

One may say, "I don't care for speed, or great reserve power, or a marvelous hill-climber."

Then why added cylinders, or extra valves, or anything else to that end?

You do want superlative capacity, whether you use it or not. You certainly want it when it means no added size or cost. When it means simply ended friction.

That's the great point. The Super-Six motor is small and light and simple. We have not aimed at excessive speed or power. We have simply minimized friction.

We have done—but done better—what every engineer has been aiming at for years. And for the same result—more speed and power, without added complications. Also multiplied endurance.

Endurance was the chief aim. It is friction that causes wear. We have so reduced it that we attain what is proved the greatest motor in the world. And certainly you want it.

What One Year Did

Mark how the Super-Six, in one year, sprang to the pinnacle place. There are now 30,000 running. This year brings nothing to rival it. So it is bound to gain multiplied prestige.

This year's bodies also give to Hudson leadership in style. The ablest artists and craftsmen gave their best to these models. Each is a study in motor car luxury. Each is a pattern type.

This year we add a great gasoline saver—shutters on the radiator—which by controlling the heat of the motor in part overcomes the disadvantage of the constantly falling quality of gasoline. We add a pneumatic engine primer. We add plaited upholstery.

Our patented carburetor—on Hudsons alone—is self-adjusting to every engine speed.

So Hudson supremacy does not lie in the Super-Six motor only.

When you buy a fine car—a car to keep—you are bound to want the Hudson. You want the car which outperforms and outshines other cars. If you want such a car this spring, we urge a prompt decision. Last year many buyers waited months for delivery.

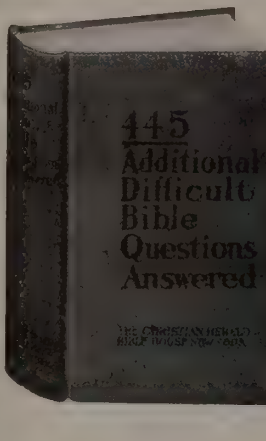
445 ADDITIONAL DIFFICULT BIBLE QUESTIONS ANSWERED

A HELP OVER THE HARD PLACES



445 Additional Difficult Bible Questions Answered
The Christian Herald Bible House New York

WHEN the earlier volume entitled "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was published, it met with such an enthusiastic reception that we have been encouraged to follow it with a second volume. Like its predecessor, it forms a compact repository of information, invaluable to pastors, scholars, students, laymen and the general reader. It illuminates and explains a large number of obscure passages, many of which might be misunderstood by the average reader.

Presenting the work of the ablest and soundest expositors in all the denominations, the new book will be found a help to many inquiring souls over the "hard places" in the Bible, and a comfort and encouragement to all who are earnestly striving to learn the truth as presented in the Word.

THE MIRACLE OF ANSWERED PRAYER

By REV. JOHN G. HALLIMOND, D.D.

A Book With a Message for Every Soul

THINK of hundreds of authenticated answers to prayer, multiplied in the course of a year to thousands. This is the story told in "The Miracle of Answered Prayer." It is a recital of tremendous and conclusive importance to the Christian world and one which cannot be controverted. It is a book that no one can read without becoming convinced of its truth and of the wonderful goodness of our Heavenly Father toward all who seek Him in the spirit of faith and contrition.

"The Miracle of Answered Prayer" should be in the hands of every Christian in America. The facts it sets forth furnish absolute evidence of the literal fulfillment of the Saviour's promise to his followers: "Whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name He will give it you." "Ask, and it shall be given you. . . ."

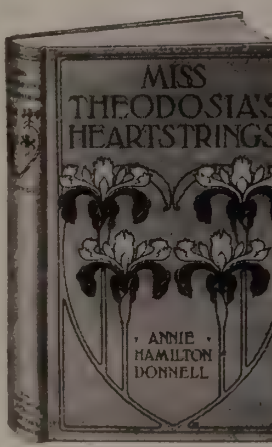
THEODOSIA'S HEARTSTRINGS



IN this irresistible novel of happiness, Miss Theodosia Baxter wandered up and down the world for three years in search of something to interest her, only to come home and find it on the upper step of her own front porch. What she found was a very much surprised child who was holding a baby on the small area of her knees. They were two of the Flagg children who lived in the house next door—Evangeline the voluble and little Elly Precious, who possessed six toes. Ere long Miss Theodosia made the acquaintance of Stefena, the eldest of the Flagg children, and little deaf Carruthers. How this quartette of youngsters reached the heart of the staid and travel-worn woman and eventually brought a romance into her own life is set forth in Mrs. Donnell's characteristic style.

JUST DAVID

By Eleanor H. Porter, Author of "Pollyanna"

EVERYONE who has read "Pollyanna" should read "Just David." He is as lovable as the heroine of the Glad Book. Mrs. Porter believes that the idea of the possibility of happiness should be held up to people, but she does not attempt to preach about it. She simply lets her characters speak.

"Just David" is not only a story of amazing popular appeal, but in its way a genuine masterpiece as well. Everyone who reads it has the same enthusiasm. David is one of those characters that seem too real to stay inside a book. It is safe to say that every single reader will regard him as a cherished friend. "Just David," bound in cloth, with frontispiece, postpaid, $1.25 net.

We will send a copy of "Just David," postpaid, together with the Christian Herald for one year, for $2.50.

Progress of the War

average 650 feet above the plains toward the coast.

The country is more rolling than hilly, and these undulations of the surface form a succession of natural defenses extending a considerable distance to the east before the more broken region of the Argonne is reached. The new German line has been placed on the westerly slopes of these north and south running hills and thus commands the plains to the west of it over which the Allies must advance. The Allies seem to think that the lines on which the Germans now are will need from 150,000 to 200,000 less men to hold them than their former line, and the force thus released can be employed in an offensive to be launched by the Germans elsewhere on this front, or on one of the other fronts. The Germans in their official announcement say that their retreat is to secure their troops the freedom of movement needed, and to get the enemy out of his trenches, thus putting an end to trench warfare. They also point out that this movement puts an end to the Allied plans for the spring offensive.

Glancing backward over the events of the war, we remember that in the winter of 1914 von Hindenburg retreated in Poland from the outskirts of Warsaw to the Prussian frontier, yet Warsaw fell the following summer; and last summer the Teutons retreated in August and September into Transylvania before the Rumanians, yet in December Bucharest was in their hands.

Mr. Frank H. Simonds of the New York Tribune (neither man nor paper being in sympathy with the Teutons) says in referring to the above statement: "What the German semi-official statements say about the strategy in falling back and avoiding the blow which the Allies had prepared during the winter months, is exactly true. Even if the Germans now stand on their present lines, it will take several months for the British and the French to get their communications and transports in the same shape these were in when the Allies began the battle of the Somme." The retreat is being conducted with the greatest skill, and the Teutons have succeeded in drawing off their artillery, their main army, and even their rear-guards, with losses of such absolute insignificance as to be astounding.

Neither the French nor the British lay claim to any booty worth mentioning, and seem to a great degree puzzled as to the purposes or objective of the retreat. This lack of knowledge on their part seems to be a conclusive proof that the Germans have again an almost complete mastery of the air, as otherwise the aerial observers of the Allies would have been able to gather sufficient data concerning the movement of the Germans to enable their staff to adopt checkmating measures, which they have not done. This opinion receives additional corroboration from the fact that this Allied inferiority in aerial fighting was one of the causes which led to the fall of the Briand Cabinet in France recently.
